IV. The healing virtue of this river. Being brought forth into the sea, the sulphurous lake of Sodom, even those waters shall be healed (v. 8), shall become sweet, and healthful. This intimates the blessed change that the gospel would make, as great a change, as the turning of the dead sea into a fountain of gardens. The gospel was as that salt which Elisha cast, 2 Kings ii. 20, 21. Christ, coming into the world to be its physician, sent his gospel as the great medicine. Wherever these rivers come, they make things to live (v. 9); they are the water of life, Rev. xxii. 1, 17. Christ came, that we might have life, and for that end he sends his gospel. The grace of God makes dead sinners alive and living saints lively; everything is made fruitful and flourishing by it. But its effect is according as it is received, and as the mind is prepared and disposed to receive it.

V. The great plenty of fish that should be in this river. Every living moving thing shall be found here, shall live here (v. 9).

VI. The trees that were on the banks of this river—many trees on the one side and on the other (v. 7); they are trees for meat, and the fruit of them shall not be consumed, for it shall produce fresh fruit every month (v. 12). The leaf shall be for medicine, and it shall not fade. This part of the vision compares with St. John's vision (Rev. xxii. 2), where, on either side of the river, is said to grow the tree of life, which yielded her fruit every month, and the leaves were for the healing of the nations. The very leaves of these trees are for medicine, for bruises and sores, margin. Good Christians do good to those about them; they strengthen the weak, and bind up the broken-hearted. Their cheerfulness does good like a medicine. Their leaf shall not fade, having not only life in their root, but sap in all their branches. Each one of them shall bring forth fruit monthly, which denotes an abundant disposition to fruit-bearing (they shall never be weary of well-doing). And the reason of this extraordinary fruitfulness is because their waters issued out of the sanctuary; it is to be ascribed to the continual supplies of divine grace.

Verses 13–22

The affairs of the state. The land of Canaan is here secured to them for an inheritance (v. 14): I lifted up my hand to give it unto your fathers. God had not forgotten his oath which he swore to their fathers. I lifted up my hand to give it, and therefore it shall without fail fall to you for an inheritance. The bounds are fixed. It is God that appoints the bounds of our habitation. It is here ordered to be divided among the tribes of Israel, reckoning Joseph for two tribes, to make up the number of twelve, when Levi was taken out to attend the sanctuary, and had his lot adjoining to that (v. 13, 21): You shall inherit it, one as well as another, v. 14. The strangers who sojourn among them, who shall beget children and be built up into families, and so help to people their country, shall have inheritance among the tribes, as if they had been native Israelites (v. 22, 23). It certainly looks at gospel-times, when the partition-wall between Jew and Gentile was taken down, and both were put upon a level before God, both made one in Christ, in whom there is no difference, Rom. x. 12.

CHAP. XLVIII

Particular directions given for the distribution of the land. I. The portions of the twelve tribes, seven to the north of the sanctuary (ver. 1–7) and five to the south, ver. 23–29. II. The allotment of land for the sanctuary, and the priests (ver. 8–11), for the Levites (ver. 12–14), for the city (ver. 15–20), and for the prince, ver. 21, 22. III. A plan of the city, its gates, and the new name given to it (ver. 30–35), which concludes the vision and prophecy of this book.

Verses 1–30

A short way taken for the dividing of the land among the twelve tribes. In this distribution of the land we may observe, 1. That it differs very much from the division of it in Joshua's time. It is not so much to be understood literally as spiritually, though the mystery of it is very much hidden from us. The Israel of God is cast into a new method. 2. That the tribe of Dan, which was last provided for in the first division of Canaan (Joshua xix. 40), is first provided for here, v. 1. God, in the dispensation of his grace, does not follow the same method that he does in the disposals of his providence. 3. That all the ten tribes that were carried away by the king of Assyria, as well as the two tribes that were long afterwards carried to Babylon, have their allotment in this visionary land. We believe it has its designed accomplishment in the establishment and enlargement of the gospel church, and in the sure and sweet enjoyment of the privileges of the new covenant, in which there is enough for all and enough for each. 4. That every tribe in this visionary distribution had its particular lot assigned it by a divine appointment. We must not only acknowledge, but acquiesce, in the hand of God appointing us our lot, and be well pleased with it, believing it fittest for us. He shall choose our inheritance for us, Ps. xlvii. 4. 5. That the tribes lay contiguous. By the border of one tribe was the portion of another. It was a figure of the communion of churches and saints under the gospel-government; thus, though they are many, yet they are one, and should hold together in holy love and mutual assistance. 6. That the lot of Reuben, which before lay at a distance beyond Jordan, now lies next to Judah, and next but one to the sanctuary; for the scandal he lay under, for which he was told he should not excel, began by this time to wear off. 7. That the sanctuary was in the midst of them. There were seven tribes to the north of it, and the Levites, the princes, and the city's portion, with that of five tribes more, to the south of it; so that it was, as it ought to be, in the heart of the kingdom. 8. That where the sanctuary was the priests were: For them, even for the priests, shall this holy oblation be, v. 10. 9. Those priests had the priests' share of these lands that had approved themselves faithful to God in times of trial (v. 11): It shall be for the sons of Zadok, who, it seems, had signalized themselves in some critical juncture, and went not astray when the children of Israel, and the other Levites, went astray. 10. The land which was appropriated to the ministers of the sanctuary might by no means be alienated. They might not sell it nor exchange it, v. 14. It is sacrilege to convert that to other uses which is dedicated to God. 11. The land allotted for the city and its suburbs is called a profane place (v. 15), or common. In comparison with the sanctuary, it was a profane place. 12. The city is made to be exactly square, and the suburbs extending themselves equally on all sides, as the Levites' cities did in the first division of the land (v. 16, 17), which, never being literally fulfilled in any city, intimates that it is to be understood spiritually of the beauty and stability of the gospel church, that city of the living God. 13. Whereas, before, the inhabitants of Jerusalem were principally of Judah and Benjamin, in whose tribe it lay, now those that serve the city, and bear office in it, shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel, v. 19. 14. Those who applied themselves to public business in the city, as well as in the sanctuary, should have an honourable comfortable maintenance; lands are appointed, the increase whereof shall be food unto those that serve the city, v. 18. 15. The prince had a lot for himself, suited to the dignity of his high station (v. 21). 16. As Judah had his lot next the sanctuary on one side, so Benjamin had, of all the tribes, his lot nearest to it on the other side, which honour was reserved for those who adhered to the house of David and the temple at Jerusalem when the other ten tribes went astray from both.

Verses 31–35

A further account of the city that should be built for those who should come to worship in the sanctuary adjoining. It is nowhere called Jerusalem, nor is the land called Canaan; old things are done away, behold all things have become new. Concerning this city, 1. The measures of its out-lets and the grounds, v. 35. But what these measures were is uncertain. These things are to be understood spiritually. 2. The number of its gates. It had twelve gates in all, three on each side, inscribed to the twelve tribes. In St. John's vision, the new Jerusalem has twelve gates, three on a side, and on them are written the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, Rev. xxi. 12, 13. Into the church of Christ, there is a free access by faith for all that come of every tribe, from every quarter. Christ has opened the kingdom of heaven for all believers. 3. The name given to this city: it shall be, not, as before, Jerusalem—The vision of peace, but, which is the original of that, Jehovah Shammah—The Lord is there, v. 35. This intimated, (1) That the captives, after their return, should have manifest tokens of God's presence with them and his residence among them. (2) That the gospel-church should likewise have the presence of God in it, though not in the Shechinah, as of old, yet in a token of it no less sure, that of his Spirit. Lo, I am with you always even unto the end of the world. Whatever soul has in it a living principle of grace, it may be truly said, The Lord is there. (3) That the glory and happiness of heaven should consist chiefly in this, that the Lord is there.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET DANIEL

The book of Ezekiel left Jerusalem all in ruins, but with a joyful prospect of all in glory again. This of Daniel fitly follows. Ezekiel told us what was seen, and what was foreseen, by him in the former years of the captivity: Daniel tells us what was seen, and foreseen, in the latter years of the captivity. And it was a comfort to the captives that they had first one prophet and then another, to show them that God had not quite cast them off. I. Concerning this prophet. His Hebrew name was Daniel, which signifies the judgment of God; his Chaldean name was Belteshazzar. He was of the tribe of Judah, and of the royal family, eminent for wisdom and piety. Ezekiel, his senior, speaks of him as an oracle when he upbraids the king of Tyre with his conceit: Thou art wiser than Daniel, Ezek. xxviii. 3. Noah, Daniel, and Job are reckoned as three men that had the greatest interest in heaven, Ezek. xiv. 14. Some of the Jewish rabbin rank his book among the Hagiographa, not among the prophecies. One reason is because he did not live such a mortified life as Jeremiah and other prophets, but lived like a prince, and was a prime-minister; whereas we find him persecuted as other prophets (ch. vi), and mortifying himself as other prophets did, when he ate no pleasant bread (ch. x. 3), and fainting and sick when he was under the power of the Spirit of prophecy, ch. viii. 27. Another reason they suggest is because he wrote his book in a heathen country, and there had his visions, and not in the land of Israel; but, for the same reason, Ezekiel also would be expunged out of the roll of prophets. But the true reason is that he speaks so plainly of the time of the Messiah's coming that the Jews do not care to hear of it. Josephus calls him one of the greatest of the prophets. He lived an active life in the courts and councils of some of the greatest monarchs, Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Darius. The Spirit, as the wind, blows where it lists. And, if those that have much to do in the world plead that as an excuse for the slightness of their converse with God, Daniel will condemn them. II. Concerning this book. The first six chapters of it are historical, and are plain and easy; the last six are prophetical, and in them are many things hard to be understood, which would be more intelligible if we had a more complete history of the Jewish nation, from Daniel's time to the coming of the Messiah. The first chapter, and the first three verses of the second chapter, are in Hebrew; thence to the eighth chapter is in the Chaldee dialect; and thence to the end is in Hebrew. Mr. Broughton observes that, as the Chaldeans were kind to Daniel, and gave cups of cold water to him when he requested it, rather than the king's wine, God would not have them lose their reward, but made that language to have honour in his writings. Daniel, according to his computation, continues the holy story from the first surprising of Jerusalem by the Chaldean Babel, when he himself was carried away captive, until the last destruction of it by Rome, the mystical Babel, ch. ix. 27. The fables of Susannah, and of Bel and the Dragon are apocryphal stories being found only in the Greek, nor ever admitted by the Jewish church. There are some of the histories and prophecies of this book that bear date in the latter end of the Chaldean monarchy, and others that are dated in the beginning of the Persian monarchy. But both Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which Daniel interpreted, and his own visions, point at the Grecian and Roman monarchies, and particularly at the Jews' troubles under Antiochus.

CHAP. I

The beginning of Daniel's life. Daniel began with the study of human learning, and afterwards came divine visions. I. Jehoiakim's first captivity (ver. 1, 2), in which Daniel, with others of the seed-royal, was carried to Babylon. II. The choice made of Daniel, and some other young men, to be brought up in the Chaldean literature, that they might be fitted to serve the government, ver. 3–7. III. Their pious refusal to eat the king's meat, and their determining to live upon pulse and water, which the master of the eunuchs allowed them to do, finding that it agreed very well with them, ver 8–16. IV. Their wonderful improvement, above all their fellows, in wisdom and knowledge, ver. 17–21.

Verses 1–7

I. The first descent which Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, made upon Judah and Jerusalem, in the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim (v. 1, 2): He besieged Jerusalem, made himself master of it, seized the king, took whom he pleased and what he pleased, and then left Jehoiakim to reign as tributary to him.

II. He did not destroy the city or kingdom, but accomplished the first threatening of mischief by Babylon made when Hezekiah showed his treasures to the king of Babylon's ambassadors (Isa. xxxix. 6, 7). The vessels of the sanctuary were carried away, v. 2. Many of the holy vessels were taken away by the king of Babylon and brought to the house of his god, to whom, with a blind devotion, he gave the praise of his success. See the righteousness of God; his people had brought the images of other gods into his temple, and now he suffers the vessels of the temple to be carried into the treasuries of those other gods. It was only part of them that went now; some were left, to see if they would take the right course to prevent the carrying away of the remainder. See Jer. xxvii. 18. The children and young men, especially such as were of noble or royal extraction, sightly and promising, were carried away. These were taken away by Nebuchadnezzar as hostages for the fidelity of their parents in their own land. He took them away to train them up for employment and preferment. The directions which the king of Babylon gave for the choice of these youths, v. 4. They must not choose such as were deformed in body, but comely and well-favoured, skilful in all wisdom, and cunning, or well-seen in knowledge, and understanding science. He chose such as were young, because they would be tractable, would forget their own people and become Chaldeans. They must be such as had ability to stand in the king's palace, and to preside in his affairs. The care which he took concerning their education. They should be taught the learning and tongue of the Chaldeans. They must be trained in such learning as might qualify them to serve their generation. They had daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank, v. 5. This was an instance of his generosity and humanity. With a liberal education there should be a liberal maintenance.

III. Daniel and his fellows were of the children of Judah, the royal tribe, and probably of the house of David. The prince of the eunuchs changed the names of Daniel and his fellows, in token of their being naturalized and made Chaldeans. Their Hebrew names, which they received at their circumcision, had something of God, or Jah, in them: Daniel—God is my Judge; Hananiah—The grace of the Lord; Mishael—He that is the strong God; Azariah—The Lord is a help. To make them forget the God of their fathers, the guide of their youth, they give them names that savour of the Chaldean idolatry. Belteshazzar signifies the keeper of the hidden treasures of Bel; Shadrach—The inspiration of the sun, which the Chaldeans worshipped; Meshach—Of the goddess Shach, under which name Venus was worshipped; Abed-nego, The servant of the shining fire, which they worshipped also.

Verses 8–16

I. Daniel was a favourite with the prince of the eunuchs (v. 9), as Joseph was with the keeper of the prison.

II. Daniel was still firm to his religion. They had changed his name, but they could not change his nature. Whatever they pleased to call him, he still retained the spirit of an Israelite indeed. He was resolved that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king's meat, he would not meddle with it, nor with the wine which he drank, v. 8. His fellows concurred in the same resolution, v. 11. This was from a principle of conscience. It was not in itself unlawful for them to eat of the king's meat or to drink of his wine. But, 1. They were scrupulous concerning the meat, lest it should be sinful. Sometimes such meat would be set before them as was forbidden by their law, as swine's flesh; or they were afraid lest it should have been offered in sacrifice to an idol, or blessed in the name of an idol. The Jews were distinguished from other nations very much by their meats (Lev. xi. 45, 46). If the command be against it, they must abide by that. 2. They were jealous lest, though it should not be sinful in itself, it should be an occasion of sin to them. 3. Jerusalem was in distress, and they themselves were in captivity. They had no heart to drink wine in bowls, so much were they grieved for the affliction of Joseph.

III. When Daniel requested that he might have none of the king's meat or wine, the prince of the eunuchs objected that, if he and his fellows were not in as good case as their companions, he would be in danger of losing his head, v. 10. Daniel desires the matter might be put to a trial. He applies to the under-officer, Melzar: "Prove us for ten days; let us have nothing but pulse to eat, nothing but herbs and fruits, parched peas or lentils, and nothing but water to drink, and see how we can live upon that," v. 13. Trial was accordingly made. Daniel and his fellows lived for ten days upon pulse and water. At the end of the ten days they were found fairer and fatter in flesh than all those who did eat the portion of the king's meat, v. 15. This was in part a natural effect of their temperance, but it must be ascribed to the special blessing of God, which will make a little to go a great way.

IV. The steward did not force them to eat against their consciences, but, as they desired, gave them pulse and water (v. 16). This abstemiousness fitted them for their eminent services. Hereby they kept their minds clear and unclouded. Those that had thus inured themselves to hardship, and lived a life of self-denial, could the more easily venture upon the fiery furnace and the den of lions.

The great learning which God gave Daniel and his fellows was, 1. A balance for their losses. They had, for the iniquity of their fathers, been deprived of honours and pleasures, but to make them amends for that, God, in giving them learning, gave them better honours and pleasures. 2. A recompence for their integrity. They kept to their religion, even in the minutest instances. God rewarded them. To Daniel he gave a double portion; he had understanding in visions and dreams by a divine sagacity and wisdom which God gave him. After three years spent in their education they were presented to the king, v. 18. And the king examined them and communed with them himself, v. 19. The king examined them in all matters of wisdom and understanding, and found that they had more understanding than the ancients. He freely owned that, upon trial, he found those poor young captive Jews wiser and better than all the magicians that were in all his realm, v. 20. These four young students were ten times better than all the old practitioners. This judgment being given, they stood before the king (v. 19).

CHAP. II

This chapter is the history of a prophecy, by a dream and the interpretation of it. Nebuchadnezzar's dream, and Daniel's interpretation, look to the four monarchies, and the concerns of Israel in them, and the kingdom of the Messiah, which should be set up in the world upon the ruins of them. I. The great perplexity that Nebuchadnezzar was put into by a dream, and his command to the magicians to tell him what it was, ver. 1–11. II. Orders given for the destroying of all the wise men of Babylon, and of Daniel among the rest, with his fellows, ver. 12–15. III. The discovery of this secret to him, in answer to prayer, and the thanksgiving he offered up to God, ver. 16–23. IV. His admission to the king, and the discovery he made to him both of his dream and of the interpretation, ver. 24–45. V. The great honour which Nebuchadnezzar put upon Daniel, in recompence for this service, and the preferment of his companions with him, ver. 46–49.

There is difficulty in the date of this story; it is said to be in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, v. 1. Now Daniel was carried to Babylon in his first year, and, it should seem, he was three years under tutors before he was presented to the king, ch. i. 5. How then could this happen in the second year? Perhaps Daniel had been but one year at school. Some make it to be the second year after he began to reign alone, but the fifth or sixth year since he began to reign in partnership with his father. Some read it, and in the second year (the second after Daniel and his fellows stood before the king), in the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, or in his reign, this happened. It appears in Ezekiel, that Daniel was soon famous both for wisdom and prevalence in prayer. He came to be eminent for both these early in Nebuchadnezzar's reign.

I. The perplexity that Nebuchadnezzar was in by reason of a dream which he had forgotten (v. 1). There was something in the impression it made upon him which was evidence of its divine origin and its prophetic significance. Nebuchadnezzar was a troubler of God's Israel, but God here troubled him. All the treasures and delights which this mighty monarch had could not procure him a little repose, when by reason of the trouble of his mind his sleep broke from him.

II. The trial that he made of his magicians and astrologers. They were immediately sent for, to show the king his dreams, v. 2. His dream had slipped out of his mind, and he could not possibly recollect it. The magicians were proud of being sent for into the king's bed-chamber. He tells them that he had dreamed a dream, v. 3. They desired him to tell his dream, and undertook with all possible assurance to interpret it, v. 4. But the king insisted that they must tell him the dream. And, if they could not do this, they should all be put to death as deceivers (v. 5), themselves cut to pieces and their houses made a dunghill. If they could, they should be rewarded, v. 6. The magicians insist that the king must tell them the dream, and then, if they do not tell him the interpretation of it, it is their fault, v. 7. But arbitrary power is deaf to reason. The king falls into a passion, gives them hard words, and charges them with trying to affront him: You have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me. He tells them that they did but dally with him, to gain time (v. 8), till the time be changed (v. 9), either till the king's desire to know his dream be over, or till they may hope he has so perfectly forgotten his dream that they may tell him what they please. And therefore, without delay, they must tell him the dream. In vain do they plead, 1. That there is no man on earth that can retrieve the king's dream, v. 10. They acknowledge that the gods may indeed declare unto man what is his thought (Amos iv. 13). But those who can do this are gods (v. 11), and it is they alone that can do this. See here an instance of the ignorance of these magicians, that they speak of many gods, whereas there is but one and can be but one infinite; yet see their knowledge that there is a God, who is a Spirit, and perfectly knows the spirits of men and all their thoughts. 2. That there is no king on earth that would expect or require such a thing, v. 10.

III. The doom passed upon all the magicians of Babylon. There is but one decree for them all (v. 9). They must every man of them be slain (v. 13), Daniel and his fellows (though they knew nothing of the matter) not excepted. Nebuchadnezzar is here a tyrant in true colours, speaking death when he cannot speak sense.

Verses 14–23

When the king sent for his wise men to tell them his dream (v. 2), Daniel was not summoned to appear. How miserable is the case of those who live under an arbitrary government, as this of Nebuchadnezzar's! Daniel was famous both for prudence and prayer; as a prince he had power with God and man; by prayer he had power with God, by prudence he had power with man, and in both he prevailed. In these verses we have a remarkable instance of both.

I. Daniel by prudence knew how to deal with men. When Arioch, the captain of the guard, appointed to slay all the wise men of Babylon, seized Daniel, he answered with counsel and wisdom (v. 14); he did not fall into a passion, but mildly asked, Why is the decree so hasty? v. 15. Daniel undertakes, if he may but have a little time to give the king all the satisfaction he desired, v. 16.

II. Daniel knew how by prayer to converse with God.

1. His humble petition that God would discover to him what was the king's dream, and the interpretation of it. He went to his house to be alone with his God, for from him alone, the Father of lights, he expected this great gift. He engaged his companions to pray for it too, v. 17, 18. St. Paul often entreats his friends to pray for him. Thus we must show that we put a value upon our friends, upon their prayers. He was particular in this prayer: That they would desire mercies of the God of heaven concerning this secret, v. 18. Whatever is the matter of our care must be the matter of our prayer; we must desire mercy of God concerning this thing and the other thing that occasions us trouble and fear. God gives us leave to be humbly free with him. We may in faith pray to him who has all hearts in his hand, and who in his providence does wonders, for the discovery of that which is out of our view and the obtaining of that which is out of our reach. The mercy which Daniel and his fellows prayed for was bestowed. The secret was revealed unto Daniel in a night-vision, v. 19. Some think he dreamed the same dream, when he was asleep, that Nebuchadnezzar had dreamed.

2. His grateful thanksgiving for this mercy, v. 19. As he had prayed in a full assurance that God would do this for him, so he gave thanks in a full assurance that he had done it. Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever. There is that for ever in God which is to be blessed and praised; it is unchangeably and eternally in him. His companions were present with Daniel when the discovery was made, or as soon as he knew it he told them that those who had assisted him with their prayers might assist him in their praises; his joining them with him is an instance of his humility. Thus St. Paul sometimes joins Sylvanus, Timotheus, or some other minister, with himself in the inscriptions to many of his epistles.

Verses 24–30

The introduction to Daniel's declaring the dream, and the interpretation of it.

I. He immediately bespoke the reversing of the sentence against the wise men of Babylon, v. 24. He went with all speed to Arioch: Destroy not the wise men of Babylon.

II. He offered his service, with great assurance, to go to the king, and tell him his dream and the interpretation of it, v. 24, 25.

III. He contrived to give honour to God, upon this occasion. The king owned that it was a bold undertaking (v. 26): Art thou able to make known unto me the dream? The less likely it appeared to the king that Daniel should do this the more God was glorified in enabling him to do it. Daniel puts the king out of conceit with his soothsayers (v. 27): "This secret they cannot show to the king. Therefore let not the king be angry with them for not doing that which they cannot do; but rather cast them off, because they cannot do it. Though they cannot find out the secret, let not the king despair of having it found out, for there is a God in heaven that reveals secrets," v. 28.

IV. He confirmed the king in his opinion that the dream was of great value. It was a divine discovery, a ray of light darted into his mind from the upper world, relating to the great affairs of this lower world. God in it made known to the king what should be in the latter days (v. 28). Some think that the thoughts which are said to have come into the king's mind upon his bed, what should come to pass hereafter, were his own thoughts when he was awake. Just before he fell asleep he was musing what would be the issue of his growing greatness, what his kingdom would herafter come to; and so the dream was an answer to those thoughts.

V. He solemnly professes that he could not pretend to have merited from God the favour of this discovery (v. 30): "But, as for me, this secret is not found out by me, but is revealed to me, and that not for any wisdom that I have to qualify me for the receiving of such a discovery." The secret was made known to him for the sake of his people, his brethren and companions in tribulation. God revealed this thing to Daniel that he might make it known to the king. Prophets receive that they may give, that the discoveries made to them may be communicated to the persons that are concerned.

Verses 31–45

Daniel here gives full satisfaction to Nebuchadnezzar concerning his dream and the interpretation. And now the king is abundantly repaid, and for receiving this prophet, though not in the name of a prophet, he had a prophet's reward.

I. The dream itself, v. 31, 45. Nebuchadnezzar was a worshipper of images, and now behold a great image is set before him in a dream. This was the image of a man erect: It stood before him, as a living man; and, because those monarchies represented by it were admirable in the eyes of their friends, the brightness of this image was excellent; and because they were formidable to their enemies, the form of this image is said to be terrible; both the features of the face and the postures of the body made it so. But that which was most remarkable was the different metals of which it was composed—the head of gold (the richest and most durable metal), the breast and arms of silver (the next to it in worth), the belly and sides (or thighs) of brass, the legs of iron (still baser metals), and lastly the feet part of iron and part of clay. See what the things of this world are; the further we go in them the less valuable they appear. Some observe that in Daniel's visions the monarchies were represented by four beasts (ch. vii), for he looked upon that wisdom from beneath, to be earthly, and a tyrannical power, to have more in it of the beast than of the man. But to Nebuchadnezzar, a heathen prince, they were represented by a gay and pompous image of a man, for he was an admirer of the kingdoms of this world and the glory of them. But what became of this image? The next part of the dream shows it calcined, and brought to nothing. He saw a stone cut out of the quarry by an unseen power, and this stone fell upon the feet of the image, that were of iron and clay, and broke them to pieces; and then the image must fall and the gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, were all broken to pieces, beaten so small that they became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors: but the stone cut out of the mountain became itself a great mountain, and filled the earth.

II. The interpretation of this dream.

1. This image represented the kingdoms of the earth that should successively bear rule among the nations and have influence on the affairs of the Jewish church. The four monarchies were not represented by four distinct statues, but by one image, because they were all of one and the same spirit, and all more or less against the church. It was the same power, only lodged in four different nations. (1) The head of gold signified the Chaldean monarchy, which was now in being (v. 37, 38): Thou art the highest of kings on earth at this time. It is the God of heaven that has given thee a kingdom, power, and strength, and glory, a kingdom that exercises great authority, stands firmly. The extent of his dominion is set forth (v. 38), that wheresoever the children of men dwell in all the nations of that part of the world, he was ruler over them all. Thus "thou art the head of gold; thou, and thy son, and thy son's son, for seventy years." Compare this with Jer. xxv. 9, 11, especially Jer. xxvii. 5–7. There were other powerful kingdoms in the world at this time, as that of the Scythians; but it was the kingdom of Babylon that reigned over the Jews. It is called a head, for its wisdom, and absolute power, a head of gold for its wealth (Isa. xiv. 4). Some make this monarchy to begin in Nimrod, and so bring into it all the Assyrian kings. But it had not been so long a monarchy of such vast extent, therefore others make only Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-merodach, and Belshazzar, to belong to this head of gold. (2) The breast and arms of silver signified the monarchy of the Medes and Persians. There shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee (v. 39), not so rich, powerful, or victorious. This kingdom was founded by Darius the Mede and Cyrus the Persian, in alliance and therefore represented by two arms. Cyrus was himself a Persian by his father, a Mede by his mother. (3) The belly and thighs of brass signified the monarchy of the Grecians, founded by Alexander, who conquered Darius, the last of the Persian emperors. This is the third kingdom, of brass, inferior in wealth and extent to the Persian monarchy, but in Alexander himself it shall by the power of the sword bear rule over all the earth; for Alexander boasted that he had conquered the world. (4) The legs and feet of iron signified the Roman monarchy. It was in the time of that monarchy, when it was at its height, that the kingdom of Christ was set up in the world by the preaching of the everlasting gospel. The Roman kingdom strong as iron (v. 40), broke in pieces the Grecian empire and afterwards destroyed the nation of the Jews. Towards the latter end of the Roman monarchy it grew weak, and branched into ten kingdoms, which were as the toes of these feet. Some of these were weak as clay, others strong as iron, v. 42. They shall not cleave one to another, v. 43. This empire divided the government for a long time between the senate and the people, the nobles and the commons, but they did not coalesce. There were civil wars between Marius and Sulla, Caesar and Pompey, whose parties were as iron and clay.

2. The stone cut out without hands represented the kingdom of Jesus Christ, for it should be neither raised nor supported by human power or policy. (1) The gospel-church is a kingdom not of this world, and yet set up in it; it is the kingdom of God among men. (2) The God of heaven was to set up this kingdom, to give authority to Christ, to set him as King upon his holy hill of Zion. It is often in the New Testament called the kingdom of heaven, for its origin is from above and its tendency is upwards. (3) It was to be set up in the days of these kings, the kings of the fourth monarchy, of which particular notice is taken (Luke ii. 1). When these kings are contesting with each other, God will do his own work and fulfil his own counsels. (4) It is a kingdom that knows no decay, and will not admit any succession or revolution. As Christ is a monarch that has no successor (for he himself shall reign for ever), so his kingdom is a monarchy that has no revolution. The kingdom of God was indeed taken from the Jews and given to the Gentiles (Matt. xxi. 43), but still it was Christianity that ruled, the kingdom of the Messiah. (5) It is a kingdom that shall be victorious. It shall break in pieces and consume all those kingdoms, as the stone cut out of the mountain without hands broke in pieces the image, v. 44, 45. And in the kingdoms that submit to the kingdom of Christ tyranny, and idolatry, and everything that is their reproach, shall, as far as the gospel of Christ gets ground, be broken. Our Saviour seems to refer to this (Matt. xxi. 44) when he says, On whomsoever this stone shall fall, it will grind him to powder. (6) It shall be an everlasting kingdom. The Lord shall reign for ever, not only to the end of time, but when time and days shall be no more, and God shall be all in all to eternity.

III. Daniel having thus interpreted the dream, to the satisfaction of Nebuchadnezzar, closes with a solemn assertion, 1. Of the divine origin of this dream: The great God has made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter, which the gods of the magicians could not do. 2. Of the undoubted certainty of the things foretold by this dream. Whatever God has made known we may depend upon.

Instead of resenting it as an affront, the king received it as an oracle, and here we are told what the expressions were of the impressions it made upon him. 1. He was ready to look upon Daniel as a little god. He concluded that he had certainly a divinity lodged in him, worthy his adoration; and therefore he fell upon his face and worshipped Daniel, v. 46. Thus did God magnify divine revelation and make it honourable. And that Daniel did say something to him which turned his eyes and thoughts another way is intimated in what follows (v. 47), The king answered Daniel. 2. He readily acknowledged the God of Daniel to be the great God. If Daniel will not suffer himself to be worshipped, he will worship God, by confessing (v. 47), Of a truth your God is a God of gods, over all gods in dominion. 3. He preferred Daniel, made him a great man, v. 48. The king gave him many great gifts. He made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, he made him chancellor of the university, chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. 4. He preferred his companions for his sake, and upon his request, v. 49. Daniel himself sat in the gate of the king, and procured places in the government for Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. And these pious Jews, being thus preferred in Babylon, had opportunity of serving their brethren in captivity.

CHAP. III

Here we have those same three men as much under the king's displeasure as then they were in his favour, and yet more highly honoured by their God than there they were honoured by their prince, by the grace wherewith he enabled them rather to suffer than to sin. It is a memorable story and a great encouragement to the constancy of his people in trying times. The apostle mentions, among the believing heroes, those who by faith "quenched the violence of fire", Heb. xi. 34. I. Nebuchadnezzar's erecting a golden image, and his requiring all his subjects to fall down and worship it, and the general compliance of his people with that command, ver. 1–7. II. Information given against the Jewish princes for refusing to worship this golden image, ver. 8–12. III. Their constant persisting in that refusal, notwithstanding his menaces, ver. 13–18. IV. The casting of them into the fiery furnace for their refusal, ver. 19–23. V. Their miraculous preservation by the power of God, and their invitation out of the fire by the king, who was by this miracle convinced of his error in casting them in, ver. 24–27. VI. The honour which the king gave to God hereupon, and the favour he showed to those faithful men, ver. 28–30.

Verses 1–7

I. A golden image set up to be worshipped. Babylon was full of idols, but those who have forsaken the one only living God, and begin to set up many gods, will find the gods they set up so unsatisfying, that they will multiply them without measure. It was an image of gold. It was threescore cubits high and six cubits broad, as if its being monstrous would make amends for its being lifeless. Perhaps he set it up as an image of himself, and designed to be himself worshipped in it. The good impressions made upon him were quite lost, and quickly. He had acknowledged that the God of Israel is a God of gods and a Lord of kings; yet now, in defiance of the express law of that God, he sets up an image to be worshipped. The very dream and the interpretation of it, which made such good impressions upon him, now had a quite contrary effect. Now it made him set up for a bold competitor with God.

II. The states summoned to attend the dedication of this image, v. 2, 3. Long journeys many took upon a foolish errand; but, as the idols are senseless things, such are the worshippers.

III. A proclamation made, commanding all persons present to fall down and worship the image.

IV. The general compliance of the assembly with this command, v. 7. It was proclaimed, That whosoever would not worship this golden image should be immediately thrown into the midst of a burning fiery furnace, ready prepared for that purpose, v. 6.

Verses 8–18

It was strange that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, would be present at this assembly. Surely because they would obey the king's orders and be ready to bear a public testimony against this gross idolatry.

I. Information is brought to the king by certain Chaldeans against these three, v. 8. Perhaps these that accused them were some of those magicians or astrologers that were particularly called Chaldeans (ch. ii. 2, 4). Perhaps they were such of the Chaldeans as envied them their preferments; and who can stand before envy? They appeal to the king, 1. To put him in mind of the law he had lately made, That all manner of persons, without exception of nation or language, should fall down and worship this golden image, v. 10, 11. 2. To inform him that these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, had not conformed to this edict, v. 12. To incense the king the more against them, (1) They put him in mind of the dignity to which the criminals had been preferred. It was therefore an insufferable piece of insolence, for them to disobey the king's command. The high station they were in would make their refusal the more scandalous. (2) They suggest that it was done in contempt of him and his authority.

II. These three pious Jews are brought before the king, and examined upon this information. Nebuchadnezzar fell into a great passion, and in his rage and fury commanded them to be seized, v. 13.

III. The king asked them whether it was true that they had not worshipped the golden image when others did, v. 14. It may be, upon second thoughts, they will change their minds. The king is willing that if they will worship the golden image, well and good; their former omission shall be pardoned. The king is resolved, if they persist in their refusal, that they shall immediately be cast into the fiery furnace. Turn, or burn; and, because he knew they buoyed themselves up in their refusal with a confidence in their God, he set him at defiance: "And who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands? Let him, if he can."

IV. They answer that they still adhere to their resolution not to worship the golden image, v. 16–18. We call these the three children (they were indeed young men), but we should rather call them the three champions, the first three of the worthies of God's kingdom among men. They did not go out of their way to court martyrdom; but, when they were duly called to the fiery trial, they acquitted themselves bravely.

1. Their contempt of death, and the noble negligence with which they look upon the dilemma: O Nebuchadnezzar! we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. They do not in sullenness deny him an answer, but they tell him that they are in no care about it. They needed no time to deliberate concerning their answer; for they did not hesitate whether they should comply or no. But the sin and duty in the case were determined by the letter of the second commandment, and no room was left to question what was right. They were not contriving an evasive answer, when a direct answer was expected from them.

2. Their confidence in God and their dependence upon him, v. 17. They trusted in the living God, and by that faith chose rather to suffer than to sin. "If we must be thrown into the fiery furnace unless we serve thy gods, know then, though we worship not thy gods yet we are not atheists; there is a God whom we call ours. We serve this God. We are well assured that this God is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace. If he do not deliver us from the fiery furnace, he will deliver us out of thy hand." Nebuchadnezzar can but torment and kill the body, and, after that, there is no more than he can do. God will deliver us either from death or in death.

3. Their firm resolution to adhere to their principles, whatever might be the consequence (v. 18). They were not required to abjure their own God, or to renounce his worship. It was but one single act that was required of them, which would be done in a minute, and they might afterwards declare their sorrow for it. They might be excused if they should go down the stream, when it is so strong. Did not all the ten tribes, for many ages, worship gods of gold at Dan and Bethel? If they should comply, they would save their lives and so be in a capacity to do a great deal of service to their brethren. But there is enough in that one word of God wherewith to answer and silence these and many more such like carnal reasonings: Thou shalt not bow down thyself to any images, nor worship them. They must rather suffer than sin, and must not do evil that good may come. And truly, the saving of them from this sinful compliance was as great a miracle as the saving of them out of the fiery furnace.

Verses 19–27

I. The casting of these three faithful servants of God into the fiery furnace. Nebuchadnezzar, instead of being convinced by what they said, was exasperated, and made more outrageous, v. 19. It made him full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed against these men. Nebuchadnezzar, in this heat, exchanged the awful majesty of a prince for the frightful fury of a wild bull in a net. Instead of mitigating their punishment, he ordered it to be heightened, that they should heat the furnace seven times more than it was wont to be heated for other malefactors. He ordered them to be bound in their clothes, and cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace, which was done accordingly, v. 20, 21. God's providence ordered it for the increase of the miracle, in that their clothes were not so much as singed. The men that bound them, and threw them into the furnace, were themselves consumed or suffocated by the flame, v. 22. But these men were only the instruments of cruelty; he that bade them do it had the greater sin. Nebuchadnezzar himself was reserved for a further reckoning.

II. The deliverance of these three faithful servants of God out of the furnace.

1. Nebuchadnezzar finds them walking in the fire. He was astonished, and rose up in haste, v. 24. In his astonishment he calls his counsellors. Did we not cast three men bound into the fire? "True, O king!" say they. "But now," says the king, "I have been looking into the furnace, and I see four men, loose, walking in the midst of the fire," v. 25. They were loosed from their bonds. The fire that did not so much as singe their clothes burnt the cords wherewith they were bound, and set them at liberty. They walked in the midst of the fire. The furnace was large, so that they had room to walk; they were unhurt, so that they were able to walk; their minds were easy, so that they were disposed to walk, as in a paradise or garden of pleasure. There was a fourth seen with them in the fire, whose form, in Nebuchadnezzar's judgment, was like the Son of God; he appeared as a divine person, a messenger from heaven, not as a servant, but as a son. In the apocryphal narrative of this story it is said, The angel of the Lord came down into the furnace; and Nebuchadnezzar here says (v. 28), God sent his angel and delivered them; and it was an angel that shut the lions' mouths when Daniel was in the den, ch. vi. 22. But some think it was the eternal Son of God. Those that suffer for Christ have his gracious presence with them in their sufferings, even in the fiery furnace, even in the valley of the shadow of death, and therefore even there they need fear no evil.

2. Nebuchadnezzar calls them out of the furnace (v. 26): He comes near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace, and bids them come forth and come hither. He is convinced by their miraculous preservation that he did evil in casting them into the furnace. The fourth, whose form was like the Son of God, withdrew, but the other three came forth out of the midst of the fire, as brands out of the burning. They had not received the least damage by the fire, v. 27. There was not so much as a hair of their head singed. Their clothes did not change colour, nor smell of fire, much less were their bodies scorched or blistered; no, the fire had no power on them. The Chaldeans worshipped the fire, as a sort of image of the sun, so that, in restraining the fire now, God put contempt, not only upon their king, but upon their god too.

Verses 28–30

The effect it had upon Nebuchadnezzar.

I. He gives glory to the God of Israel as a God able and ready to protect his worshippers (v. 28): Blessed be the God of Shradrach, Meshach, and Abednego. God can extort confessions of his blessedness even from those that have been ready to curse him to his face. 1. He gives him the glory of his power: There is no other God that can deliver after this sort (v. 29). If God can work such deliverance as no other can, he may demand such obedience as no other may. 2. He gives him the glory that he was ready to do it (v. 28): He has sent his angel and delivered his servants. Bel could not save his worshippers from being burnt at the mouth of the furnace, but the God of Israel saved his from being burnt when they were cast into the midst of the furnace because they refused to worship any other god.

II. He applauds the constancy of these three men in their religion, and describes it to their honour, v. 28. They yielded their own bodies to be cast into the fiery furnace rather than forsake their God. They changed the king's word, that is, they went contrary to it, and thereby made him repent. They did it with confidence in their God. They trusted that he would either bring them out of the fiery furnace on earth or lead them through the fiery furnace forward to their place in heaven; and in this confidence they became regardless of their own lives.

III. He issues a royal edict, strictly forbidding any to speak evil of the God of Israel, v. 29. The miracle now wrought by the power of this God in defence of his worshippers, publicly in the sight of the thousands of Babylon, was a sufficient justification of this edict. It is a great mercy to the church when its enemies, though they have not their hearts turned, yet have their mouths stopped and their tongues tied.

IV. He not only reverses the attainder of these three men, but restores them to their places in the government (makes them to prosper, so the word is).

CHAP. IV

The story here recorded concerning Nebuchadnezzar is given us in his own words. I. The preface to his narrative, wherein he acknowledges God's dominion over him, ver. 1–3. II. The narrative itself, wherein he relates, 1. His dream, ver. 1–18. 2. The interpretation of his dream by Daniel, who showed him his own fall, advising him to repent and reform, ver. 19–27. 3. The accomplishment of it in his running stark mad for seven years, and then recovering the use of his reason again, ver. 28–36. 4. The conclusion of the narrative, with a humble acknowledgment and adoration of God as Lord of all, ver. 37.

I. The form, which was usual in proclamations issued by the king, v. 1. The royal style is short, and unaffected—Nebuchadnezzar the king. The declaration is directed to all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth. He salutes those to whom he writes, in the usual form, Peace be multiplied unto you.

II. He writes this, 1. To acquaint others with the providences of God that had related to him (v. 2): I thought it good to show the signs and wonders that the high God (so he calls the true God) has wrought towards me. It was a debt he owed to God and the world, now that he had recovered from his distraction, to relate how justly God had humbled him and how graciously he had at length restored him. We ought to give glory to God, not only by praising him for his mercies, but by confessing our sins, accepting the punishment of our iniquity. 2. To show how much he was himself convinced by them, v. 2. He admires God's doings. Nebuchadnezzar was now old, had reigned above forty years, and had seen much of the world and revolutions, yet never till now was he brought to admire God's signs and his wonders. Now, How great, how mighty, are they! He thence infers God's dominion. His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom; and not like his own kingdom, which he saw, in a dream, hastening towards a period. Other reigns are confined to one generation, and other dynasties to a few generations, but God's dominion is from generation to generation.

Nebuchadnezzar, before he relates the judgments of God wrought upon him for his pride, gives an account of the fair warning he had of them before they came.

I. This alarm was given to him (v. 4), when he was at rest in his house, and flourishing in his palace. He had lately conquered Egypt, and with it completed his victories, and ended his wars, about the thirty-fourth or thirty-fifth year of his reign, Ezek. xxix. 17. Then he had this dream, which was accomplished about a year after. Seven years of his distraction continued, upon his recovery from which he penned this declaration, lived about two years after, and died in his forty-fifth year.

II. The impression it made upon him (v. 5): I saw a dream which made me afraid. His thoughts upon his bed made him uneasy, and the visions of his head, the creatures of his own imagination, troubled him.

III. His consulting, in vain, with the magicians and astrologers. He had not now forgotten the dream, as before, ch. ii. He wanted to know the interpretation of it, v. 6. Orders are immediately given to summon all the wise men of Babylon to see if any could interpret the king's dream. His expectation from them was disappointed: He told them the dream (v. 7), but they could not tell him the interpretation of it, though they had boasted, with great assurance (ch. ii. 4, 7). Now was fulfilled what Isaiah foretold (ch. xlvii. 12, 13), that when the ruin of Babylon was drawing on her enchantments and sorceries, her astrologers and star-gazers, should not be able to do her any service.

IV. At the last Daniel came in, v. 8. Many make God's word their last refuge, and never have recourse to it till they are driven off from all other succours. He compliments Daniel very highly. He applauds his rare endowments: He has the spirit of the holy gods, so he tells him to his face (v. 9). Here is a strange medley in Nebuchadnezzar, but such as is common in those that side with their corruptions against their convictions. 1. He is an idolater, and his speech betrayeth him. He speaks of many gods. And some think, when he speaks of the spirit of the holy gods, that he supposes there are some evil malignant deities, and some who are good beneficent deities, and that by the spirit of the latter Daniel was animated. He also applauds Daniel, not as a servant of God, but as master of the magicians (v. 9). How loose his convictions sat, and how easily he had dropped them! He once called the God of Israel a God of gods, ch. ii. 47. Now he sets him upon a level with the rest of those whom he calls the holy gods. Nebuchadnezzar, not going forward with acknowledgments of the sovereignty of the true God, soon went backwards, yet professes a great opinion of Daniel, whom he knows to be a servant of the true God.

V. The account he gives him of his dream.

1. He saw a stately flourishing tree planted in the midst of the earth (v. 10), fitly representing him who reigned in Babylon, the midst of the then known world. His dignity was signified by the height of this tree, which was exceedingly great; it reached unto heaven. He over-topped those about him, and aimed to have divine honours given him. This tree had everything in it that was pleasant to the eye and good for food (v. 12): The leaves thereof were fair, denoting the pomp and splendour of Nebuchadnezzar's court. This tree was, (1) For protection; the boughs of it were for shelter. Princes should be a screen to their subjects from the heat and from the storm. (2) For provision. The Assyrian was compared to a cedar (Ezek. xxxi. 6), which affords shadow only; but this tree here had much fruit—in it was meat for all and all flesh was fed of it. This mighty monarch, it should seem by this, not only was great, but did good.

2. He heard the doom of this tree read. The sentence was passed upon it by an angel, whom he saw come down from heaven, and heard proclaim this sentence aloud. This angel is here called a watcher, or watchman. This angel was a messenger, or ambassador (so some read it), and a holy one.

(1) Orders are given that it be cut down (v. 14).

(2) Care is taken that the root be preserved (v. 15): "Leave the stump of it in the earth, exposed to all weathers. Let it be hooped round with a band of iron and brass, to keep it firm." God in judgment remembers mercy; and may yet have good things in store for those whose condition seems most forlorn. There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, that through the scent of water it will bud, Job xiv. 7–9.

(3) The meaning of this is explained by the angel himself to Nebuchadnezzar, v. 16. Whoever is the person signified by this tree he is sentenced to be deposed from the dignity of a man, to be deprived of his reason, and to live like a brute, till seven times pass over him. Let a beast's heart be given unto him. This is surely the saddest and sorest of all temporal judgments. Those proud tyrants who set their heart as the heart of God (Ezek. xxviii. 2) may justly be deprived of the heart of man, and have a beast's heart given them.

(4) The truth of it is confirmed (v. 17). The angels of heaven have subscribed to it. It is by the decree of the watchers. Such was Nebuchadnezzar's doom; it was by the decree of the watchers. The saints on earth petitioned for it, as well as the angels in heaven: The demand is by the word of the holy ones. God's suffering people, that had long groaned under the heavy yoke of Nebuchadnezzar's tyranny, made the demand, and God gave this answer to it.

(5) The design of it is declared. Orders are given for the cutting down of this tree, to the intent that the living may know that the Most High rules.

Thus has Nebuchadnezzar fully and faithfully related his dream, what he saw and what he heard, and now demands of Daniel the interpretation of it (v. 18).

Verses 19–27

The interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream; and when once it is declared that he is the tree in the dream, when once it is said, Thou art the man, there needs little more to be said for the explication of the dream. The thing was so plain that Daniel, upon hearing the dream, was astonished for one hour, v. 19. He was struck with amazement and terror at so great a judgment coming upon so great a prince. He was likewise struck with confusion when he found himself the man that must bring to the king these heavy tidings.

I. The king observed him stand as one astonished, and thinking he was loth to speak out for fear of offending him, encouraged him to deal plainly with him: Let not the dream, nor the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. This he speaks either, 1. As one that sincerely desired to know the truth. Or, 2. As one that despised the truth, and set it at defiance. Daniel is concerned for him, and therefore wishes, "The dream be to those that hate thee. Let the ill it bodes light on the head of thy enemies, not on thy head." Though Nebuchadnezzar was an oppressor of the people of God, yet he was, at present, Daniel's prince.

II. The interpretation itself is only a repetition of the dream, with application to the king. "As for the tree which thou sawest flourishing (v. 20, 21), it is thou, O king!" v. 22. He shows the king his present prosperous state in the glass of his own dream, ch. ii. 37, 38. "As for the doom passed upon the tree (v. 23), it is the decree of the Most High, which comes upon my lord the king," v. 24. He must be deposed from his throne, driven from men, and being deprived of his reason, and having a beast's heart given him, his dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field; he shall eat grass as oxen, and, like them, lie out all weathers, till seven times pass over him, that is, seven years; and then he shall know that the Most High rules, and when he is brought to know and own this he shall be restored to his dominion again (v. 26). God is here called the heavens, and the influence which the visible heavens have upon this earth is intended as a faint representation of the dominion the God of heaven has over this lower world; we are said to sin against heaven, Luke xv. 18.

III. The close of the interpretation which Daniel, as a prophet, gave the king, v. 27. 1. How humbly he gives his advice, and with what tenderness and respect: "O king! let my counsel be acceptable unto thee." 2. He does not counsel him to enter into a course of physic, for the preventing of the distemper, but to break off a course of sin. He wronged his own subjects, and dealt unfairly with his allies. He had been cruel to the poor. 3. The motive with which he backs this advice: If it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity.

Nebuchadnezzar's dream accomplished, and Daniel's application of it to him justified and confirmed.

I. God's patience with him: All this came upon him, but not till twelve months after (v. 29), so long there was a lengthening of his tranquillity, though it does not appear that he broke off his sins, or showed any mercy to the poor captives. God gave him space to repent; he let him alone this year also, this one year more.

II. His pride, and haughtiness, and abuse of that patience. He walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon, in pomp and pride. Everything in Babylon he thinks looks great; "and this great Babylon I have built." Babylon was built many ages before he was born, but he boasts that he has built it, as Augustus Caesar boasted concerning Rome, I found it brick, but I left it marble. He boasts that he built it for the house of the kingdom, the metropolis of his empire.

III. His punishment. The powerful word came from heaven, by which he was immediately deprived, 1. Of his honour as a king: The kingdom has departed from thee. 2. He is deprived of his honour as a man. He loses his reason, and by that means loses his dominion: They shall drive thee from men, v. 32. And it was fulfilled (v. 33): he was driven from men the same hour. On a sudden he fell stark mad. His understanding and memory were gone, and all the faculties of a rational soul broken. He went naked, and on all fours, like a brute, and ran wild into the fields and woods. He was made to eat grass as oxen. Nebuchadnezzar would be more than a man, and therefore God justly makes him less than a man, and puts him upon a level with the beasts who set up for a rival with his Maker. See Job xl. 11–13.

We have here Nebuchadnezzar's recovery from his distraction, and his return to his right mind, at the end of the days, that is, of the seven years. At the end of the days (says he), I lifted up my eyes unto heaven (v. 34), looked no longer down towards the earth as a beast, but began to look up as a man. But there was more in it than this; he looked up as a penitent, as a humble petitioner for mercy.

I. He has the use of his reason so far restored to him that with it he glorifies God, and humbles himself. Men never rightly use their reason till they begin to be religious, nor live as men till they live to the glory of God. His folly was the means whereby he became wise. To bring him to himself, he must first be beside himself. His flatterers often complimented him with, O king! live for ever. But he is now convinced that no king lives for ever, but the God of Israel only. God's kingdom is like himself, everlasting, and his dominion from generation to generation; there is no succession, no revolution, in his kingdom. All nations before him are as nothing. His power is irresistible, for he does according to his will. Everything which God does is well done: His works are truth, for they all agree with his word. His ways are judgment, both wise and righteous, consonant to the rules of prudence and equity. Those that walk in pride he is able to abase (v. 37).

II. He has the use of his reason restored to him (v. 36). He is now established in his kingdom as firmly as if there had been no interruption. Afflictions shall last no longer than till they have done the work for which they were sent. When Nebuchadnezzar is restored to his kingdom he praises, and extols, and honours the King of heaven (v. 37).

It was not long after this that Nebuchadnezzar ended his life and reign. Abydenus, quoted by Eusebius (Praep. Evang. i. 9), reports that upon his death-bed he foretold the taking of Babylon by Cyrus. Whether he continued in the same good mind that here he seems to have been in we are not told. If our charity may reach so far as to hope he did, we must admire free grace, by which he lost his wits for a while, that he might save his soul for ever.

CHAP. V

Belshazzar now reigned in Babylon; some compute he had reigned seventeen years, others but three. About two years before this Cyrus king of Persia, a growing monarch, came against Babylon with a great army; Belshazzar met him, fought him, and was routed by him in a pitched battle. He and his scattered forces retired into the city, where Cyrus besieged them. They were very secure, because the river Euphrates was their bulwark, and they had twenty years' provision in the city; but in the second year of the siege he took it. I. The riotous, idolatrous, sacrilegious feast which Belshazzar made, ver. 1–4. II. The alarm given him by a hand writing on the wall, which none of his wise men could read, ver. 5–9. III. The interpretation of the mystical characters by Daniel, who dealt plainly with him, and showed him his doom written, ver. 10–28. IV. The immediate accomplishment of the interpretation in the slaying of the king and seizing of the kingdom, ver. 30, 31.

Verses 1–9

Belshazzar the king very gay, but all of a sudden very gloomy. He affronts God, and God affrights him.

I. He made a great feast, or banquet of wine; probably it was some anniversary. Historians say that Cyrus, who was now besieging Babylon, knew of this feast, and presuming that they then would be off their guard, buried in sleep and wine, took that opportunity to attack the city, and so made himself master of it. Belshazzar invited a thousand of his lords to come and drink with him. In this sumptuous feast, 1. He bade defiance to God's judgments. His city was now besieged; his life and kingdom lay at stake. He should therefore have proclaimed a fast; but, as one resolved to walk contrary to God, he proclaims a feast. 2. He put an affront upon the temple of God, v. 2. While he tasted the wine, he commanded to bring the vessels of the temple, that they might drink in them. 3. He put an affront upon God himself, and bade defiance to his deity; for they drank wine, and praised the gods of gold and silver, v. 4.

II. How God affrighted the king, and struck a terror upon him. Belshazzar and his lords are in the midst of their revels, but the hour had come when that must be fulfilled which had been long ago said of the king of Babylon, Isa. xxi. 2–4. The night of my pleasures has he turned into fear to me. 1. There appear the fingers of a man's hand writing on the plaster of the wall, before the king's face (v. 5). Here was no destroying angel with his sword drawn—only a pen in the hand, writing upon the wall, over-against the candlestick, where they might all see it by the light of their own candle. The king saw the part of the hand that wrote, but saw not the person whose hand it was. What we see of God, the part of the hand that writes in the book of the scriptures, may serve to possess us with awful thoughts concerning that of God which we do not see. If this be the finger of God, what is his arm made bare? 2. The king is immediately seized with a panic (v. 6): His countenance was changed (his colour went and came); the joints of his loins were loosed, his knees smote one against another. Why is he in such a fright? His thoughts troubled him; his own guilty conscience told him that he had no reason to expect any good news from Heaven. God can soon make the heart of the stoutest sinner to tremble; and there needs no more than to let loose his own thoughts upon him. 3. The wise men of Babylon are called in, to see what they can make of this writing upon the wall, v. 7. Whoever will may read the mind of God in the scriptures. The king promised that whoever would give him a satisfactory account of this writing should be dignified with the highest honours. 4. The king is disappointed; they can none of them read the writing, much less interpret it (v. 8), which increases the king's confusion, v. 9.

Verses 10–29

I. The information given to the king, by the queen-mother, concerning Daniel, how fit he was to be consulted in this difficult case. It is supposed that this queen was the widow of Evil-Merodach, that famous Nitocris whom Herodotus mentions as a woman of extraordinary prudence. Tidings being brought to her apartment, she came herself to the banqueting-house, to recommend to the king a physician for his melancholy. She could not read the writing herself, but directed him to one that could; let Daniel be called now, who should have been called first. He is a man in whom is the spirit of the holy gods, who has something in him more than human. She speaks honourably of him as a man that had light, and understanding, and wisdom. It was evident he was divinely inspired; he had knowledge and understanding beyond all the other wise men for interpreting dreams. He had an admirably good heart: An excellent spirit was found in him. "The king thy father," that is, thy grandfather, "made him master of the magicians." He named him Belteshazzar, according to the name of his god, thinking thereby to put honour upon him. Let Daniel be called, and he will show the interpretation.

II. Daniel was brought in before the king, v. 13. The king asks, with an air of haughtiness: Art thou that Daniel who art of the children of the captivity? He acknowledges that all the wise men of Babylon were baffled; they could not read this writing, nor show the interpretation, v. 16. But he promises him the same rewards that he had promised them if he would do it, v. 16.

III. The interpretation which Daniel gave of these mystic characters, was far from easing the king of his fears. Daniel was now in years, and Belshazzar was young; and therefore he seems to take a greater liberty of dealing plainly and roundly with him than he had done upon the like occasions with Nebuchadnezzar.

1. He undertakes to read the writing which gave them this alarm, and to show them the interpretation of it, v. 17. He slights the offer of rewards, for he is not one of those that divine for money. Let thy gifts be to thyself, for they will not be long thine, and give thy fee to another. Let us do our duty in the world, read God's writing and make known the interpretation of it.

2. He recounts to the king God's dealings with his father Nebuchadnezzar, v. 18, 21. He describes the great dignity and power to which the divine Providence had advanced Nebuchadnezzar, v. 18, 19. His ability was so strong that it was irresistible. His authority was so absolute that it was uncontrollable. Whom he would he slew, and whom he would he saved alive, though both were equally innocent or equally guilty. Whom he would he set up, and whom he would he put down. He sets before him the sins which Nebuchadnezzar had been guilty of, whereby he had provoked God against him. The description given of his power intimates his abuse of his power. He behaved insolently towards the God above him, and grew proud and haughty (v. 20). He reminds him of the judgments of God that were brought upon him for his pride and obstinacy, how he was deprived of his reason, and so deposed from his kingly throne (v. 20). driven from among men, to dwell with the wild asses, v. 21.

3. In God's name, he exhibits articles of impeachment against Belshazzar. Before he reads him his doom, from the hand-writing on the wall, he shows him his crime. He had not taken warning by the judgments of God upon his father (v. 22): Thou his son, O Belshazzar! hast not humbled thy heart, though thou knewest all this. He had affronted God more impudently than Nebuchadnezzar himself had done, witness the revels of this very night (v. 23): "Thou hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven, thou hast profaned the vessels of his house, and made the utensils of his sanctuary instruments of thy iniquity, and hast praised the gods of silver and gold, which see not, nor hear, nor know anything, as if they were to be preferred before the God that sees, and hears, and knows everything." He had not answered the end of his creation and maintenance: The God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified. This is a general charge, which stands good against us all. Our dependence upon God as our Creator, preserver, benefactor, owner, and ruler; not only from his hand our breath was at first, but in his hand our breath is still; it is he that holds our souls in life, and, if he take away our breath, we die. We ought to glorify him, to devote ourselves to his honour and employ ourselves in his service. We have all sinned, and have come short of the glory of God. This is the indictment against Belshazzar.

4. He now proceeds to read the sentence, as he found it written upon the wall: "Then" (says Daniel) "when thou hast come to such a height of impiety as thus to trample upon the most sacred things, then when thou wast in the midst of thy sacrilegious idolatrous feast, then was the part of the hand, the writing fingers, sent from him, from God; he sent them, and this writing, thou now seest, was written, v. 24. Now the writing was, Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin, v. 25. The signification of them is, He has numbered, he has weighed, and they divide. (1) Mene; repeated, for the thing is certain—Mene, mene; that signifies, both in Hebrew and Chaldee, He has numbered and finished, which Daniel explains thus (v. 26): "God has numbered thy kingdom. Here is an end of thy kingdom." (2) Tekel; signifies, in Chaldee, Thou art weighed, and, in Hebrew, Thou art too light. God does not give judgment against him till he has first pondered his actions, and considered the merits of his case. (3) Upharsin (v. 28): "Thy kingdom is divided, is rent from thee, and given to the Medes and Persians, as a prey to be divided among them." Belshazzar was so far convicted by his own conscience of the reasonableness of all he said that he gave Daniel the reward he promised him, put on him the scarlet gown and the gold chain, and proclaimed him the third ruler in the kingdom (v. 29).

Verses 30–31

1. The death of the king. Heathen writers speak of Cyrus's taking Babylon by surprise, with the assistance of two deserters that showed him the best way into the city. 2. The transferring of the kingdom into other hands. From the head of gold we now descend to the breast and arms of silver. Darius the Mede took the kingdom in partnership with, and by the consent of Cyrus, who had conquered it, v. 31.

CHAP. VI

Daniel selects such particular passages of story as serve for the confirming of our faith in God. Daniel by faith "stopped the mouths of lions," and so "obtained a good report," Heb. xi. 33. The three children were cast into the fiery furnace for not committing a known sin, Daniel was cast into the lion's den for not omitting a known duty. I. Daniel's preferment in the court of Darius, ver. 1–3. II. The envy and malice of his enemies against him, ver. 4, 5. III. The decree they obtained against prayer for thirty days, ver. 6–9. IV. Daniel's continuance and constancy in prayer, notwithstanding that decree, ver. 10. V. Information given against him for it, and the casting of him into the den of lions, ver. 11–17. VI. His miraculous preservation and deliverance, ver. 18–23. VIII. The casting of his accusers into the den, and their destruction, ver. 24. VIII. The decree which Darius made upon this occasion, in honour of the God of Daniel, and the prosperity of Daniel afterwards, ver. 25–28.

Concerning Daniel,

I. What a great man he was. When Darius, upon his accession to the crown of Babylon by conquest, new-modelled the government, he made Daniel prime-minister of state. Darius set over the kingdom 120 princes (v. 1), and appointed them their districts. Over these princes there was a triumvirate, or three presidents, who were to take and state the public accounts that the king should have no damage (v. 2), that he should not sustain loss in his revenue. Of these three Daniel was the chief, preferred above the presidents and princes (v. 3). Daniel had been a great man in the kingdom that was conquered, and for that reason, one would think, should have been imprisoned or banished. He was a native of a foreign kingdom, and a ruined one, and might have been despised as a stranger and captive. But Darius was soon aware that Daniel had something extraordinary in him, and therefore, finding Daniel excel in prudence and virtue, and probably having heard of his being divinely inspired, he made him his right hand. Though Daniel was now very old yet he was as able as ever for business, and won respect from all by being an oak, not by being a willow, by a constancy in virtue, not by a pliableness to vice.

II. An excellent spirit was in him, v. 3. There was no error, or fault, to be found in him, v. 4.

III. The presidents and princes envied him because he was advanced above them. 1. The cause of envy is everything that is good. The better a man is the worse he is thought of by his rivals. 2. The effect of envy is everything that is bad. Those that envied Daniel sought no less than his ruin. His enemies set spies upon him; they sought to find occasion against him. They concluded, at length, that they should not find any occasion against him except concerning the law of his God, v. 5. It seems then that Daniel kept up the profession of his religion, and there was no law that required him to be of the king's religion, or incapacitated him to bear office in the state unless he were. He was at the king's service usque ad aras—as far as the altars; but there he left him. In this matter therefore his enemies hoped to ensnare him.

Verses 6–10

Daniel's adversaries contrive a new law, by which they hope to ensnare him, and such was his fidelity to his God that they gained their point.

I. Darius's impious law—Darius's, because he gave the royal assent to it. The presidents and princes framed the edict. They intimate to the king that it was carried unanimously: "All the presidents are of this mind"; and yet we are sure that Daniel, the chief of the three presidents, did not agree to it. These designing men, under colour of doing honour to the king, press him to pass this into a law, and make it a royal statute, that whosoever shall ask a petition of any god or man for thirty days, save of the king, shall be cast into the den of lions, v. 7. All men must be made to believe that the king is so ready to all petitioners, that none in any distress need to apply either to God or man for relief, but to him only. And for thirty days together he will be ready to give audience to all that have any petition to present to him. There is a great deal in it that is apparently evil. Must not a beggar ask an alms, or one neighbour beg a kindness of another? If the child want bread, must he not ask it of his parents, or be cast into the den of lions if he do? But it was an impudent affront to all religion, to forbid asking a petition of any god. To interdict prayer for thirty days is to rob God of all the tribute he has from man and to rob man of all the comfort he has in God. Does not every man's heart direct him, when he is in want or distress, to call upon God, and must this be made high treason? Had they proposed only to prohibit the Jews from praying to their God, Daniel would have been as effectually ensnared; but they knew the king would not pass such a law, and therefore made it general.

II. Daniel's pious disobedience to this law, v. 10. He did not retire into the country, but stood his ground, knowing that he had now a fair opportunity of honouring God before men.

1. Daniel prayed in his house, sometimes himself alone and sometimes with his family about him, and made a solemn business of it. Every house not only may be, but ought to be, a house of prayer; where we have a tent God must have an altar, and on it we must offer spiritual sacrifices. In every prayer he gave thanks. When he prayed and gave thanks he kneeled upon his knees. Kneeling is a begging posture, and we come to God as beggars, beggars for our lives. He opened the windows of his chamber, that the sight of the visible heavens might affect his heart with awe. He opened them towards Jerusalem, the holy city, though now in ruins, to signify the affection he had for its very stones and dust (Ps. cii. 14). He did this three times a day. It is good to have our hours of prayer, not to bind, but to remind conscience; and, if we think our bodies require refreshment by food thrice a day, can we think seldomer will serve our souls? All who knew him knew it to be his practice; and he was not ashamed of it.

2. Daniel's constant adherence to this practice, even when it was made by the law a capital crime. When he knew that the writing was signed he continued to do as he did aforetime. Many a man, yea, and many a good man, would have thought it prudence to omit it for these thirty days, when he could not do it without hazard of his life; but Daniel, who had so many eyes upon him, must act with courage. And we must take heed lest, under pretence of discretion, we be found guilty of cowardice in the cause of God.

Verses 11–17

Proof made of Daniel's praying to his God, notwithstanding the late edict to the contrary (v. 11): These men assembled; they came tumultuously together, so the word is, the same that was used v. 6. They came together to visit Daniel, perhaps under pretence of business, at that time which they knew to be his usual hour of devotion; and they found him on his knees praying and making supplication before his God. They lost no time, but applied to the king (v. 12), and proceeded to accuse Daniel, v. 13. They so describe him as to exasperate the king and incense him the more against him: "He is of the children of the captivity of Judah; and a captive in a despicable state, that can call nothing his own but what he has by the king's favour, and yet he regards not thee, O king! nor the decree that thou hast signed." They do not say, He makes his petition to his God, lest Darius should take notice of that to his praise, but only, He makes his petition, which is the thing the law forbids. The king now perceived that, whatever they pretended, it was not to honour him, but to spite Daniel, v. 14. Now the king sets his heart to deliver Daniel; both by argument and by authority he labours till the going down of the sun to deliver him, that is, to persuade his accusers not to insist upon his prosecution. The prosecutors demanded judgment, v. 15. We are not told what Daniel said; the king himself is his advocate. But the prosecutors insist upon it that the law must have its course. The Persians magnified the wisdom of their king, by supposing that whatever law he solemnly ratified it was so well made that there could be no occasion to alter it. The king himself, with the utmost reluctance, and against his conscience, signs the warrant for his execution; and Daniel, that venerable grave man, who carried such a mixture of majesty and sweetness in his countenance, is purely for worshipping his God, thrown into the den of lions, to be devoured by them, v. 16. To make sure work, the stone laid upon the mouth of the den is sealed (v. 17). The encouragement which Darius gave to Daniel to trust in God: Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee, v. 16. He justifies Daniel from guilt, owning all his crime to be serving his God continually. He leaves it to God to free him: He will deliver thee.

Verses 18–24

I. The melancholy night which the king had, upon Daniel's account, v. 18. He could not forgive himself for throwing him into the danger. He passed the night fasting. He forbade the music.

II. The early enquiry he made concerning Daniel the next morning, v. 19, 20. He went in haste to the den of lions. When he comes to the den, he cries, with a lamentable voice, O Daniel! servant of the living God, has thy God whom thou servest made it to appear that he is able to deliver thee from the lions?

III. Daniel is alive, is safe, and well, and unhurt in the lions' den, v. 21, 22. Daniel knew the king's voice: O king! live for ever. He does not reproach him, but has heartily forgiven him. The account Daniel gives the king is triumphant. 1. God has preserved his life by a miracle. He is my God, whom I own, and who owns me, for he has sent his angel. The same that was seen in the form of the Son of God with the three children in the fiery furnace had visited Daniel, and had shut the lions' mouths. See the care God takes of his faithful worshippers. He does in effect stop the lions' mouths, that they cannot hurt them. 2. Daniel was represented to the king as disaffected to him and his government. We do not find that he said anything in his own vindication, but left it to God to establish his integrity, and he did it effectually, by working a miracle for his preservation.

IV. The discharge of Daniel from his confinement. His prosecutors cannot but own that the law is satisfied, though they are not. No cause can be shown why Daniel should not be fetched out of the den (v. 23).

V. The committing of his prosecutors to the same prison, v. 24. Darius is animated by this miracle wrought for Daniel, and now begins to take courage and act like himself. Daniel's accusers, now that his innocency is cleared, have the same punishment inflicted upon them which they designed against him.

Verses 25–28

Darius here studies to make amends for the dishonour he had done both to God and Daniel.

I. He gives honour to God by a decree published to all nations, by which they are required to fear before him. He sends this decree—to all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth, v. 25. The decree is—that men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel. This goes further than Nebuchadnezzar's decree, for that only restrained people from speaking amiss of this God, but this requires them to fear before him. But, though this decree goes far, it does not go far enough; had he come up to his present convictions, he would have commanded all men not only to fear before this God, but to love him and trust in him, to forsake the service of their idols, and to worship him only. There is good reason why all men should fear before this God, for, 1. His being is transcendent. 2. His government is incontestable. 3. Both his being and his government are unchangeable. 4. He has ability sufficient to support such an authority, v. 27. He delivers his faithful servants from trouble and rescues them out of trouble. 5. He has given a fresh proof of all this in delivering his servant Daniel from the power of the lions.

II. He puts honour upon Daniel (v. 28): So this Daniel prospered.

CHAP. VII

The six former chapters of this book were historical; we now enter with fear and trembling upon the six latter, which are prophetical, wherein are many things dark and hard to be understood, which we dare not positively determine, and yet many things plain and profitable. I. Daniel's vision of the four beasts, ver. 1–8. II. His vision of God's throne of government and judgment, ver. 9–14. III. The interpretation of these visions, ver. 15–28. Whether those visions look as far forward as the end of time, or whether they were to have a speedy accomplishment, is hard to say, nor are the most judicious interpreters agreed concerning it.

Verses 1–8

The date of this chapter places it before ch. v, which was in the last year of Belshazzar, and ch. vi, which was in the first of Darius. Belshazzar's name here is, in the original, spelt Bel-eshe-zar—Bel is on fire by the enemy. Bel the god of the Chaldeans had prospered, but is now to be consumed.

Daniel's vision of the four monarchies that were oppressive to the Jews.

I. The circumstances of this vision (v. 1): He had visions of his head upon his bed, when he was asleep; so God sometimes revealed his mind to men, when deep sleep fell upon them (Job xxxiii. 15). When he was awake he wrote the dream, and told the sum of the matters to his brethren, and gave it to them in writing, that it might be preserved for their children, who shall see these things accomplished. The Jews, misunderstanding Jeremiah and Ezekiel, flattered themselves that, after their return, they should enjoy uninterrupted tranquillity. God by this prophet lets them know that they shall have tribulation.

II. The vision itself: 1. He observed the four winds to strive upon the great sea, v. 2. They strove which should blow strongest, and, at length, blow alone. This represents the contests among princes for empire. The four winds strive for mastery! That is what the kings of the nations are contending for in their wars, which are as noisy and violent as the battle of the winds. 2. He saw four great beasts come up from the sea, from the troubled waters. The monarchs and monarchies are represented by beasts. These beasts were diverse one from another (v. 3), to denote the different genius of the nations. The first beast was like a lion, v. 4. This was the Chaldean monarchy, fierce and strong, and the kings absolute. This lion had eagle's wings, denoting the speed that Nebuchadnezzar made in his conquest of kingdoms. But Daniel soon sees the wings plucked. Divers countries that had been tributaries revolt; so that this winged lion is made to stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart is given to it. It has lost the heart of a lion (one of our English kings was called Coeur de Lion—Lion-heart), has become feeble, dreading everything and daring nothing. The second beast was like a bear, v. 5. This was the Persian monarchy, less strong and generous, but no less ravenous. This bear raised up itself on one side against the lion, and soon mastered it. It raised up one dominion; so some read it. Persia and Media now set up a joint government. This bear had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth, the remains of those nations it had devoured; some ribs still stuck in the teeth of it, which it could not conquer. Whereupon it was said, "Arise, devour much flesh; set upon that which will be an easier prey." The princes will push on their conquests, and let nothing stand before them. The third beast was like a leopard, v. 6. This was the Grecian monarchy, founded by Alexander the Great, active, crafty, and cruel, like a leopard. He had four wings of a fowl; for though Nebuchadnezzar made great despatch in his conquests Alexander made much greater. In six years' time he gained the whole empire of Persia, a great part of Asia, made himself master of Syria, Egypt, India, and other nations. This beast had four heads; upon Alexander's death his conquests were divided among his four chief captains; Seleucus Nicanor had Asia the Great; Perdiccas, and after him Antigonus, had Asia the Less; Cassander had Macedonia; and Ptolemeus had Egypt. The fourth beast was more fierce and formidable than any of them, v. 7. The learned are not agreed concerning this anonymous beast; some make it to be the Roman empire, which comprehended ten kingdoms, Italy, France, Spain, Germany, Britain, Sarmatia, Pannonia, Asia, Greece, and Egypt; and then the little horn which rose by the fall of three of the other horns (v. 8) they make to be the Turkish empire, which rose in the room of Asia, Greece, and Egypt. Others make this fourth beast to be the kingdom of Syria, the family of the Seleucidae, which was very cruel to the Jews, as we find in Josephus and the history of the Maccabees. Their armies were the great iron teeth with which they devoured and broke in pieces the people of God, and trampled upon the residue of them. The ten horns are then supposed to be ten kings that reigned successively in Syria; and then the little horn is Antiochus Epiphanes, the last of the ten, who undermined three of the kings, and got the government. He was a man of great ingenuity, and therefore is said to have eyes like the eyes of a man.

Whether we understand the fourth beast to signify the Syrian empire, or the Roman, it is plain that these verses are intended for the comfort of the people of God in the persecutions they were likely to sustain. Three things are here discovered that are encouraging:

I. That there is a judgment to come, and God is the Judge. Now men have their day. I beheld (v. 9) till the thrones were cast down, not only the thrones of these beasts, but all rule, authority, and power, that are set up in opposition to the kingdom of God among men (1 Cor. xv. 24): such are the thrones of the kingdoms of the world, in comparison with God's kingdom. I beheld till thrones were set up (so it may as well be read), Christ's throne and the throne of his Father. It is the judgment that is here set, v. 10. This is intended to proclaim God's wise and righteous government of the world by his providence. Perhaps it points at the destruction brought upon Syria, or Rome, for their tyrannizing over the people of God. It seems principally designed to describe the last judgment. Many of the New Testament predictions of the judgment to come have a plain allusion to this vision, especially St. John's vision of it, Rev. xx. 11, 12. The Judge is the Ancient of days himself, God the Father. He is called the Ancient of days, because he is God from everlasting to everlasting. The glory of the Judge is set forth by his garment, white as snow, denoting his splendour and purity; and the hair of his head as the pure wool, white and venerable. The throne is like the fiery flame, dreadful to the wicked. The wheels thereof are as burning fire, to devour the adversaries. This is enlarged upon, v. 10. The attendants are numerous. The Shechinah is always attended with angels; it is so here (v. 10): Thousand thousands minister to him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stand before him. The judgment is set, publicly, and the books are opened.

II. That the cruel enemies of the church of God will be brought down in due time, v. 11, 12. This is here represented, 1. In the destroying of the fourth beast. God's quarrel with this beast is because of the voice of the great words which the horn spoke, bidding defiance to Heaven. The Syrian empire, after Antiochus, was destroyed. He himself died of a miserable disease, his family was rooted out, the kingdom wasted by the Parthians and Armenians, and at length made a province of the Roman empire by Pompey. And the Roman empire itself (if we take that for the fourth beast), after it began to persecute Christianity, declined and wasted away, and was destroyed. 2. In the weakening of the other three beasts (v. 12): They had their dominion taken away, and so were disabled from doing mischiefs to the people of God; but a prolonging in life was given them, for a time and a season. The power of the foregoing kingdoms was broken, but the people still remained in a mean, weak condition. And thus God deals with his church's enemies; sometimes he crushes the persecution, but reprieves the persecutors, that they may have space to repent.

III. That the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up in the world, in spite of all the opposition of the powers of darkness. Daniel sees this in vision, and comforts his friends. 1. The Messiah is here called the Son of man—one like unto the Son of man; for he was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, was found in fashion as a man. I saw one like unto the Son of man. Our Saviour seems plainly to refer to this vision when he says (John v. 27) that the Father has therefore given him authority to execute judgment because he is the Son of man. 2. He is said to come with the clouds of heaven. Some refer this to his incarnation. I think it is rather to be referred to his ascension, Acts i. 9. When the cloud received him out of the sight of his disciples, it is worth while to enquire whither it carried him; and here we are told he ascended to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God (John xx. 17). He was brought near, as our high priest, who for us enters within the veil, and as our forerunner. He is represented as having a mighty influence upon this earth, v. 14. When he went to be glorified with his Father he had a power given him over all flesh, John xvii. 2, 5. With the prospect of this Daniel and his friends are comforted, that not only the dominion of the church's enemies shall be taken away (v. 12), but the church's head shall have the dominion given him; to him every knee shall bow and every tongue confess, Phil. ii. 9, 10. His dominion shall not pass away. The church shall continue militant to the end of time, and triumphant to the endless ages of eternity.

I. The deep impressions which these visions made upon the prophet (v. 15): I Daniel was grieved in my spirit, in the midst of my body. The word here used for the body properly signifies a sheath or scabbard, for the body is no more to the soul. The visions of my head troubled me, and again (v. 28), my cogitations much troubled me. The manner in which these things were discovered to him quite overwhelmed him.

II. His earnest desire to understand the meaning (v. 16).

III. The key that was given him.

1. The great beasts are great kings and their kingdoms, which shall arise out of the earth, as those beasts did out of the sea, v. 17.

2. Daniel understands the first three beasts, but concerning the fourth he desires to be better informed, v. 19. But especially he desired to know what the little horn was, that had eyes, and a mouth that spoke very great things, v. 20. It was this horn that made war with the saints, and prevailed against them, v. 21. It is time to ask, "What is the meaning of this? What is this same horn that shall prevail so far against the saints?" To this his interpreter answers (v. 23–25) that this fourth beast is a fourth kingdom, that shall devour the whole earth, or (as it may be read) the whole land. That the ten horns are ten kings, and the little horn is another king that shall subdue three kings, and shall be very abusive to God and his people. He shall wear out the saints of the Most High. He shall think to change times and laws, to abolish all the ordinances and institutions of religion. And in these daring attempts he shall for a time prosper and have success; they shall be given into his hand until time, times, and half a time (that is, for three years and a half). But at the end of that time the judgment shall sit and take away his dominion (v. 26), which he expounds (v. 11) of the beast being slain and his body destroyed. And (as Mr. Mede reads v. 12) as to the rest of the beast, the ten horns, especially the little ruffling horn, they had their dominion taken away. Now the question is, Who is this enemy? Interpreters are not agreed. Some will have the fourth kingdom to be that of the Seleucidae, and the little horn to be Antiochus, and show the accomplishment of all this in the history of the Maccabees; but others will have the fourth kingdom to be that of the Romans, and the little horn to be Julius Caesar, and the succeeding emperors (says Calvin), the antichrist, the papal kingdom. Others make the little horn to be the Turkish empire; so Luther, Vatablus, and others. Since prophecies sometimes have many fulfillings, I am willing to allow that they are both in the right, and that this prophecy has primary reference to the Syrian empire, and was intended for the encouragement of the Jews who suffered under Antiochus. But yet it has a further reference, and foretells the persecuting power in Rome, against the Christian religion. And St. John in his visions, which point primarily at Rome, has reference to these visions of Daniel.

3. He has a joyful prospect given him of God's kingdom among men, and its victory over all opposition at last. This is brought in abruptly (v. 18 and again v. 22), before it comes, in the course of the vision, to be interpreted, v. 26, 27. And this also refers, (1) To the prosperous days of the Jewish church, after it had weathered the storm under Antiochus. (2) To the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world by the preaching of his gospel. (3) To the second coming of Jesus Christ. The Ancient of days shall come, v. 22. God shall judge the world by his Son, to whom he has committed all judgments. The judgment shall sit, v. 26. God judges in the earth, both in wisdom and in equity. The dominion of the enemy shall be taken away, v. 26. All Christ's enemies shall be made his footstool. Judgment is given to the saints of the Most High. The apostles are entrusted with the preaching of a gospel by which the world shall be judged. That which is most insisted upon is that the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, v. 18. And again (v. 22), The time came that the saints possessed the kingdom. And again (v. 27), The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High. This intimates the spiritual dominion of the saints over their own lusts and corruptions, their victories over Satan and his temptations, and the triumphs of the martyrs over death and its terrors. It likewise promises that the gospel kingdom shall be set up, a kingdom of light, holiness, and love. The saints shall possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever; and the reason is because he whose saints they are is the Most High and his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, v. 27. Because I live, you shall live also, John xiv. 19. His kingdom is theirs.

Daniel, in the close, tells us what impressions this vision made upon him; it overwhelmed his spirits to such a degree that his countenance was changed, but he kept the matter in his heart. Daniel kept the matter in his heart, with a design, not to keep it from the church, but to keep it for the church.

CHAP. VIII

This chapter is written not in Chaldee, as the six foregoing chapters were, for the benefit of the Chaldeans, but in Hebrew, and so are the rest of the chapters to the end of the book, for the service of the Jews. I. The vision itself of the ram, and the he-goat, and the little horn that should fight and prevail against the people of God, for a limited time, ver. 1–14. II. The interpretation of this vision by an angel, showing that the ram signified the Persian empire, the he-goat the Grecian, and the little horn a king of the Grecian monarchy, that should set himself against the Jews, which was Antiochus Epiphanes, ver. 15–27. The Jewish church had been all along blessed with prophets, men divinely inspired to explain God's mind to them, but, soon after Ezra's time, divine inspiration ceased, and there was no more any prophet till the gospel day dawned. And therefore the events of that time were here foretold by Daniel, and left upon record.

I. The date of this vision, v. 1. It was in the third year of the reign of Belshazzar, his last year, as many reckon; so that this chapter should be before the fifth. That Daniel might not be surprised at the destruction of Babylon, now at hand. God gives him a foresight of the destruction of other kingdoms hereafter. And this vision puts him in mind of a former vision which appeared to him at the first, and is an explication and confirmation of it, and points at many of the same events.

II. The scene of this vision. The place where that was laid was in Shushan the palace, situated in the province of Elam, that part of Persia next to Babylon. Daniel was not there in person, for he was now in Babylon, a captive. But he was there in vision; as Ezekiel, when a captive in Babylon, was often brought, in the spirit, to the land of Israel. The soul may be at liberty when the body is in captivity; for, when we are bound, the Spirit of the Lord is not bound.

III. The vision itself.

1. He saw a ram with two horns, v. 3. This was the second monarchy, of which the kingdoms of Media and Persia were the two horns. The horns were very high; but that which came up last was the higher. The kingdom of Persia, which rose last, in Cyrus, became more eminent than that of the Medes.

2. He saw this ram pushing all about him with his horns (v. 4), westward (towards Babylon, Syria, Greece, and Asia the less), northward (towards the Lydians, Armenians, and Scythians), and southward (towards Arabia, Ethiopia, and Egypt), for all these nations did the Persian empire make attempts upon for the enlarging of their dominion. And at last he became so powerful that no beasts might stand before him. The kings of Persia did according to their will, and became great.

3. He was considering the ram and, behold, a he-goat came, v. 5. This was Alexander the Great, the son of Philip king of Macedonia. He came from the west, from Greece. He did in effect conquer the world. He touched not the ground, so lightly did he move; that is, he met with little or no opposition. This he-goat, or buck, had a notable horn between his eyes. He had strength, and knew his own strength. Alexander pushed his conquests on so fast, and with so much fury, that none had courage to make a stand. This he-goat came to the ram that had two horns, v. 6. Alexander with his victorious army attacked the kingdom of Persia, an army consisting of no more than 30,000 foot and 5,000 horse. Alexander with his army came up with Darius Codomannus, then emperor of Persia, being moved with choler against him, v. 7. Alexander was too hard for him whenever he engaged him, smote him, cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him, which three expressions some think, refer to the three famous victories that Alexander obtained over Darius, at Granicus, at Issus, and at Arbela, by which he was at length totally routed, having, in the last battle, had 600,000 men killed, so that Alexander became absolute master of all the Persian empire, broke his two horns, the kingdoms of Media and Persia.

4. He saw the he-goat made very considerable; but the great horn, that had done all this execution, was broken, v. 8. Alexander was twenty years old when he began his wars. When he was twenty-six he conquered Darius, and became master of the whole Persian empire; but when he was thirty-two years of age, in his full strength, he was broken. He died of a drunken surfeit, or, as some suspect, by poison, and left no child living.

5. He saw this kingdom divided into four parts, and instead of one great horn there came up four notable ones, Alexander's four captains. These four notable horns were towards the four winds of heaven, the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, Asia and Greece.

6. He saw a little horn which became a great persecutor of the church and people of God; ch. xi. 30, &c. All agree that this was Antiochus Epiphanes. He is called here (as before. ch. vii. 8) a little horn, because he was in origin contemptible; there were others between him and the kingdom, and he had been a hostage and prisoner at Rome, whence he made his escape, and got the kingdom. He seized Egypt, and invaded Persia and Armenia. But that which is here noted is the mischief that he did to the Jews. (1) He set himself against the pleasant land, the land of Israel. Mount Zion was beautiful for situation, and the joy of the whole earth, Ps. xlviii. 2. We reckon that a pleasant place which is a holy place, in which God dwells, and where we may have opportunity of communing with him. (2) He fought against the host of heaven, that is, the people of God, the church-militant here on earth. (3) He cast down some of the host to the ground, and stamped upon them. Some of those most eminent in church and state, burning and shining lights in their generation, he either forced to comply with his idolatries or put them to death, as good old Eleazar, and the seven brethren, whom he put to death with cruel tortures, because they would not eat swine's flesh, 2 Mac. vi. 7. (4) He magnified himself even to the prince of the host. He set himself against the high priest, Onias, or against God himself. (5) He took away the daily sacrifice. The morning and evening lamb, which God appointed to be offered upon his altar, Antiochus forbade. (6) He cast down the place of his sanctuary. He did not burn the temple, but made it the temple of Jupiter Olympus, and set up his image in it. He also cast down the truth to the ground, trampled upon the book of the law, and burnt it. God would not have permitted it if his people had not provoked him to do so. It is by reason of transgression, the transgression of Israel, that Antiochus is employed to give them all this trouble. The great transgression of the Jews after the captivity was a contempt and profanation of the holy things, snuffing at the service of God, bringing the torn and the lame for sacrifice, as if the table of the Lord were a contemptible thing (Mal. i. 7, 8, &c.), and therefore God sent Antiochus to take away the daily sacrifice and cast down the place of his sanctuary. 7. He heard the time of this calamity limited, how long it should last, that, when they had no more any prophets to tell them how long, they might have this prophecy to give them a prospect of deliverance. The question was asked: "How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice? How long shall the prohibition of it continue?" The answer was given to Daniel, because for his sake the question was asked: He said unto me, v. 14. Christ assures him that the trouble shall end; it shall continue 2,300 days and no longer, so many evenings and mornings. Understand them of so many natural days; 2,300 days make six years and three months, and about eighteen days; and just so long they reckon from the defection of the people, procured by Menelaus the high priest in the 142nd year of the kingdom of the Seleucidae, the sixth month of that year, and the 6th day of the month (so Josephus dates it), to the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the re-establishment of religion among them, which was in the 148th year, the 9th month, and the 25th day of the month, 1 Mac. iv. 52.

Verses 15–27

I. Daniel's earnest desire to have this vision explained to him (v. 15): I sought the meaning.

II. One in the appearance of a man (who, some think, was Christ himself), orders Gabriel to make Daniel understand this vision.

III. The consternation that Daniel was in upon the approach of his instructor (v. 17): When he came near I was afraid. Prostrate upon the ground, he fell into a deep sleep (v. 18).

IV. The relief which the angel gave to Daniel. 1. He touched him, and set him upon his feet, v. 18. He promised to inform him: "Understand, O son of man! v. 17. Thou shalt understand, if thou wilt but apply thy mind to understand." He assures him that he shall be made to know what shall be in the last end of the indignation, v. 19. Let it be a comfort to those who live to see these calamitous times that there shall be an end of them; the indignation shall cease (Isa. x. 25); it shall be overpast, Isa. xxvi. 20. Good will be brought out of it. He tells him (v. 17), "At the time of the end shall be the vision; when the last end of the indignation comes, when the course of this providence is completed, then the vision shall be made plain and intelligible by the event."

V. The exposition which he gave him of the vision.

1. Concerning the two monarchies of Persia and Greece, v. 20–22. The ram signified the succession of the kings of Media and Persia; the rough goat signified the kings of Greece; the great horn was Alexander; the four horns that rose in his room were the four kingdoms of which we read, v. 8. Josephus relates that when Alexander had taken Tyre, and was upon his march to Jerusalem Jaddas, then high priest, fearing his rage, had recourse to God by prayer, and was warned in a dream that upon Alexander's approach he should open the gates of the city, and that he and the rest of the priests should go forth to meet him in their habits, and all the people in white. Alexander, seeing this company at a distance, went alone to the high priest, and, having prostrated himself, saluted him; and, being asked by one of his own captains why he did so, he said that while he was yet in Macedon, musing on the conquest of Asia, there appeared to him a man thus attired, who invited him into Asia, and assured him of success in the conquest of it. The priests led him to the temple, where he offered sacrifice to the God of Israel as they directed him; and they showed him this book of the prophet Daniel, where it was foretold that a Grecian should destroy the Persians, which cheered him in the expedition against Darius. Hereupon he took the Jews and their religion under his protection, promised to be kind to those of their religion in Babylon and Media, whither he was now marching. Joseph. lib. 11.

2. Concerning Antiochus, and his oppression of the Jews. This is said to be in the latter time of the kingdom of the Greeks, when the transgressors are come to the full (v. 23), He shall be a king of fierce countenance, neither fearing God nor regarding man, understanding dark sentences, or (rather) versed in dark practices, the hidden things of dishonesty. He shall make havoc of the nations: His power shall be mighty, bearing down all before it (v. 24), by the assistance of his allies Eumenes and Attalus, partly by the baseness and treachery of many of the Jews. The princes of Egypt cannot stand before him with all their forces. He destroys the holy people, or the people of the holy ones; their sacred character does not deter him. He will gain this success by craft (v. 25), by deceit, and serpentine subtlety: He shall cause craft to prosper; he shall gain his point by the art of wheedling. By peace he shall destroy many, as others do by war; under the pretence of treaties, leagues, and alliances, he shall trick them into subjection to him. Sometimes what a nation truly brave has gained in a righteous war a nation truly base has regained in a treacherous peace. He shall magnify himself in his heart, so that he shall stand up against the Prince of princes, that is, against God himself. He will profane his temple and altar, and persecute his worshippers. The ruin that he shall be brought to at last: He shall be broken without hand. He shall not be slain in war, nor shall he be assassinated, but he shall fall into the hand of the living God and die. He, hearing that the Jews had cast the image of Jupiter Olympius out of the temple, where he had placed it, was so enraged that he vowed he would make Jerusalem a common burial-place, but no sooner had he spoken these proud words than he was struck with an incurable plague. He continued in this misery. At first he persisted in his menaces against the Jews; but at length, despairing of his recovery, he acknowledged the injuries he had done to the Jews and his profaning the temple at Jerusalem. Then he wrote courteous letters, and vowed that if he recovered he would let them have the free exercise of their religion. But, finding his disease grow upon him, he said, It is meet to submit to God, and for man who is mortal not to set himself in competition with God, and so died in a strange land, on the mountains of Pacata near Babylon.

VI. Here is the conclusion of this vision, and the charge given to Daniel to keep it private for the present: Shut thou up the vision; for it shall be for many days. Let it be kept for the generations that should live about the time of the accomplishment of it, for to them it would be most serviceable.

CHAP. IX

I. Daniel's prayer for the restoration of the Jews in captivity, ver. 1–19. II. An immediate answer to his prayer, in which, 1. He is assured of the speedy release of the Jews out of their captivity, ver. 20–23. And, 2. He is informed concerning the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ, ver. 24–27. And it is the clearest prophecy of the Messiah, in all the Old Testament.

Verses 1–3

Daniel here employed in better business than any the king had for him, speaking to God and hearing from him, not for himself only, but for the church. Daniel had this communion with God (v. 1), in the first year of Darius the Mede, who was newly made king of the Chaldeans, Babylon being conquered by him and his nephew, or grandson, Cyrus. In this year the seventy years of the Jews' captivity ended. He understood by books that seventy years was the time fixed for the continuance of the desolations of Jerusalem, v. 2. The book by which he understood this was the book of Jeremiah, in which he found it expressly foretold (Jer. xxix. 10), After seventy years be accomplished in Babylon I will visit you, and perform my good word towards you. It was likewise said (Jer. xxv. 11). This whole land shall be seventy years a desolation (chorbath), the same word that Daniel here uses for the desolations of Jerusalem, which shows that he had that prophecy before him when he wrote this. Now Daniel sought by prayer and supplications that the people might be prepared by the grace of God for the deliverance that God was about to work out for them. This prayer: I set my face unto the Lord God to seek him, denotes the fixedness of his thoughts, the firmness of his faith, in the duty. Probably, in token of his setting his face towards God, he set his face towards Jerusalem. In token of his deep humiliation before God for his own sins, and the sins of his people, when he prayed he fasted and put on sackcloth and ashes.

Verses 4–19

Daniel's prayer to God as his God, and the confession which he joined with that prayer: I prayed, and made my confession. In every prayer we must make confession, not only of our sins, but of our faith in God.

I. His humble, reverent address in which he gives glory to God, 1. As a God to be feared: "O Lord! the great and dreadful God, that art able to deal with the greatest and most terrible of the church's enemies." 2. As a God to be trusted: Keeping the covenant and mercy to those that love him, and, as a proof of their love to him, keep his commandments. He will be better than his word, for he keeps mercy to them, something more than was in the covenant. It was proper for Daniel to think of God's mercy now that he was to lay before him the miseries of his people, and to sue for the performance of a promise.

II. Here is a penitent confession of sin, v. 5, 6. When we seek for national mercies we ought to humble ourselves for national sins. Two things aggravated their sins: 1. That they had violated the laws God had given them by Moses. 2. That they had slighted the fair warnings God had given them by the prophets (v. 6): "We have not hearkened to thy servants the prophets, who have put us in mind of thy laws."

III. Here is a self-abasing acknowledgment of the righteousness of God in all the judgments brought upon them. He acknowledges that it was sin that plunged them in all these troubles. Israel is dispersed through all the countries about, and so weakened, impoverished, and exposed. It is because of their trespass that they have trespassed (v. 7); they mingled themselves with the nations that they might be debauched by them, and now God mingles them with the nations that they might be stripped by them. He takes notice of the fulfilling of the scripture in what was brought upon them. The curse is poured upon us and the oath, that is, the curse that was ratified by an oath in the law of Moses, v. 11. God did but inflict the penalty of the law. "It is not some of the common troubles of life that we are complaining of, but that which has in it special marks of divine displeasure; for under the whole heaven has not been done as has been done upon Jerusalem," v. 12. It is Jeremiah's lamentation in the name of the church, Was ever sorrow like unto my sorrow? which must suppose another similar question, Was ever sin like unto my sin? He puts shame upon the whole nation, from the highest to the lowest. If Israel had continued a holy people, they would have been high above all nations in praise, and name, and honour (Deut. xxvi. 19); but now that they have sinned and done wickedly confusion and disgrace belong to them, to the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, to all Israel, both to the two tribes, that are near, by the rivers of Babylon, and to the ten tribes, that are afar off, in the land of Assyria. He imputes the continuance of the judgment to their incorrigibleness (v. 13, 14). We have not entreated the face of the Lord our God (so the word is); "we have taken no care to make our peace with God and reconcile ourselves to him." If men were brought rightly to understand God's truth, and to submit to the power and authority of it, they would turn from the error of their ways. Now the first step towards this is to make our prayer before the Lord our God, that the affliction may be sanctified before it is removed.

IV. Here is a believing appeal to the mercy of God. 1. God has been always ready to pardon sin (v. 9). He is a God of pardons (Neh. ix. 17, marg.); he multiplies to pardon, Isa. lv. 7. 2. Daniel looks back for the encouragement of his faith (v. 15): "Thou hast formerly brought thy people out of Egypt with a mighty hand, and wilt thou not now with the same mighty hand bring them out of Babylon? And has not God said that their deliverance out of Babylon shall outshine even that out of Egypt?" Jer. xvi. 14, 15.

V. Here is a pathetic complaint of the reproach that God's people lay under, and the ruins that God's sanctuary lay in. Their neighbours laugh them to scorn, and triumph in their disgrace. God's holy place was desolate. Jerusalem, the holy city, was a reproach (v. 16), the holy house was desolate (v. 17), the altars were demolished, and all the buildings laid in ashes.

VI. Here is an importunate request to God for the restoring of the captive Jews. "O Lord! I beseech thee, v. 16. Now therefore, O our God! hear the prayer of thy servant and his supplication (v. 17)." Now what are his petitions? What are his requests? 1. That God would turn away his wrath from them; that is it which all the saints dread and deprecate more than any thing: O let thy anger be turned away from thy Jerusalem, thy holy mountain! (v. 16). He does not pray for the turning again of their captivity (let the Lord do with them as seems good in his eyes), but he prays first for the turning away of God's wrath. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease. 2. That he would lift up the light of his countenance upon them (v. 17): Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate. The shining of God's face upon the desolations of the sanctuary is all in all towards the repair of it; and upon that foundation it must be rebuilt. If therefore its friends would begin their work at the right end, they must first be earnest with God in prayer for his favour.

VII. Here are several pleas and arguments to enforce the petitions. God gives us leave not only to pray, but to plead, not to move him (he himself knows what he will do), but to move ourselves, and encourage our faith. 1. They disdain a dependence upon any righteousness of their own; they pretend not to merit anything at God's hand but wrath and the curse (v. 18). Moses had told Israel that, whatever God did for them, it was not for their righteousness, Deut. ix. 4, 5. 2. They take their encouragement in prayer from God only, as knowing they are suing for grace and mercy from him. (1) "Do it for thy own sake (v. 19), for the accomplishment of thy own counsel, the performance of thy own promise." (2) "Do it for the Lord's sake." Christ is the Lord; he is Lord of all. It is for his sake that God causes his face to shine upon sinners when they repent and turn to him, because of the satisfaction he has made. (3) "Do it according to all thy righteousness (v. 16), that is, plead for us against our persecutors and oppressors according to thy righteousness." (4) "Do it for thy great mercies (v. 18), to make it to appear that thou art a merciful God." (5) "Do it for the sake of the relation we stand in to thee. The sanctuary that is desolate is thy sanctuary (v. 17). Jerusalem is thy city and thy holy mountain (v. 16); it is the city which is called by thy name," v. 18. "The people that have become a reproach are thy people, they are called by thy name (v. 19). They are thine, save them," Ps. cxix. 94.

Verses 20–27

The answer that was immediately sent to Daniel's prayer, contains the most illustrious prediction of Christ and gospel-grace that is extant in all the Old Testament.

I. The time when this answer was given.

1. It was while Daniel was at prayer. This he observed and laid a strong emphasis upon: While I was speaking in prayer (v. 21) before he rose from his knees, and while there was yet more which he intended to say. He was confessing sin and lamenting my sin and the sin of my people Israel. Now was fulfilled what God had spoken Isa. lxv. 24, While they are yet speaking, I will hear. Daniel grew very fervent in prayer, v. 18, 19. And, while he was speaking the angel came to him with a gracious answer. We cannot now expect that God should send us answers to our prayer by angels, but, if we pray with fervency for that which God has promised, we may by faith take the promise as an immediate answer to the prayer: for he is faithful that has promised. He had a discovery made to him of a far greater and more glorious redemption which God would work out for his church in the latter days.

2. It was about the time of the evening oblation, v. 21. The altar was in ruins, and there was no oblation offered upon it, but the pious Jews in their captivity were daily thoughtful of the time when it should have been offered, and hoped that their prayer should be set forth before God as incense, and the lifting up of their hands, and their hearts with their hands, should be acceptable in his sight as the evening-sacrifice, Ps. cxli. 2. The evening oblation was a type of the great sacrifice which Christ was to offer in the evening of the world, and it was in the virtue of that sacrifice that Daniel's prayer was accepted when he prayed for the Lord's sake.

II. The messenger by whom this answer was sent. It was not given him in a dream, nor by a voice from heaven, but an angel was sent on purpose, appearing in a human shape, to give this answer to Daniel. Gabriel is the only created angel that is named in scripture. It was he whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning. Daniel heard him called by his name, and thence learned it (Dan. viii. 16). This angel said to Zacharias, I am Gabriel (Luke i. 19). Note instructions received from the Father of lights to whom Daniel prayed (v. 23): At the beginning of thy supplications the word, the commandment, came forth from God. Perhaps it was at the beginning of Daniel's supplications that Cyrus's word, or commandment, went forth to restore and to build Jerusalem, v. 25. "The thing was done this very day; the proclamation of liberty to the Jews was signed this morning, just when thou wast praying for it." He touched him (v. 21) to give him a hint to break off his prayer. He talked with him (v. 22), familiarly, that his terror might not make him afraid. "I have come to show thee" (v. 23). He had shown him the troubles of the church under Antiochus, and the period of those troubles (ch. viii. 19); but now he has greater things to show him. "Nay, I have now come forth to give thee skill and understanding (v. 22), not only to show thee these things, but to make thee understand them." He assured him that he was a favourite of Heaven. I have come to show thee, for thou art greatly beloved. Those may reckon themselves greatly beloved of God to whom, and in whom, he reveals his Son.

III. The message itself was recorded with great exactness; but in it there are things dark and hard to be understood. Daniel, who understood by the prophet Jeremiah the expiration of the seventy years of the captivity, is now employed to make known to the church another more glorious release, at the end of seventy, not years, but weeks of years.

1. The times here determined are somewhat hard to be understood. In general, it is seventy weeks, that is, seventy times seven years, which makes just 490 years. The great affairs that are yet to come concerning the people of Israel, and the city of Jerusalem, will lie within the compass of these years. The land had enjoyed its sabbaths, in a melancholy sense, seventy years, Lev. xxvi. 34. But now the people of the Lord shall enjoy their sabbaths seven times seventy years, and in them seventy sabbatical years, which makes ten jubilees. Difficulties arise about these seventy weeks concerning the time when they commence and whence they are to be reckoned. They are here dated from that going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, v. 25. I should most incline to understand this of the edict of Cyrus mentioned Ezra i. 1. And it looks as though the seventy weeks should begin immediately upon the expiration of the seventy years, but by this reckoning the Persian monarchy, from the taking of Babylon by Cyrus to Alexander's conquest of Darius, lasted but 130 years; whereas, by the particular account given of the reigns of the Persian emperors, it is computed that it continued 230 years. So Thucydides, Xenophon, and others reckon. Mr. Poole, in his Latin Synopsis, has a vast and most elaborate collection of what has been said, pro and con, concerning the different beginnings of these weeks. Concerning the termination of them, interpreters are not agreed. Some make them to end at the death of Christ. But others think, because it is said that in the midst of the weeks (that is, the last of the seventy weeks) he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, they end three years and a half after the death of Christ. Concerning the division of them into seven weeks, and sixty-two weeks, and one week, the reason is as hard to account for as anything else. In the first seven weeks, or forty-nine years, the temple and city were built: and in the last single week Christ preached his gospel, by which the foundations were laid of the gospel city and temple. But, whatever uncertainty we may labour under concerning the exact fixing of these times, there is enough certain to answer the two great ends.

(1) It did serve them to raise and support the expectations of believers. By the light of this prophecy they were directed about what time to expect him. (2) It does serve still to refute and silence the expectations of unbelievers, who will not own that Jesus is he who should come, but still look for another. Reckon these seventy weeks from which of the commandments to build Jerusalem we please, it is certain that they have expired above 1,500 years ago. We are confirmed in our belief of the Messiah's being come, and that our Jesus is he.

2. The events here foretold are more easy to be understood.

(1) Concerning the return of the Jews now speedily to their own land, and their settlement again there: Let this be a comfort to the pious Jews, that a commandment shall go forth to restore and to build Jerusalem, v. 25. God will carry on his own work, will build up his Jerusalem, will beautify it, will fortify it, even in troublous times.

(2) Concerning the Messiah. The carnal Jews looked for a Messiah that should deliver them from the Roman yoke and give them temporal power and wealth, whereas they were here told that the Messiah should come upon another errand, purely spiritual. Christ came to take away sin. Sin had made a quarrel between God and man, had alienated man from God and provoked God against man; it was this that brought misery upon mankind. Christ undertakes to destroy the works of the devil. He does not say to finish your transgressions and your sins, but transgression and sin in general, for he is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world. He came, First, To finish transgression, to restrain it (so some), to break the power of it, and to set up a kingdom of holiness and love in the hearts of men. Secondly, To make an end of sin, to abolish it, to seal up sins (so the margin reads it), that they may not break out against us. Thirdly, To make reconciliation for iniquity, as by a sacrifice, to make peace and bring God and man together. He is not only the peace-maker, but the peace. He is the atonement. God might justly have made an end of the sin by making an end of the sinner; but Christ found out another way, and so made an end of sin as to save the sinner, by providing a righteousness for him. The merit of his sacrifice is our righteousness. By faith we apply this to ourselves and plead it with God, and our faith is imputed to us for righteousness, Rom. iv. 3, 5. He came to seal up the vision and prophecy, all the prophetical visions of the Old Testament, which had reference to the Messiah. He sealed them up, that is, he accomplished them. He is called Messiah (v. 25, 26), which signifies Christ—Anointed (John i. 41), because he received the unction both for himself and for all that are his. When Paul preaches the death of Christ, he says that he preached nothing but what the prophet said should come, Acts xxvi. 22, 23. And thus it behoved Christ to suffer. He must be cut off, but not for himself. It was to atone for our sins, and to purchase life for us, that he was cut off. He must cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease. By offering himself a sacrifice once for all he shall put an end to all the Levitical sacrifices.

(3) Concerning the final destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish church and nation; this follows immediately upon the cutting off of the Messiah, because it was the just punishment of those that put him to death. He died to take away the ceremonial law, to abolish that law of commandments. But the Jews would not be persuaded to quit it; they stoned Stephen for saying that Jesus should change the customs which Moses delivered them (Acts vi. 14). It is here foretold that the people of the prince that shall come shall be the instruments of this destruction, that is, the Roman armies, belonging to a monarchy yet to come. The city and sanctuary shall in a particular manner be destroyed and laid waste. Titus the Roman general would fain have saved the temple, but his soldiers were so enraged against the Jews that he could not restrain them from burning it to the ground. The sacrifice and oblation shall be made to cease. There shall be an overspreading of abominations, to be understood of the armies of the Romans. These are the words which Christ refers to, Matt. xxiv. 15, When you shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel, stand in the holy place, then let those who shall be in Judæa flee, which is explained Luke xxi. 20.

CHAP. X

This chapter and the two next make up one entire vision and prophecy, communicated to Daniel for the use of the church, not by signs and figures, as before (ch. vii and viii), but by express words. Daniel prayed daily, but had a vision only now and then. In this chapter we have things introductory to the prophecy, in the eleventh chapter particular predictions, and ch. xii the conclusion of it. This chapter shows us, I. Daniel's solemn fasting and humiliation, before he had this vision, ver. 1–3. II. A glorious appearance of the Son of God to him, ver. 4–9. III. The encouragement given him to expect such a discovery of future events as should be useful to others and to himself, and that he should be enabled to understand the meaning of this discovery, ver. 10–21.

Verses 1–9

This vision is dated in the third year of Cyrus, that is, of his reign after the conquest of Babylon, his third year since Daniel became acquainted with him.

I. A general idea of this prophecy (v. 1): The thing was true. But the time appointed was long; to the end of the reign of Antiochus was 300 years. This prophecy looks in type as far forward as the end of the world and the resurrection of the dead; and then he might well say, The time appointed was long.

II. An account of Daniel's mortification of himself before he had this vision. He was mourning full three weeks (v. 2), for his own sins and the sins of his people, and their sorrows. Some think that the occasion of his mourning was the slothfulness of many of the Jews, who, though they had liberty to return to their own land, continued still in the land of their captivity. Others think that it was because he heard of the obstruction given to the building of the temple by the enemies of the Jews, who hired counsellors against them, to frustrate their purpose (Ezra iv. 4, 5), all the days of Cyrus. Daniel ate no flesh, drank no wine, nor anointed himself, for these three weeks' time, v. 3.

III. A description of that glorious person whom Daniel saw in vision, which, it is generally agreed, could be no other than Christ himself, the eternal Word. He was by the side of the river Hiddekel (v. 4), probably walking in contemplation, as Isaac walked in the field, to meditate. There he looked up and saw even the man Christ Jesus (v. 5–6). His attendants saw not the vision. Paul's companions were aware of the light, but saw no man, Acts ix. 7; xxii. 9. But, though they saw not the vision, a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves, probably among the willows that grew by the river's side. Daniel saw it alone, but he was not able to bear the sight of it. It overwhelmed his spirit, so that there remained no strength in him, v. 8. But, though Daniel was thus dispirited with the vision of Christ, yet he heard the voice of his words and knew what he said. When the vision of Christ terrified Daniel the voice of his words composed him, and laid him to sleep in a holy security and serenity of mind: When I heard the voice of his words I fell into a slumber, a sweet slumber, on my face, and my face towards the ground.

Daniel is by degrees brought to himself.

I. The hand that touched him set him at first upon his knees and the palms of his hands, v. 10. Afterwards he is helped up, but he stands trembling (v. 11), for fear lest he fall again. Before God gives strength and power unto his people he makes them sensible of their own weakness. At length he recovered, not only the use of his feet, but the use of his tongue; and, when he opened his mouth (v. 16), that which he had to say was to excuse his having been so long silent. "My sorrows are turned upon me." And again (v. 17), half dead with fright, "As for me, straightway there remained no strength in me to receive these displays of the divine glory and these discoveries of the divine will; nay, there is no breath left in me."

II. The angel that was employed by Christ to converse with him gave him all the encouragement and comfort that could be. Christ himself comforted John when he in a like case fell at his feet as dead (Rev. i. 17); but here he did it by the angel.

1. He lent him his hand to help him (v. 10), else he would still have lain grovelling, touched his lips (v. 16), else he would have been still dumb; again he touched him (v. 18), and put strength into him. One touch from heaven brings us to our knees, sets us on our feet, opens our lips, and strengthens us; for it is God that works on us, and works in us, both to will and to do that which is good.

2. He assured him of the favour God had for him: Thou art a man greatly beloved (v. 11); and again (v. 19), O man greatly beloved! Those are greatly beloved indeed whom God loves; and it is comfort enough to know it.

3. He silenced his fears, and encouraged his hopes, with good words and comfortable words. Fear not, Daniel (v. 12); and again (v. 19), O man greatly beloved! fear not; peace be unto thee; be strong, yea, be strong. And now that Daniel has experienced the efficacy of God's strengthening word and grace, he is ready for anything.

4. He assured him that his fastings and prayers had come up for a memorial before God, Fear not, Daniel, v. 12. From the first day that we begin to look towards God in a way of duty he is ready to meet us in a way of mercy.

5. On what errand did this angel come to Daniel? He tells him (v. 14): I have come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days. That which the angel is entrusted to communicate to Daniel, and which Daniel is encouraged to expect from him, is not speculation, though he is an angel, but what he has received from the Lord. It was the revelation of Jesus Christ that the angel gave to St. John to be delivered to the churches, Rev. i. 1. So here (v. 21): I will show thee what is written in the scriptures of truth. The decree of God is a thing written, it is a scripture which remains and cannot be altered.

6. He gave him a general account of the adversaries of the church's cause. (1) The kings of the earth are and will be its adversaries, Ps. ii. 2. The angel told Daniel that the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood him one and twenty days, just the three weeks that Daniel had been fasting and praying. This new king of Persia, by hindering the temple, had hindered those good tidings which otherwise he should have brought him. "When I have gone forth from the kings of Persia, when their monarchy is brought down for their unkindness to the Jews, then the prince of Grecia shall come," v. 20. The Grecian monarchy, though favourable to the Jews at first, as the Persian was, will yet come to be vexatious to them. (2) The God of heaven is, and will be, its protector. Gabriel resolves, when he has despatched this errand to Daniel, that he will return to fight with the prince of Persia, and will at length bring down that proud monarchy (v. 20). Here is Michael our prince, the great protector of the church: The first of the chief princes, v. 13. Some understand it of a created angel. Others think that Michael the archangel is no other than Christ himself, v. 5. He came to help me (v. 13); and there is none but he that holds with me in these things, v. 21. Christ is the church's prince; angels are not, Heb. ii. 5.

CHAP. XI

The angel Gabriel performs his promise made to Daniel in the foregoing chapter, that he would "show him what should befall his people in the latter days," according to that which was "written in the scriptures of truth." I. A brief prediction of the setting up of the Grecian monarchy upon the ruins of the Persian monarchy, ver. 1–4. II. A prediction of the affairs of the two kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, with reference to each other, ver. 5–20. III. Of the rise of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his actions and successes, ver. 21–29. IV. Of the great mischief that he should do to the Jewish nation and religion, and his contempt of all religion, ver. 30–39. V. Of his fall and ruin at last, ver. 40–45.

Verses 1–4

1. The angel Gabriel lets Daniel know the good service he has done to the Jewish nation (v. 1). Thus by the angel, and at the request of the watcher, the golden head was broken, and the axe laid to the root of the tree. God's care of his church formerly encourages us to depend upon him in further straits and difficulties. 2. He foretells the reign of four Persian kings (v. 2). (1) There shall stand up three kings in Persia, besides Darius, in whose reign this prophecy is dated, ch. ix. 1. Mr. Broughton makes these three to be Cyrus, Artaxasta or Artaxerxes, called by the Greeks Cambyses, and Ahasuerus that married Esther, called Darius son of Hystaspes. To these three the Persians gave these attributes—Cyrus was a father, Cambyses a master, and Darius a hoarder up. So Herodotus. (2) There shall be a fourth, far richer than them all, that is, Xerxes, of whose wealth the Greek authors take notice. By his strength (his vast army, consisting of 800,000 men at least) and his riches he stirred up all against the realm of Greece. Xerxes's expedition against Greece ended in shameful defeat. About thirty years after the first return from captivity, Darius, a young king, revived the building of the temple, owning the hand of God against his predecessors for hindering it, Ezra vi. 7. 3. He foretells Alexander's conquests and the partition of his kingdom, v. 3. He is that mighty king that shall stand up against the kings of Persia, shall rule with great dominion, and with despotic power, for he shall do according to his will. But (v. 4) his kingdom shall soon be broken, and divided into four parts, but not to his posterity. His kingdom was plucked up for others besides those of his own family. Arideus, his brother, was made king in Macedonia; Olympias, Alexander's mother, killed him, and poisoned Alexander's two sons, Hercules and Alexander. Thus was his family rooted out by its own hands.

I. The rise and power of two great kingdoms out of the remains of Alexander's conquests, v. 5. 1. Egypt was made considerable by Ptolemaeus Lagus, one of Alexander's captains. He is called the king of the south, that is, Egypt, v. 8, 42, 43. The countries that at first belonged to Ptolemy are Egypt, Phoenicia, Arabia, Libya, Ethiopia, &c. 2. The kingdom of Syria was set up by Seleucus Nicanor, or the conqueror; he was one of Alexander's princes, and the most powerful of all Alexander's successors. Ptolemy invaded Judæa, and took Jerusalem on a sabbath, pretending a friendly visit. Seleucus also gave disturbance to Judæa.

II. The fruitless attempt to unite these two kingdoms as iron and clay in Nebuchadnezzar's image (v. 6): "At the end of certain years, about seventy after Alexander's death, the Lagidae and the Seleucidae shall associate, but not in sincerity. Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, shall marry his daughter Berenice to Antiochus Theos, king of Syria," who had already a wife called Laodice. "Berenice shall come to the king of the north, to make an agreement, but she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither she nor her posterity shall establish themselves in the kingdom of the north, but she shall be given up and those that brought her." Antiochus divorced Berenice, took his former wife Laodice again, who poisoned him, procured Berenice and her son to be murdered, and set up her own son by Antiochus to be king, who was called Seleucus Callinicus.

III. A war between the two kingdoms, v. 7, 8. A branch from the same root with Berenice shall stand up in his estate. Ptolemaeus Euergetes, the son of Ptolemaeus Philadelphus, shall come against Seleucus Callinicus, king of Syria, to avenge his sister's quarrel, and shall prevail; and shall carry away rich booty into Egypt, and shall continue more years than the king of the north. But (v. 9) he shall be forced to come into his kingdom and return into his own land, to keep peace there.

IV. The long reign of Antiochus the Great, king of Syria. Seleucus Callinicus, that king of the north that was overcome (v. 7) and died miserably, left two sons, Seleucus and Antiochus; these are the sons of the king of the north, that shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces, to recover what their father had lost, v. 10. But Seleucus the elder was poisoned, and reigned only two years; and his brother Antiochus succeeded him, who reigned thirty-seven years, and was called the Great. 1. The king of the south, in this war, shall at first have great success. Ptolemaeus Philopater, moved with indignation at the indignities done by Antiochus the Great, shall come forth, and fight with him, and shall bring a vast army. And the other multitude, the army of Antiochus, shall be given into his hand. Ptolemaeus Philopater, having gained this victory, his heart was lifted up; he went into the temple at Jerusalem, and entered the most holy place. 2. The king of the north, Antiochus the Great, shall return with a greater army than the former; and, at the end of times (that is, years) he shall come with a mighty army, and great riches, against the king of the south, that is, Ptolemaeus Epiphanes, who succeeded Ptolemaeus Philopater his father. In this expedition he had powerful allies (v. 14): Philip of Macedon was confederate with Antiochus against the king of Egypt. Antiochus routed him, destroyed a great part of his army; whereupon the Jews joined with him, helped him to besiege Ptolemaeus's garrisons. Then the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision, but they shall fall, and shall come to nothing, v. 14. Hereupon (v. 15) the king of the north, this same Antiochus, shall carry on his design against the king of the south another way. (1) He shall surprise his strongholds; all that he has got in Syria and Samaria, and the king of Egypt, shall not be able to withstand him. (2) He shall make himself master of the land of Judæa (v. 16): He that comes against him (that is, the king of the north) shall carry all before him; so the land of Israel was wasted and consumed. The land of Judæa lay between these two potent kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, so that in all the struggles between them that was sure to suffer. (3) He shall still push on his war against the king of Egypt, and set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, taking advantage of the infancy of Ptolemy Epiphanes, v. 17. (4) His war with the Romans (v. 18): He shall turn his face to the isles (v. 18), Greece and Italy. He took many of the isles about the Hellespont, but a prince, or state (so some), shall return his reproach upon himself. This was fulfilled when the two Scipios were sent with an army against Antiochus, and gave him a total defeat. Thus he caused the reproach offered by him to cease.

(5) His fall. When he was routed by the Romans, and was forced to abandon to them all he had in Europe, he turned to his own land, and, to raise money to pay his tribute, he plundered a temple of Jupiter, which so incensed his own subjects against him that they killed him; so he fell, and was no more found, v. 19. (6) His next successor, v. 20. There rose up one in his place, a raiser of taxes, a sender forth of the extortioner. Seleucus Philopater, the elder son of Antiochus the Great, was a great oppressor of his subjects, and exacted abundance of money from them. He likewise attempted to rob the temple at Jerusalem. But within a few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle, but poisoned by Heliodorus, one of his own servants.

V. From all this let us learn, 1. That God in his providence sets up one, and pulls down another, as he pleases. Some have called great men the foot-balls of fortune; or, rather, they are the tools of Providence. 2. This world is full of wars and fightings, which come from men's lusts.

All this is a prophecy of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, the little horn (ch. viii. 9); a sworn enemy to the Jewish religion, and a bitter persecutor. Some things in this prediction concerning Antiochus are alluded to in the New Testament predictions of the antichrist, especially v. 36, 37.

I. His character: He called himself Epiphanes—the illustrious. The heathen writers describe him as an odd-humoured man, boisterous, base and sordid. He would sometimes steal out of the court into the city, and herd with any infamous company in disguise; some took him to be silly, others to be mad. He is called a vile person, for he had been a hostage at Rome for the fidelity of his father when the Romans had subdued him.

II. His accession to the crown. By a trick he got his elder brother's son, Demetrius, to be sent a hostage to Rome, in exchange for him, and his elder brother being killed by Heliodorus (v. 20), he took the kingdom. The states of Syria did not give it to him (v. 21), but he came in peaceably, pretending to reign for his brother's son, Demetrius, then a hostage at Rome. But by flatteries he obtained the kingdom, crushed Heliodorus; even to the prince of the covenant, his nephew, the rightful heir, he pretended to covenant that he would resign whenever he should return, v. 22. But (v. 23) after the league made with him he shall work deceitfully, as one whose avowed maxim it is that princes ought not to be bound by their word any longer than it is for their interest. And with a small people, that at first cleave to him, he shall become strong, and (v. 24) he shall enter peaceably upon the fattest places of the kingdom of Syria, shall scatter among the people the prey, and the spoil, and riches, to insinuate himself into their affections; but, at the same time, he shall forecast his devices against the strongholds, to make himself master of them. When he has got the garrisons into his hands he will scatter his spoil no more, but rule by force.

III. His war with Egypt, his second expedition thither, is described, v. 25, 27. Antiochus shall stir up his power and courage against Ptolemaeus Philometer king of Egypt. Ptolemy, thereupon, shall be stirred up to battle against him. Antiochus's army shall overthrow the Egyptian army. The king of Egypt shall be betrayed by his own counsellors. After the battle, a treaty of peace shall be set on foot, and these two kings shall meet but they shall neither of them be sincere in it. And then no marvel that it shall not prosper. The peace shall not last.

IV. Another expedition against Egypt. From the former he returned with great riches (v. 28), and therefore took the first occasion to invade Egypt again, two years after, v. 29. But this attempt shall not succeed, for (v. 30) the ships of Chittim shall come against him, that is, the navy of the Romans, or ambassadors from the Roman senate, who came in ships. Ptolemaeus Philometer, king of Egypt, being now in a strict alliance with the Romans, craved their aid against Antiochus, who had besieged him and his mother Cleopatra in the city of Alexandria. The Roman senate thereupon sent an embassy to Antiochus, to command him to raise the siege, and, fearing the Roman power, he was forced to give orders for the raising of the siege and the retreat of his army out of Egypt. So Livy and others relate the story.

V. In his return from his expedition into Egypt, v. 28, he did exploits against the Jews; then he spoiled the city and temple. But the most terrible storm was in his return from Egypt, two years after, v. 30. Then he took Judæa in his way home; and, because he could not gain his point in Egypt by reason of the Romans interposing, he wreaked his revenge upon the Jews.

1. He had a rooted antipathy to the Jews' religion: His heart was against the holy covenant, v. 28. And (v. 30) he had indignation against the holy covenant. He hated the law of Moses and the worship of the true God, and was vexed at the privileges of the Jewish nation and the promises made to them.

2. He carried on his malicious designs against the Jews by the assistance of some apostate Jews. He kept up intelligence with those that forsook the holy covenant (v. 30). We read much in the book of the Maccabees of the mischief done to the Jews by these treacherous men of their own nation, Jason and Menelaus, and their party. "Such as do wickedly against the covenant, he shall corrupt with flatteries, to make use of them as decoys to draw in others," v. 32.

3. He profaned the temple. Arms stand on his part (v. 31), not only his own army, but deserters from the Jewish religion, and they polluted the sanctuary of strength. The story of this we have, 1 Mac. i. 21, &c. And (2 Mac. v. 15, &c.) Antiochus went into the most holy temple, Menelaus, that traitor to the laws and to his own country, being his guide. Antiochus took away the daily sacrifice, v. 31. Then he set up the abomination of desolation upon the altar (1 Mac. i. 54), even an idol altar (v. 59), and called the temple the temple of Jupiter Olympius, 2 Mac. vi. 2.

4. He persecuted those who retained their integrity. Though there are many who forsake the covenant, yet there is a people who do know their God, and they shall be strong and do exploits, v. 32. Good old Eleazar, one of the principal scribes, when he had swine's flesh thrust into his mouth, did bravely spit it out again, though he knew he must be tormented to death for so doing, 2 Mac. vi. 19. The mother and her seven sons were put to death for adhering to their religion, 2 Mac. vii. This might well be called doing exploits; for to choose suffering rather than sin is a great exploit. The right knowledge of God is the strength of the soul, and, in the strength of that, gracious souls do exploits. Concerning this people that knew their God, we are here told they shall instruct many, v. 33. They shall show others what they have learned of the difference between truth and falsehood, good and evil. Some understand this of a society newly erected for the propagating of divine knowledge, called Assideans, pietists (so the name signifies). They shall fall by the cruelty of Antiochus, shall be put to death by his rage. Their sufferings for righteousness' sake would try and purge the nation of the Jews. When they shall fall they shall not be utterly cast down, but they shall be holpen with a little help, v. 34. It is likewise foretold that many shall cleave to them with flatteries; when they see the Maccabees prosper some Jews shall join with them, but will only pretend friendship either with design to betray them or in hope to rise with them; but the fiery trial (v. 35) will separate between the precious and the vile. Though these troubles may continue long, yet they will have an end.

5. He grew insolent, and profane, and, being puffed up with his conquests, bade defiance to Heaven, and trampled upon everything that was sacred, v. 36. He shall impiously dishonour the God of Israel, called here the God of gods. He shall, in defiance of him, do according to his will against his people and his holy religion. This was fulfilled when Antiochus forbade sacrifices to be offered in God's temple, and ordered the sabbaths to be profaned, the sanctuary and the holy people to be polluted, &c., to the end that they might forget the law and change all the ordinances, and this upon pain of death, 1 Mac. i. 45. Antiochus did not regard any god, but magnified himself above all, v. 37. Thus he carried all before him, till the indignation was accomplished (v. 36). Antiochus shall not regard the god of his fathers; he made laws to abolish the religion of his country, and to bring in the idols of the Greeks. He shall set up an unknown god, a new god, v. 38. In his estate he shall honour the god of forces, a supposed deity of power, a god whom his fathers knew not, nor worshipped. This seems to be Jupiter Olympius, but never introduced among the Syrians till Antiochus introduced it. Thus shall he do in the most strongholds, in the temple of Jerusalem, which is called the sanctuary of strength (v. 31), and here the fortresses of munitions; there he shall set up the image of this strange god. Some by the Mahuzzim, or god of forces, that Antiochus shall worship, understand money, which is said to answer all things.

VI. Here seems to be another expedition into Egypt. Ptolemy, king of the south, pushes at him (v. 40), makes an attempt upon some of his territories, whereupon Antiochus, the king of the north, comes against him like a whirlwind, with incredible swiftness and fury, with chariots, and horses, and many ships, a great force. He shall come through countries, and shall overflow and pass over. In this flying march many countries shall be overthrown by him; and he shall enter into the glorious land, the land of Israel. Some shall escape his fury, particularly Edom and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon, v. 41. But the land of Egypt shall not escape. He shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and all the precious things of Egypt, v. 43.

VII. Here is a prediction of the fall and ruin of Antiochus, as before (ch. viii. 25), when he is in the height of his honour, tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him, v. 44. This obliged him to drop the enterprises he had in hand, and to go against the Persians and Parthians. Now comes the last effort of his rage against the Jews. When he finds himself perplexed and embarrassed in his affairs he shall go forth with great fury to destroy and utterly to make away many, v. 44. When impiety grows very impudent we may see its ruin near. He shall come to his end and none shall help him. This is the same with that which was foretold ch. viii. 25 (He shall be broken without hand).

CHAP. XII

After the prediction of the troubles of the Jews under Antiochus, prefiguring the troubles of the Christian church under the anti-christian power, we have here, I. Comforts for the support of God's people in those times of trouble, ver. 1–4. II. A conference between Christ and an angel concerning the time of these events, ver. 5–7. III. Daniel's enquiry for his own satisfaction, ver. 8. And the answer he received to that enquiry, ver. 9–13.

I. Jesus Christ shall appear his church's patron and protector: At that time, when the persecution is at the hottest, Michael shall stand up, v. 1. Christ is that great prince. At that time Michael shall stand up for the working out of our eternal salvation; the Son of God shall be incarnate, shall be manifested to destroy the works of the devil. Christ stood for the children of our people when he was made sin and a curse for them, stood in their stead as a sacrifice, bore the curse for them, to bear it from them.

II. When Christ appears he will recompense tribulation to those that trouble his people. There shall be a time of trouble, threatening to all. This is applicable, 1. To the destruction of Jerusalem, which Christ calls such a great tribulation as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, Matt. xxiv. 21. Or, 2. To the judgment of the great day, that will be such a day of trouble as never was to all those whom Michael our prince stands against.

III. He will work salvation for his people: "At that time thy people shall be delivered from the mischief and ruin designed them by Antiochus."

IV. There shall be a resurrection of those that sleep in the dust, v. 2. 1. When God works deliverance for his people from persecution it is a kind of resurrection; so the Jews' release out of Babylon was represented in vision (Ezek. xxxvii) and so the deliverance of the Jews from Antiochus, they were as life from the dead. 2. When, upon the appearing of Michael our prince, his gospel is preached, many of those who sleep in the dust, both Jews and Gentiles, shall be awakened by it to take upon them a profession of religion. But, 3. It must be meant of the general resurrection at the last day: The multitude of those that sleep in the dust shall awake.

V. There shall be glorious reward conferred on those who, in the day of trouble and distress, being themselves wise, did instruct many. They should do eminent service, and yet should fall by the sword and by flame; now, if there were not another life after this, they would be of all men most miserable, and therefore we are here assured that they shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just (v. 3). Those that turn men to righteousness, that turn sinners from the errors of their ways and help to save their souls from death (Jas. v. 20), will share in the glory of those they have helped to heaven, which will be a great addition to their own glory.

VI. This prophecy of those times, though sealed up now, would be of great use to those that should live then, v. 4. Daniel must now shut up the words and seal the book because the time would be long ere these things would be accomplished. He must keep it safely, as a treasure of great value, laid up for the ages to come. Those things of God which are now dark and obscure will hereafter be made clear, and easy to be understood. Truth is the daughter of time. Scripture prophecies will be expounded by the accomplishment of them.

Daniel had been made to foresee the amazing revolutions of states and kingdoms, as far as the Israel of God was concerned in them; in them he foresaw troublous times to the church. When shall the end be? And, What shall the end be?

I. The question, When shall the end be? is asked by an angel, v. 5, 6. Daniel had had discourse with the angel Gabriel, and now he looks, and behold other two (v. 5), two angels that he had not seen before, one upon the bank of the river on one side and the other on the other side. Christ stood on the waters of the river (v. 6), between the banks of Ulai. Daniel had not seen them before, but now, when they began to speak, he looked up, and saw them. The question was put, to the man clothed in linen, of whom we read before (ch. x. 5), to Christ our great high priest, who was upon the waters of the river. The angel asked as one concerned, How long shall it be? What is the time for the end of these wonders, these suffering trying times, that are to pass over the people of God? Here is a general account given to the angel that made the enquiry (v. 7). They shall continue for a time, times, and a half, that is, a year, two years, and half a year, as was before intimated (ch. vii. 25). Some understand it indefinitely, a certain time for an uncertain; it shall be for a time (a considerable time), for times (a longer time yet), and yet but half a time; when it is over it shall seem not half so much as was feared. But it is rather to be taken for a certain time; we meet with it in the Revelation, sometimes of three days and a half, put for three years and a half, sometimes forty-two months, sometimes 1,260 days. This Mighty One that Daniel saw stood with both feet on the water, and swore with both hands lifted up. God's time to succour and relieve his people is when their affairs are brought to the last extremity; in the mount of the Lord it shall be seen that Isaac is saved just when he lies ready to be sacrificed. Now the event answered the prediction; Josephus says that Antiochus surprised Jerusalem and held it three years and six months, and was then cast out of the country by the Maccabees. Christ's public ministry continued three years and a half, during which time he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself, and lived in poverty and disgrace; and then, when at his death, his enemies triumphed over him, he obtained the most glorious victory and said, It is finished. Here is something added more particularly concerning the time of the continuance of those troubles, in what is said to Daniel, v. 11, 12. The time of the trouble is to be dated, from the taking away of the daily sacrifice by Antiochus, and the setting up of the image of Jupiter upon the altar, which was the abomination of desolation. Their trouble shall last 1,290 days, three years and seven months, or (as some reckon) three years, six months, and fifteen days; and then it is probable, the daily sacrifice was restored, and the abomination of desolation taken away. It appears that the beginning of the trouble was in the 145th year of the Seleucidae, and the end of it in the 148th year. Thus we may learn, First, That there is a time fixed for the termination of the church's troubles, and the bringing about of her deliverance. Secondly, That this time must be waited for with faith and patience. Thirdly, That, when it comes, it will abundantly recompense us for our long expectation.

II. The question, What shall the end be? is asked by Daniel. Daniel asked this question because, though he heard what was said to the angel, yet he did not understand it, v. 8. He directs his enquiry not to the angel that talked with him, but immediately to Christ. When we take a view of the affairs of this world, and of the church of God in it, we see things move as if they would end in the utter ruin of God's kingdom among men. When we see vice and impiety, the decay of religion, the sufferings of the righteous, and the triumphs of the ungodly, we may well ask, O my Lord! what will be the end of these things? Daniel must content himself with the discoveries that had been made to him: "Go thy way, Daniel. Go thy way, and record what thou hast seen and heard, for the benefit of posterity, and covet not to see and hear more at present." He must not expect that what had been said to him would be fully understood till it was accomplished. As long as the world stands, there will still be in it a mixture of good and bad, v. 10. Bad men will do bad things; and a corrupt tree will never bring forth good fruit. Wicked practices are the natural products of wicked principles and dispositions. We are told, before, that the wicked will do wickedly. They will not understand; they shut their eyes against the light, and none so blind as those that will not see. Wilful sin is the effect of wilful ignorance; they will not understand because they are wicked; they hate the light, and come not to the light, because their deeds are evil, John iii. 19. Yet, bad as the world is, God will secure to himself a remnant of good people in it. There shall be many, to whom the providences and ordinances of God shall be a savour of life unto life. Many shall be purified, and made white, and tried, by their troubles (compare ch. xi. 35). The word of God shall do them good. When the wicked understand not, but stumble at the word, the wise shall understand. Those who are governed by the divine law and love shall be illuminated with a divine light. For if any man will do his will he shall know the truth, John vii. 17. Time and days will have an end; not only our time and days will end very shortly, but all times and days will have an end at length; yet a little while, and time shall be no more, but all its revolutions will be numbered and finished. It was a comfort to Daniel, it is a comfort to all the saints, that, whatever their lot is in the days of time, they shall have a happy lot in the end of the days. A believing hope and prospect of a blessed lot in the heavenly Canaan, at the end of the days, will furnish us with living comforts in dying moments.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET HOSEA

I. The twelve minor prophets were sometimes grouped together as one book. They are called the minor prophets, not because their writings are of less authority than those of the greater prophets, but only because they are shorter. These prophets preached as much as the others, but did not write so much. These twelve, Josephus says, were put into one volume by the men of the great synagogue in Ezra's time. These are the fragments of prophecy carefully gathered up by the divine Providence and the care of the church. Nine of these prophets prophesied before the captivity, and the last three after the return of the Jews to their own land. Some difference there is in the order of these books. We place them as the ancient Hebrew did; and all agree to put Hosea first; but the ancient Septuagint places the first six in this order—Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, and Jonah. The thing is not material.

II. The prophecy of Hosea, who was the first of all the writing prophets. The ancients say, He was of Beth-shemesh, and of the tribe of Issachar. He continued very long a prophet; so that, as Jerome observes, he prophesied of the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes, and lived himself to see and lament it. The scope of his prophecy is to discover sin, and to denounce the judgments of God against a people that would not be reformed. The style is concise and in some places it seems like the book of Proverbs, without connexion, and rather to be called Hosea's sayings than Hosea's sermons.

CHAP. I

The mind of God is revealed to this prophet, and by him to the people, in the first three chapters, by signs and types, but afterwards only by discourse. In this chapter we have, I. The title ver. 1. II. Some particular instructions which he was ordered to give to the people of God. 1. He must convince them of their sin in going a-whoring from God, ver. 2, 3. 2. He must foretell the ruin coming upon them for their sin, in the names of his sons, ver. 4–6, 8, 9. 3. He must speak comfortably to the kingdom of Judah, which still retained the pure worship of God, ver. 7. 4. The great mercy God had in store for Israel and Judah, in the latter days (ver. 10, 11).

Verse 1

1. The prophet's name, which he prefixes to his prophecy. His name, Hosea, or Hoshea (the same as Joshua's original name), signifies a saviour. His surname was Ben-Beeri, or the son of Beeri. Beeri signifies a well, which may put us in mind of living waters from which prophets must be continually drawing. 2. His authority and commission: The word of the Lord came to him. What he said and wrote was by divine inspiration. Therefore this book was received among the canonical books of the Old Testament, which is confirmed by what is quoted out of it in the New Testament, Matt. ii. 15; ix. 13; xii. 7; Rom. ix. 25, 26; 1 Pet. ii. 10. 3. Here is a particular account of the times in which he prophesied—in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel. Now by this account given of the reigns in which Hosea prophesied it appears that he prophesied a long time, that he began when he was young, and that he continued till he was very old. And yet the longer they enjoyed him the less they regarded him; they despised his youth first, and afterwards his age. Some of these kings were good, and encouraged him; others were bad, and frowned upon him and discouraged him; and yet he was still the same. He began to prophesy in Israel at a time when their kingdom was in a prosperous condition, as in the reign of Jeroboam the second, 2 Kings xiv. 25, yet then Hosea boldly tells them of their sins and foretells their destruction.

Verses 2–7

The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea, may refer either, 1. To that glorious set of prophets which was raised up. About this time there lived and prophesied Joel, Amos, Micah, Jonah, Obadiah, and Isaiah; but Hosea was the first of them that foretold the destruction of Israel. Or, rather, 2. To Hosea's own prophecies. This was the first message God sent him upon to this people, to tell them that they were an evil and an adulterous generation. He might have desired to be excused till he had gained authority and some interest in their affections. No; he must begin with this, that they might know what to expect from a prophet of the Lord.

I. The prophet must, as it were in a looking-glass, show them their sin. The prophet is ordered to take unto him a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms, v. 2. And he did so, v. 3. He married a woman of ill fame, Gomer the daughter of Diblaim, one that had lived scandalously in the single state. To marry such a one was not prudent, and therefore forbidden to the priests, and would be an affliction to the prophet, but not a sin. But most commentators think that it was done in vision, or that it is no more than a parable. He must take a wife of whoredoms, and have such children by her as everyone would suspect, though born in wedlock, to be children of whoredoms. "Now" (saith God) "Hosea, this people is to me such a dishonour, and such a grief and vexation, as a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms would be to thee. For the land has committed great whoredoms." Their idolatry especially is the whoredom they are here charged with. Idolatry is great whoredom, worse than any other; it is departing from the Lord. The land has committed whoredom; the whole land is polluted with it. Is it not offensive to the holy God to have such a people as this to be called by his name and have a place in his house? It was as if he should have married Gomer the daughter of Diblaim, a noted harlot. The land of Israel was like Gomer the daughter of Diblaim. Gomer signifies corruption; Diblaim signifies two cakes, or lumps of figs; this denotes that Israel was near to ruin, and that their luxury and sensuality were the cause of it. It intimates sin to be the daughter of plenty and destruction the daughter of the abuse of plenty.

II. The prophet must, as it were through a perspective glass, show them their ruin; and this he does in the names given to the children born of this adulteress.

1. He foretells the fall of the royal family in the name he is appointed to give to his first child, which was a son: Call his name Jezreel, v. 4. Jezreel signifies the seed of God, but it signifies also the scattered of God. Call them not Israel, which signifies dominion, but call them Jezreel, which signified dispersion. I will revenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, the blood which Jehu shed when he destroyed the house of Ahab, with all the worshippers of Baal. God approved of what he did (2 Kings x. 30). Yet here God will avenge that blood upon the house of Jehu, when the time has expired during which it was promised that his family should reign. It was the execution of a righteous sentence passed upon the house of Ahab, and, as such, it was rewarded; but Jehu did it not in a right manner. He did it with a malice against the sinners, but not with any antipathy to the sin; for he kept up the worship of the golden calves, 2 Kings x. 31. And therefore when God came to reckon with them, the first article in the account is for the blood of the house of Ahab, here called the blood of Jezreel. Some make those words, I will visit, or appoint, the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, to signify, not the revenging of that bloodshed, but the repeating of that bloodshed: "I will punish the house of Jehu, as I punished the house of Ahab." After the death of Zechariah, the last of the house of Jehu, the kingdom of the ten tribes went to decay. And, in order to the ruin of it, it is threatened (v. 5), I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel. The breaking of the bow intimates a sinking ruined power.

2. He foretells God's abandoning the whole nation in the name he gives to the second child. Call the name of this daughter Lo-ruhamah—not beloved, Rom. ix. 25, or not having obtained mercy, 1 Pet. ii. 10. This intimates that God had shown them great mercy, but they had abused his favours, and forfeited them. Though God has borne long, he will not bear always, with a people that hate to be reformed.

III. He must show them what mercy God had in store for the house of Judah, at the same time that he was thus contending with the house of Israel (v. 7): But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah. When the Assyrian armies had destroyed Samaria, and carried the ten tribes away into captivity, they proceeded to besiege Jerusalem; but God had mercy on the house of Judah, and saved them by the vast slaughter which an angel made, in one night, in the camp of the Assyrians; then they were saved by the Lord their God, and not by sword or bow. This may refer also to the salvation of Judah from idolatry, which qualified and prepared them for their other salvations. Just at the time that the kingdom of Israel was utterly taken away, under Hoshea, the kingdom of Judah was gloriously reformed, under Hezekiah; and in Babylon God saved them from their idolatry first, and then from their captivity. Some make this promise to look forward to the great salvation which, in the fulness of time, was to be wrought out by the Lord our God, Jesus Christ.

I. The rejection of Israel for a time is signified by the name of another child that Hosea had by his adulterous spouse, v. 8, 9. When she had weaned her daughter, she conceived and bore a son. Some think that her bearing another son signifies that people's persisting in their wickedness; lust still conceived and brought forth sin. The name given him: Call him Lo-ammi—Not my people. When they were told that God would no more have mercy on them they regarded it not, but buoyed up themselves with this conceit, that they were God's people, whom he could not but have mercy on. And therefore he plucks that staff from under them, and disowns all relation to them: You are not my people, and I will not be your God. This was fulfilled in Israel when they were utterly taken away into the land of Assyria. They were no longer God's people; no prophets were sent to them, no promises made to them, as were to the two tribes in their captivity.

II. Of the reduction and restoration of Israel in the fulness of time. Here, as before, mercy is remembered in the midst of wrath; the rejection, as it shall not be total, so it shall not be final (v. 10, 11).

1. Some think that these promises had their accomplishment in the return of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, when many of the ten tribes joined themselves to Judah, and came out of the countries into which they were dispersed, to their own land, appointed Zerubbabel, their head, and coalesced into one people. And in their own land God would by his prophets own them as his children.

2. Some think that these promises will not have their accomplishment in full, till the general conversion of the Jews in the latter days.

3. This promise had its accomplishment in the setting up of the kingdom of Christ, and the bringing in both of Jews and Gentiles (Rom. ix. 25, 26 and 1 Pet. ii. 10). This Israel shall greatly multiply. Though Israel according to the flesh be diminished, the spiritual Israel shall be innumerable. In the multitudes that by the preaching of the gospel have been brought to Christ, in the first ages of Christianity and ever since, this promise is fulfilled, Rev. vii. 4, 9; Gal. iv. 27. God will renew his covenant with the gospel-Israel, and will incorporate it a church by as full a charter as that whereby the Old Testament church was incorporated. The abandoned Gentiles in their respective places, and the rejected Jews in theirs, shall be blessed. There, where the fathers were cast off for their unbelief, the children, upon their believing, shall be taken in. The privilege is enlarged; now it is not only, You are my people, as formerly, but You are the sons of the living God, whether by birth you were Jews or Gentiles. They were as children under age; now, under the gospel, they have grown up to greater understanding and greater liberty, Gal. iv. 1, 2. The sonship of believers shall be acknowledged; You are the sons of the living God. It will add to their honour, when they are dignified with the tokens of God's favour in that very place where they had long lain under the tokens of his displeasure. Those who had been at variance should be happily brought together (v. 11): Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together. This uniting of Judah and Israel is mentioned only as a specimen, or one instance, of the happy effect of the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world. The first disciples were partly Jews and partly Galileans. When the Samaritans believed, though between them and the Jews there was a much greater enmity, yet in Christ there was a perfect unanimity, Acts viii. 14. By the death of Christ, the partition-wall of the ceremonial law was taken down. See Eph. ii. 14–16. Jesus Christ should be the centre of unity to all God's spiritual Israel. To believe in Christ is to appoint him our head, that is, to consent to God's appointment, and willingly commit ourselves to his guidance and government; all good Christians that make him their head, though they are many, yet in him they are one, and so become one with each other. Having appointed Christ for their head, they shall come up out of the land; they shall come, some of all sorts, from all parts. It denotes not a local remove (for they are said to be in the same place, v. 10), but a change of their mind, a spiritual ascent to Christ. When all this comes to pass, great shall be the day of Jezreel. Israel is here called Jezreel, the seed of God. This seed is now sown in the earth, and buried; but great shall be its day when the harvest comes.

CHAP. II

I. God, by the prophet, discovers to them the sin of their idolatry, their spiritual whoredom, ver. 1, 2, 5, 8. II. He threatens to take away from them all good things with which they had served their idols, ver. 3, 4, 6, 7, 9–13. III. Yet he promises at last to return in ways of mercy to them (ver. 14), to restore them to their former plenty (ver. 15), to cure them of their inclination to idolatry (ver. 16, 17), to renew his covenant with them (ver. 18–20), and to bless them with all good things, ver. 21–23.

The first words of this chapter some make the close of the foregoing chapter. When they shall have appointed Christ their head, "say to them, Ammi, and Ruhamah; call them so again, for they shall no longer lie under the reproach and doom of Lo-ammi and Lo-ruhamah; they shall now be my people again, and shall obtain mercy." The mother (v. 2) seems to be the same with the brethren and sisters (v. 1), the church of the ten tribes, and in a special manner the heads and leaders, who were as the mother by whom the rest were brought up and nursed. But who are the children that must plead with their mother thus? Either, 1. The godly that were among them, that witnessed against the iniquities of the times: let those that had not bowed the knee to Baal reason the case with those that had. Or, 2. The sufferers among them, that shared in the calamities of the times: let them not complain of God, nor lay the blame on him, as if he had dealt hardly with them, and not like a tender father. No; let them plead with their mother, and lay the fault on her, where it ought to be laid; compare Isa. l. 1.

I. They must put her in mind of the relation wherein she had stood to God, the kindness he had had for her. Let them tell their brethren and sisters that they had been Ammi and Ruhamah, God's people and vessels of his mercy.

II. They must charge her with the violation of the marriage-covenant between her and God. Tell her (v. 2) that she is not my wife, neither am I her husband, that by her spiritual whoredom she has forfeited her relation to God. They must charge this home upon her (v. 5): Their mother has played the harlot; their congregation has run after idols, wherein they were encouraged by their false prophets.

III. They must upbraid her with her ingratitude to God her benefactor, in ascribing to her idols the glory of the gifts he had given her, v. 5. She said, Whatever is offered to the contrary, I will go after my lovers, or those that cause me to love them. The Chaldee understands it of the nations whose alliance Israel courted, who supplied them with what they needed. "I will go after my lovers, because they give me my bread and my water, which are necessary to sustain the body, my wool and my flax, which are necessary to clothe the body, and pleasant things, my oil, and my drink, my liquors" (so the word is), "wine and strong drink." The idolaters made Ceres the goddess of their corn, Bacchus the god of their wine, &c., and then foolishly fancied they had their corn and wine from these, forgetting the Lord their God, who both gave them that good land and gave them power to get wealth out of it.

IV. God will disown her if she persist in her whoredoms, v. 2. Let her be convinced that it is possible for her to reform. True penitents will forsake both open sins and secret sins. They will both avoid the outward occasions of sin and mortify the inward disposition to it.

V. They must show her the utter ruin that will certainly be the consequence of her sin if she do not repent and reform (v. 3). She shall be starved, shall be deprived of her honours, her comforts and necessary supports. She shall be famished, shall be made as a wilderness and a dry land, and slain with thirst. Some understand it thus: I will make her as she was in the wilderness, and set her as she was in the desert land, where she was sometimes ready to perish for thirst. I will set her as in the day that she was born; for it was in the vast howling wilderness that Israel was first formed into a people.

I. They shall be perplexed and embarrassed in their counsels, and disappointed in their expectations. This is threatened, v. 6, 7. But to the threatening is annexed a promise that this shall be a means to convince them of their folly, and bring them home to their duty.

1. God will raise up difficulties and troubles: I will hedge up thy way with thorns. She said, "I will go after my lovers; I will pursue my leagues and alliances with foreign powers, and depend upon them." But God says, "She shall be frustrated in these projects, and not be able to proceed in them." She shall be as a traveller that finds no way at all to go forward. And then she shall follow after her lovers, but shall not overtake them; she shall endeavour to make an interest in the Assyrians and Egyptians, and to have them for her protectors, but she shall not gain her point. This is such a mercy, as Balaam met when the angel stood in his way, to hinder his going forward to curse Israel, Num. xxii. 22. Crosses and obstacles in an evil course are great blessings. They are God's hedges to restrain us from wandering, and to make the way of sin difficult.

2. These difficulties that God raises up in their way shall raise up in their minds thoughts of turning back. Two things are here extorted from this degenerate apostate people: (1) A just acknowledgment of the folly of their apostasy. (2) A good purpose, to come back again to their duty: I will go, and return to my first husband; and she knows so much of his goodness and readiness to forgive that she speaks without any doubt of his receiving her again.

II. The necessary supports and comforts of life shall be taken from them, because they had dishonoured God with them, v. 8, 9.

1. How graciously their plenty was given to them. God gave them not only corn but he multiplied their silver and gold, wherewith to traffic with other nations. He gave them wool and flax too, to cover their nakedness, Ezek. xvi. 10.

2. How basely their plenty was abused by them. (1) They robbed God of the honour of his gifts: She did not know that I gave her corn and wine; she did not remember it. (2) They served and honoured his enemies with them: They prepared them for Baal; they adorned their images with gold and silver (Jer. x. 4), and adorned themselves for the worship of their images, v. 13.

3. How justly their plenty should be taken from them: "Therefore will I return; I will alter my dealings with them, will take another course, and will take away my corn and other good things that I gave her." Those that abuse the mercies God gives them, to his dishonour, cannot expect to enjoy them long.

III. They shall lose all their honour, and be exposed to contempt (v. 10): "I will discover her lewdness, will bring to light her secret wickedness, to her shame. And this in the sight of her lovers, in the sight of the neighbouring nations, with whom she courted an alliance, and on whom she had a dependence; they shall not think her any longer worthy of their friendship." Those who will not deliver themselves into the hand of God's mercy cannot be delivered out of the hand of his justice.

IV. They shall lose all their pleasure, and shall be left melancholy (v. 11): I will cause her mirth to cease.

1. God will take away the occasions of their sacred mirth—their feast-days, their new moons, their sabbaths, and all their solemn feasts. These God instituted to be observed in a religious manner, and they were to be observed with rejoicing. They kept up the observance of these, not at God's temple at Jerusalem, for they had long since forsaken that, but probably at Dan and Bethel, where the calves were. Thus, when they had lost the power of godliness, yet, for the pleasing of a carnal mind, they kept up the form of it; and by this means their new-moons and their sabbaths became an iniquity which God could not away with, Isa. i. 13.

2. God will take away their provisions for these solemnities (v. 12): I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees. He will wither them with a blast, or bring in a foreign enemy that shall lay the country waste, so that their vineyards shall become a forest; the enclosures shall be thrown down, so that the beasts of the field shall eat their grapes and their figs. This shall be the ruin of their mirth: God will cause all her mirth to cease. "I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees, will take away her sensual pleasures, and then she will think herself undone indeed." This shall be the punishment of her idolatry (v. 13): "I will visit upon her the days of Baalim." The days of Baalim are the solemn festival days which they kept in honour of their idols. These were the days wherein she burnt incense to idols, and decked herself with her ear-rings and her jewels, that the honour she did to Baal might be thought the greater.

The state of Israel, restrained by the divine grace, looks bright and pleasant here, and the more surprisingly so as the promises follow thus close upon the threatenings. When it was said, She forgot me, one would think it should have followed, "Therefore I will abandon her, I will never look after her more." No, Therefore I will allure her. God's thoughts and ways of mercy are infinitely above ours, Isa. lvii. 17, 18. Because she will not be restrained by the denunciations of wrath, God will try whether she will be wrought upon by the offers of mercy. Some think it may be translated, Afterwards, or nevertheless, I will allure her. It comes all to one; the design is plainly to magnify free grace to those on whom God will have mercy purely for mercy's sake.

I. Though now Israel was ready to despair it should again be revived with comforts and hopes, v. 14, 15. This is expressed here with an allusion to God's dealings with that people when he brought them out of Egypt, through the wilderness to Canaan, in the day that they were born, v. 3. They shall be new-formed by such miracles of love and mercy as they were first-formed by. He will bring them into the wilderness, as he did when he brought them out of Egypt. The land of their captivity shall be to them now, as that wilderness was then, the furnace of affliction, in which God will choose them. When God delivered Israel out of Egypt he led them into the wilderness, to humble them and prove them, that he might do them good (Deut. viii. 2, 3, 15, 16), and so he will do again. Those whom God has mercy in store for he first brings into a wilderness—into solitude and retirement, that they may the more freely converse with him out of the noise of this world, and sometimes into outward distress and trouble, thereby to open the ear to discipline. He will then allure them and speak comfortably to them, will persuade them and speak to their hearts, that is, he will by his word and Spirit incline their hearts to return to him, and encourage them to do so. By the hand of my servants the prophets I will speak comfort to her heart; so the Chaldee. This refers to the offers of divine grace in the gospel, by which we are allured to forsake our sins and to turn to God. By the promise of rest in Christ we are invited to take his yoke upon us; and the work of conversion may be forwarded by comforts as well as by convictions. From that time and from that place where he has afflicted her, and brought her to see her folly, thenceforward he will do her good. He had destroyed her vines (v. 12), but now he will give her whole vineyards, and so she will be repaid; she shall not only have corn for necessity, but vineyards for delight. These denote the privileges and comforts of the gospel, which are prepared for those that come up out of the wilderness leaning upon Christ as their beloved, Cant. viii. 5. He will give her the valley of Achor for a door of hope. The valley of Achor was that in which Achan was stoned; it signifies the valley of trouble, because he troubled Israel, and there God troubled him. So when God returns to his people in mercy, and they to him in duty, it will be to them as happy an omen as anything. If they put away the accursed thing from among them, if by mortifying sin they stone the Achan that has troubled their camp, their subduing that enemy within themselves is an earnest to them of victory over all the kings of Canaan. She shall sing there as in the days of her youth. This plainly refers to that triumphant and prophetic song which Moses and the children of Israel sang at the Red Sea, Exod. xv. 1. When they are delivered out of captivity they shall repeat that song, and to them it shall be a new song.

II. Though they had been much addicted to the worship of Baal, they should now abandon all appearances of idolatry, and cleave to God only, v. 16, 17. The very names of Baalim shall be taken out of their mouths. Thus the apostle expresses the abhorrence we ought to have of all fleshly lusts: Let them not be once named among you, Eph. v. 3. God's grace in the heart will change the language by making that iniquity to be loathed which was beloved. The very word Baal shall be laid aside, even in its innocent signification. God says, Thou shalt call me Ishi, and call me no more Baali; both signify my husband, and both had been made use of concerning God. Isa. liv. 5, Thy Maker is thy husband, thy Baal (so the word is), thy patron, and protector.

III. Though they had been in continual troubles, as if the whole creation had been at war with them, now they shall enjoy perfect peace and tranquillity, as if they were in a league of friendship with the whole creation (v. 18). The inferior creatures shall do them no harm, as they had done when the beasts of the field ate up their vineyards (v. 12). God can make the beasts of the field to honour him (so he has promised, Isa. xliii. 20) and to contribute to his people's comfort. And it is our part of the covenant not to abuse them. But this is not all; men are more in danger from one another than from the brute beast, and therefore it is further promised that God will make wars to cease, will disarm the enemy: I will break the bow, and sword, and battle. He will do it for those whose ways please him, for he makes even their enemies to be at peace with them, Prov. xvi. 7. This agrees with the promise that in gospel-times swords shall be beaten into ploughshares, Isa. ii. 4.

IV. Though God had given them a bill of divorce for their whoredoms, yet, upon their repentance, he would again take them into a marriage-covenant, v. 19, 20. I will betroth thee unto me; and again, and a third time, I will betroth thee. All that are sincerely devoted to God are betrothed to him; God will love them, protect them, and provide for them. The covenant itself shall be inviolable; God will not break it on his part, and you shall not on yours; and the blessings of it shall be everlasting. "And," says God, "I will renew the covenant in righteousness." Will it not reflect upon his wisdom? "No," says God; "I will do it in judgment." In loving kindness and in mercies—God will deal tenderly and graciously in covenanting with them. It shall be a covenant of grace, made in a compassionate consideration of their infirmities. Thou shalt know the Lord. This is not only a promise that God will reveal himself to them more fully than ever, but that he will give them a heart to know him; they shall know him in another manner. They shall all be taught of God to know him.

V. Though the heavens had been to them as brass, and the earth as iron, now the heavens shall yield their dews, and by that means the earth its fruits, v. 21, 22. This promise of corn and wine is to be taken also in a spiritual sense: it is an effusion of those blessings and graces which relate to the soul that is here promised under the metaphor of temporal blessings, the dew of heaven, as well as the fatness of the earth, and that put first, as in the blessing of Jacob, Gen. xxvii. 28. "But," say the heavens, "we have no rain to give unless he who has the key of the clouds unlock them, and open these bottles; so that, if the Lord do not help you, we cannot." God will graciously take notice of their addresses to him. And then I will hear the heavens; I will answer them (so it may be read); and then they shall hear and answer the earth, and pour down seasonable rain upon it. See here the coherence of second causes with one another, as links in a chain, and the necessary dependence they all have upon God, the first Cause.

VI. That whereas they were now divided and scattered all the world over, God will turn this curse into a blessing: "I will not only water the earth for her, but will sow her unto me in the earth; like that of the seed in the field, wherever they are scattered they shall take root downward and bear fruit upward. The good seed are the children of the kingdom. I will sow her unto me." When in all parts of the world Christianity got footing, then this promise was fulfilled.

VII. That, whereas they had been Lo-ammi—not a people, and Lo-ruhamah—not finding mercy with God, now they shall be restored to his favour (v. 23). God had mercy on those who had not obtained mercy. God's mercy must not be despaired of anywhere on this side hell. He says to them, "Thou art my people, whom I will own and bless," and they shall say, "Thou art my God, whom I will serve and worship, and to whose honour I will be for ever devoted."

CHAP. III

God is still by the prophet inculcating the same thing upon this careless people by a sign, that of the dealings of a husband with an adulterous wife. I. The bad character which the people of Israel now had, ver. 1. II. The low condition which they should be reduced to by their captivity, ver. 2–4. III. The blessed reformation that should be wrought upon them in the latter days, ver. 5.

Verses 1–5

Some think that this chapter refers to Judah, the two tribes, as the adulteress the prophet married (ch. i. 3) represented the ten tribes. But the children of Israel were the ten tribes, and therefore it is more probable that of them this parable is to be understood.

I. In this parable we may observe, God's goodness and Israel's badness serving for a foil to each other, v. 1. Israel is as a woman beloved of her friend, and yet an adulteress; such is the case between God and Israel. If they were restrained from bowing the knee to idols, yet they had eyes full of that spiritual adultery. And they loved flagons of wine; they joined with idolaters because they lived merrily and drank hard. Idolatry and sensuality commonly go together. Their badness had not put an end to God's goodness. Such is my love to the children of Israel; it is love to the loveless, to the unlovely, to those that have a thousand times forfeited it. God humbles them (v. 2): I bought her to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and a homer and a half of barley, that is, I courted her to return to her first husband, as ch. ii. 14. But the present which the prophet brought her for the purchasing of her favour is a very small one; and in it she is reduced to a short allowance, and, to punish her for her pride, is made to look very mean. The prophet here visited his wife with fifteen pieces of silver, a small sum, till her husband thought fit to restore her to her first estate. She shall also have a homer and a half of barley, for bread-corn, and that is all she must expect till she be sufficiently humbled. God had given Egypt for Israel's ransom once, Isa. xliii. 3, 4. But now that they have gone a-whoring from him he will give but fifteen pieces of silver for them, so much have they lost in their value by their iniquity. Now see the new terms upon which God is willing to come (v. 3). They must be to him a people, and he will be to them a God. They must take to themselves the shame of their apostasy from him: Thou shalt abide for me many days in solitude and silence, as a widow that is desolate and in sorrow; they must lay aside their ornaments, and wait with patience and submission to know what God will do with them. It is not enough to take shame to ourselves for the sins we have committed, and to justify God in correcting us for them, but we must resolve, in the strength of God's grace, that we will not offend any more. In the land of their captivity they would be courted to worship the idols of the country; that would be a trial for them, a long trial, many days: "But if thou keep thy ground, and hold fast thy integrity, if, when all this comes upon thee, thou dost not stretch out thy hand to a strange god, thou wilt be qualified for the returns of God's favour."

II. In the last two verses we have the interpretation of the parable and the application of it to Israel. They shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince; and a nation in this condition may well be called a widow. They shall abide without a sacrifice, and without an image (or a statue, or pillar; the word is used concerning the pillars Jacob erected, Gen. xxviii. 18; xxxi. 45; xxxv. 20), and without an ephod and teraphim. The meaning is that in their captivity they should have no face of a nation upon them, no face of a church. They shall have no ephod, nor teraphim, no legal priesthood. This was the case of the Jews in their captivity; and it is so far the case of the scattered Jews at this day that, though they have their synagogues, they have no temple-service. They shall at length be received again as a wife (v. 5): Afterwards, in process of time, when they have gone through this discipline, they shall return. The Chaldee reads it, They shall seek the service of the Lord their God, and shall obey Messiah, the Son of David their king. Compare this with Jer. xxx. 9; Ezek. xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 25. They shall fear the Lord and his goodness. Some by his goodness here understand the temple, towards which they shall look, in worshipping God. The Jews say, There were three things—which Israel cast off in the days of Rehoboam—the kingdom of heaven, the family of David, and the house of the sanctuary. But it is rather to be taken for that attribute of God which he showed as his glory, and by which he proclaimed his name. It is not only the Lord and his greatness that we are to fear, but the Lord and his goodness, not only his majesty, but his mercy.

CHAP. IV

Prophets were sent to tell people of their faults, and to warn them of the judgments of God, so the prophet is employed in this and the following chapters as counsel for the King of kings, opening an indictment against the people of Israel. I. God's controversy with them, a general prevalency of vice and profaneness (ver. 1, 2), ignorance and forgetfulness of God (ver. 6, 7), the worldly-mindedness of the priests (ver. 8), drunkenness and uncleanness (ver. 11), divination and witchcraft (ver. 12), sacrifice in the high places (ver. 13), whoredoms (ver. 14, 18), and bribery among magistrates, ver. 18. II. He shows them what would be the consequences. God would punish them for these things, ver. 9. The whole land should be laid waste (ver. 3), all sorts of people cut off (ver. 5), their honour lost (ver. 7), their creature-comforts (ver. 10), and themselves made ashamed, ver. 19. And the sorest judgment of all, they should be let alone in their sins (ver. 17), they shall not reprove one another (ver. 4), God will not punish them (ver. 14), nay, he will let them prosper, ver. 16. III. He gives warning to Judah not to tread in the steps of Israel, ver. 15.

Verses 1–5

I. The court set, and attention demanded: "Hear the word of the Lord, you children of Israel." They will be ready enough to hear when God speaks comfortably to them; but are they willing to hear when he has a controversy with them?

II. The indictment read, by which the whole nation stands charged with crimes by which God is highly provoked. 1. They are charged with national omissions of the most important duties. The people seemed to have no sense at all of honesty. Much less had they any sense of mercy, or any obligation they were under to pity and help the poor. What good can be expected where there is no knowledge of God? Hence follow national commissions of enormous sins against both the first and second table. Swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, against the third, ninth, sixth, eighth, and seventh commandments, were to be found in all corners of the land, v. 2. They break out, that is, they transgress all bounds of reason and conscience, and the divine law. When they break out thus blood touches blood, murders are committed in all parts of the country. It was about this time that there was so much blood shed in grasping at the crown.

III. Sentence passed upon this guilty land, v. 3. It shall be utterly laid waste. The valleys are said to mourn when by war and famine they are made desolate. The destruction of the fruits of the earth shall be so great that there shall not be picking for the fowls of the air.

IV. The order (v. 4): Yet let no man strive nor reprove another, intimates that as long as there is any hope we ought to reprove sinners for their sins. Yet sometimes they are so hardened in sin that it will be to little purpose either to deal with them or to deal with God for them. Thy people are as those that strive with the priests. Those who rebel against ministerial reproof, which is an ordinance of God for their reformation, have forfeited the benefit of brotherly reproof too. Perhaps this may refer to the late wickedness of Joash king of Judah, and his people, who stoned Zechariah, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21. "Therefore, because thou wilt take no reproof, thou shalt stumble and fall in the day, and the prophet, the false prophet that flattered thee, shall fall with thee in the night; the darkness of the night shall not help to cover thee from trouble nor the light of the day help thee to flee from it." And did the children think that when they were in danger of falling their mother would help them? It shall be in vain to expect it, for I will destroy thy mother, Samaria, the mother-city, which is as a mother to every part. It shall all be made silent.

I. The people strove with the priests; justly therefore were they destroyed for lack of knowledge, v. 6. Those that rebel against the light can expect no other than to perish in the dark. Or it is a charge upon the priests, who should have been still teaching the people knowledge (Eccles. xii. 9), but they did not.

II. Both priests and people rejected knowledge; and justly therefore will God reject them. The reason why the people did not learn, and the priests did not teach, was not because they had not the light, but because they hated it.

III. They forgot the law of God, nor desired to transmit the remembrance of it to their posterity, and therefore will God forget them and their children, the people's children. Or it may be meant of the priests' children; they shall not succeed them in the priests' office, 1 Sam. ii. 20.

IV. They dishonoured God, v. 7. It was their honour that they were increased in number, wealth, power, and dignity. The beginning of their nation was small, but it greatly increased. But, as they were increased, so they sinned against God. Their wealth, honour, and power, did but make them the more daring in sin. Therefore, says God, will I change their glory into shame.

V. The priests ate up the sin of God's people, and therefore they shall eat and not have enough. They abused the maintenance that was allowed to the priests (v. 8). They set their hearts upon the people's iniquities; they lifted up their soul to them, that is, they were glad when people did commit iniquity, that they might be obliged to bring an offering to make atonement for it, of which they should have their share. God will therefore deny them his blessing upon their maintenance (v. 10): They shall eat and not have enough. Though they have great plenty by the abundance of offerings, yet they shall have no satisfaction in it.

VI. The more they increased the more they sinned (v. 7), and therefore though they commit whoredom, though they take the most wicked methods to multiply their people, yet they shall not increase.

VII. The people and the priests did harden one another in sin; and therefore justly shall they be sharers in the punishment (v. 9): There shall be, like people, like priest.

VIII. They indulged themselves in the delights of sense, to hold up their hearts; but they shall find that they take away their hearts (v. 11): Whoredom, and wine, and new wine take away the heart.

Verses 12–19

I. The sins charged upon the people of Israel. 1. Spiritual whoredom, or idolatry. They have in them a spirit of whoredoms, a strong inclination to that sin. So (v. 15) Israel has played the harlot; their conduct in the worship of their idols was like that of a harlot, wanton and impudent. And (v. 16). Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer, as an untamed heifer (so some), or as a perverse or refractory one (so others), as a heifer that is turned loose runs madly about the pasture, or, if put under the yoke (which seems rather to be alluded to here), will draw back instead of going forward, will struggle to get her neck out of the yoke and her feet out of the furrow. Thus unruly, ungovernable, untractable, were the people of Israel. My people ask counsel at their stocks, their wooden gods. They say to a stock, Thou art my father (Jer. ii. 27). (It is probable that this refers to wicked methods of divination by a piece of wood, or by a staff, like Nebuchadnezzar's divining by his arrows, Ezek. xxi. 21.) They offered sacrifice to them as gods (v. 13): to atone and pacify them, and burn incense to them, to please and gratify them. They chose places, upon the tops of the mountains and upon the hills, foolishly imagining that the height of the ground gave them some advantage in their approaches towards heaven; places, under oaks, and poplars, and elms, because the shadow thereof is pleasant to them, and they fancied that a thick shade possesses the mind with something of awe, and therefore is proper for devotion.

2. Corporal whoredom is another crime here charged upon them: They have committed whoredom continually, v. 18. They drove a trade of uncleanness. Their false gods drew them to it; for the devil whom they worshipped, though a spirit, is an unclean spirit. To punish them for that God gave up their wives and daughters to the like vile affections.

3. The perverting of justice, v. 18. Their rulers do love, Give ye, that is, they love bribes, and have it continually in their mouths. Justice, duly administered, is refreshing, like drink to the thirsty, but when it is perverted, and rulers take rewards either to acquit the guilty or to condemn the innocent, the drink is sour.

II. The tokens of God's wrath against them for their sins. I will not punish your daughters; and, not being punished for their sin, they would go on in it. The impunity of one sinner is sometimes made the punishment of another. They themselves should prosper for a while, but their prosperity should help to destroy them (v. 16): The Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place; but it shall be only to prepare them for the slaughter, as a lamb is that is so fed. But others make them feed as a lamb on the common, a large place indeed, but where it has short grass and lies exposed. The Shepherd of Israel will turn them both out of his pastures and out of his protection. "Ephraim is joined to idols, is in love with them and addicted to them, and therefore let him alone, as v. 4 and v. 17, Let no man reprove him." The father corrects not the rebellious son any more when he determines to disinherit him. Those that are not disturbed in their sin will be destroyed for their sin. They should be hurried away with a swift and shameful destruction (v. 19).

III. The warning given to Judah not to sin after the similitude of Israel's transgression. Though thou, Israel, play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend. This was a very needful caution. The men of Israel were near neighbours, more numerous, and prosperous. Judah has greater means of knowledge than Israel, has the temple and priesthood, and a king of the house of David; from Judah Shiloh is to come; therefore let not Judah offend, for more is expected from them than from Israel, and from them God will take it more unkindly. If Israel play the harlot, let not Judah do so too, for then God will have no professing people in the world. Come not you unto Gilgal, where all their wickedness was (ch. ix. 15; xii. 11); there they multiplied transgression (Amos iv. 4). And for the same reason they must not go up to Bethel, here called the house of vanity, for so Bethaven signifies, not the house of God, as Bethel signifies.

CHAP. V

I. They are called to hearken to the charge, ver. 1, 8. II. They are accused of many sins, which are here aggravated. 1. Persecution, ver. 1, 2. 2. Spiritual whoredom, ver. 3, 4. 3. Pride, ver. 5. 4. Apostasy from God, ver. 7. 5. The tyranny of the princes, and the tameness of the people in submitting to it, ver. 10, 11. III. They are threatened with God's displeasure for their sins (ver. 3) and he makes known his wrath against them for it, ver. 9. 1. They shall fall in their iniquity, ver. 5. 2. God will forsake them, ver. 6. 3. Their portions shall be devoured, ver. 7. 4. God will rebuke them, ver. 9, 10. 5. They shall be oppressed, ver. 11. 6. God will be as a moth to them in secret judgments (ver. 12) and as a lion in public judgments, ver. 14. IV. They are blamed for the wrong course they took under their afflictions, ver. 13. V. It is intimated that they shall at length take a right course, ver. 15.

Verses 1–7

I. All orders and degrees of men are cited (v. 1): Hear you this, O priests! "Hearken, you house of Israel, the common people, and give ear, O house of the king!" Let them all take notice, for they have all contributed to the national guilt, and shall share in the national judgments.

II. Witness is produced against them; it is God's omniscience (v. 3): I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hidden from me. They have not known the Lord (v. 4), but the Lord has known them.

III. They had been industrious to draw people either into sin or into trouble: You have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor (v. 1). They had been both crafty and cruel in carrying on their designs (v. 2): The revolters are profaned to make slaughter. They had committed whoredom, defiled their own bodies with fleshly lusts, defiled their own souls with the worship of idols, v. 3. They had no disposition at all to come into acquaintance and communion with God. The spirit of whoredoms, having caused them to err from him, keeps them wandering endlessly, v. 4. It is true we cannot by our own power, without the special grace of God, turn to him; but we may by the due improvement of our own faculties, and the common aids of his Spirit, frame our doings to turn to him. They were guilty of notorious arrogance, and insolence in sin (v. 5): The pride of Israel doth testify to his face in the gaiety and gaudiness of their worship, as a harlot is known by her attire, Prov. vii. 10. They departed from God to idols, and bred up their children in idolatry (v. 7). Those deal treacherously with God indeed who not only turn from following him themselves but train up their children in wicked ways.

IV. "Judgment is towards you. God is coming forth to contend with you, and to testify his displeasure against you for your sins." They shall fall in their iniquity. This follows upon their pride testifying to their face (v. 5). Therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity. They shall fall short of God's favour when they profess to seek it (v. 6): They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord, but in vain; they shall not find him. This seems to be spoken principally of Judah. They went as usual, at the solemn feasts, with their flocks and herds to seek the Lord; but their hearts were not entire for him. Those that go with their flocks and their herds only to seek the Lord, and not with their hearts and souls, cannot expect to find him, for his favour is not to be purchased with thousands of rams. They and their portions shall all be swallowed up. They have dealt treacherously against the Lord, but now shall a month devour them with their portions. By their portions is meant their idols, whom they chose for their portion instead of God. A month shall devour them. The judgments of God sometimes make quick work with a sinful people. A month devours more, and more portions, than many years can repair.

I. A loud alarm sounded, giving notice of judgments coming (v. 8): Blow you the cornet in Gibeah and in Ramah, two cities in the confines of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, Gibeah a frontier-town of the kingdom of Judah, Ramah of Israel; so that the warning is hereby sent into both kingdoms. "Cry aloud at Beth-aven, or Bethel." He had before spoken of the judgments as certain; here he speaks of them as near. The blowing of this cornet is explained, v. 9. Among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be, that which is true or certain, so the word is.

II. The ground of God's controversy. He has a quarrel with the princes of Judah, because they were daring leaders in sin, v. 10. They have encroached even upon God's rights, have trampled upon the distinctions between good and evil. Some have observed that the princes of Judah were more absolute, and assumed a more arbitrary power, than the princes of Israel did; now, for this, God has a controversy with them: I will pour out my wrath upon them like water. He has a quarrel with the people of Ephraim, because they were sneaking followers in sin (v. 11): He willingly walked after the commandment, that is, the commandment of Jeroboam and the succeeding kings of Israel, who obliged all their subjects by a law to worship the calves at Dan and Bethel, and never to go up to Jerusalem to worship. It is for this that Ephraim is oppressed and broken in judgment, has his civil rights and liberties broken. Nothing gives greater advantage to a mastiff-like tyranny, that is fierce and furious, than a spaniel-like submission, that is fawning and flattering.

III. The different methods that God would take both with Judah and Ephraim.

1. He would begin with less judgments, which should sometimes work silently and insensibly (v. 12): I will be unto Ephraim as a moth; they are unto Ephraim as a moth, for it is such a sickness as Ephraim now sees, v. 13. The judgments of God are sometimes to a sinful people as a moth, and as rottenness, or as a worm. Silently, so as they themselves shall not be sensible of it; they shall think themselves safe and thriving, but shall find themselves wasting and decaying. Slowly, and with long delays and intervals, that he may give them space to repent.

2. When it appeared that those had not done their work he would come upon them with greater (v. 14): I will be unto Ephraim as a lion, and to the house of Judah as a young lion. If less judgments prevail not to do their work, it may be expected that God will send greater. There is a more immediate work of God in some judgments than in others. I will tear, and go away.

IV. The different effects of those different methods. When God contended with them by less judgments they sought to creatures for relief, but sought in vain, v. 13. Then they sent to the Assyrian, to come to their assistance, made their court to king Jareb, which, some think, was one of the names of Tiglathpileser, king of Assyria, to whom both Israel and Judah applied for relief in their distress, hoping by an alliance to re-establish their declining interests. Carnal hearts, in time of trouble, see their sickness, but do not see the sin that is the cause of it. Instead of going the next way to the Creator, who could relieve them, they go to creatures, who can do them no service. The kings of Assyria, whom Judah and Israel sought unto, distressed them and helped them not, 2 Chron. xxviii. 16, 28. They had sent him a present (ch. x. 6), and, having so retained him, they doubted not of his fidelity to them; but he deceived them, Jer. xvii. 5, 6. When God brought greater judgments upon them, then they would at length be forced to apply to him, v. 15. I will go and return to my place, to heaven, or to the mercy-seat, the throne of grace. When God punishes sinners he comes out of his place (Isa. xxvi. 21); but, when he designs them favour, he returns to his place, where he waits to be gracious. He will bring them home to himself, by their afflictions, no longer withdraw from them. Two things are instances of their return: 1. Their penitent confession of sin: Till they acknowledge their offence; marg. Till they be guilty, that is, till they be sensible of their guilt, and humble themselves before God for it. When men begin to complain more of their sins than of their afflictions then there begins to be some hope of them. 2.Their humble petition for the favour of God: Till they seek my face. If they seek him thus, though it might be called seeking him late, yet it is not too late.

CHAP. VI

The closing words of the foregoing chapter gave us some hopes that God and his Israel, notwithstanding their sins and his wrath, might yet be happily brought together again. Now this chapter carries that matter further. Some did repent and reform. I. Their resolution to return to God, and the comforts wherewith they encourage themselves in their return, ver. 1–3. II. The instability of many of them in their promises of repentance, and the course which God therefore took with them, ver. 4, 5. III. The covenant God made with them, and his expectations from them (ver. 6); their violation of that covenant, ver. 7–11.

Verses 1–3

These may be taken either as the words of the prophet to the people, calling them to repentance, or as the words of the people to one another.

I. Let us go no more to the Assyrian, nor send to king Jareb; let us return to the Lord, return to the worship of him, and to our hope in him.

II. "Let us return to him, for he has torn, he has smitten. Therefore let us return to him, because it is for our revolts from him that he has smitten us, and we cannot expect that he should be reconciled to us till we return to him. He that has torn will heal us, he that has smitten will bind us up," as the skilful surgeon with a tender hand binds up the broken bone or bleeding wound. Of his mercy he will do it; nay, therefore he has torn that he may heal. Some think this points particularly to the return of the Jews out of Babylon. They promise themselves that their deliverance out of their troubles shall be to them as life from the dead (v. 2): "After two days he will revive us (that is, in a short time, in a day or two), and the third day, when it is expected that the dead body should be buried out of our sight, then will he raise us up, and we shall live in his sight, and it shall be reviving to us. Though he forsake for a small moment, he will gather with everlasting kindness." But this seems to have a further reference to the resurrection of Jesus Christ; and the time may be a figure of Christ's rising the third day, for all the prophets testified of the sufferings of Christ and the glory that should follow. Though they might not be aware of this mystery in the words, yet now that they are fulfilled to the letter in the resurrection of Christ it is a confirmation that this is he that should come, and we are to look for no other. And it is suitable that a prophecy of Christ's rising should be thus expressed, "He will raise us up, and we shall live," for Christ rose as the first-fruits, and we revive with him, we live through him. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know, the Lord, v. 3. When God returns in mercy to his people, he will give them more knowledge of himself; the earth shall be full of that knowledge, Isa. xi. 9. It may be taken as the fruit of Christ's resurrection, and the life we live by him, that we shall have not only greater means of knowledge, but grace to improve in knowledge. Our knowledge shall be perfected, and yet be eternally increasing. His going forth is prepared as the morning, that is, the returns of his favour, which he had withdrawn from us when he returned to his place. He shall come to us, and be welcome to us, as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth, which refreshes it and makes it fruitful. Now this looks further than their deliverance out of captivity, and was to have its full accomplishment in Christ, and the grace of the gospel. His going forth was prepared as the morning, for he came in the fulness of time; John Baptist was himself the bright and morning star. He shall come down as the rain upon the mown grass, Ps. lxxii. 6. The grace of God in Christ is both the latter and the former rain, for by it the good work of our fruit-bearing is both begun and carried on.

Two evil things, both Judah and Ephraim are here charged with,

I. That they were unsteady, unstable as water, v. 4, 5. O Ephraim! what shall I do unto thee? O Judah! what shall I do unto thee? God speaks after the manner of men, to show how absurd and unreasonable they were. God would have done them good, but they were not qualified for it: "What shall I do unto thee? What else can I do but cast thee off, when I cannot in honour save thee?" See here their conduct towards God: Their goodness, or kindness, was as the morning cloud. What good appeared in them sometimes soon vanished as the morning cloud and the early dew. Shall he accept their goodness? No, for it passes away. That goodness will never be either pleasing to God or profitable to ourselves which is as the morning cloud and the early dew. When men promise fair and do not perform, when they are unsteady, uneven, and inconstant, then is their goodness as the morning cloud and the early dew. "Therefore, because they were so, I have hewn them by the prophets, as timber or stone is hewn for use; I have slain them by the words of my mouth." They were ready to say that the prophets killed them, when they dealt faithfully with them. They were uneven in religion (v. 4), therefore God hewed them. The hearts of sinners are as rough stone, which requires a great deal of pains to bring it into shape, or as knotty timber, that is not squared without a great deal of difficulty. And there are those whom ministers must rebuke sharply; every word should cut, though the reproved fly in the face of the reprover and reckon him an enemy because he tells the truth.

God accomplished that which was foretold: "I have slain them by my judgments, according to the words of my mouth." The word of God will be the death either of the sin or of the sinner. His prophets had taken great pains with them, but the means used had not the desired effect. Now they cannot charge God with severity if he bring upon them the miseries threatened. The prophet acknowledges, Thy judgments are as the light that goes forth, evidently just and righteous.

II. That they were not faithful to God's covenant with them, v. 6, 7.

1. The covenant that God made with them (v. 6): I desired mercy and not sacrifice, and insisted upon the knowledge of God more than upon burnt-offerings. Mercy here is the same word which in v. 4 is rendered goodness—chesed—piety, sanctity; it is put for all practical religion; it is the same with charity in the New Testament, the reigning love of God and our neighbour. This is fully explained, Jer. vii. 22, 23. Perhaps this is mentioned here to show a difference between the God whom they deserted and the gods to whom they went. The power of godliness is the main thing God looks at and requires, and without it the form of godliness is of no avail.

2. How little they had regarded this covenant! There were good things committed to them to keep, the jewels of mercy and piety, and the knowledge of God, in the cabinet of sacrifice and burnt-offering, but they betrayed their trust, kept the cabinet, but pawned the jewels for the gratification of a base lust, and this is that for which God has justly a quarrel with them (v. 7). They, like Adam, have transgressed the covenant (so it might very well be read); as he transgressed the covenant of innocency, so they transgressed the covenant of grace. Dealing treacherously with God is here called dealing treacherously against him, for it is both an affront and an opposition. Look on the other side Jordan, to the country most exposed to neighbouring nations, and where therefore the people were concerned to keep themselves under the divine protection, and there you will find the most daring provocations of the divine Majesty, v. 8. Gilead, which lay in the lot of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh, was a city of the workers of iniquity. Ramoth Gilead is one of the three cities of refuge on the other side Jordan, and a Levites' city; the inhabitants, though of the sacred tribe, were workers of iniquity. They would, for a bribe, protect those that were guilty of wilful murder. Those whose business it was to minister in holy things were as bad as the worst (v. 9). The companies of priests were cruel and bloodthirsty. They were cunning. They murder in the way to Shechem (so the margin reads it, as a proper name) such as were going to Jerusalem (for that way Shechem lay) to worship. Or in the way to Shechem (some think) means in the same manner that their father Levi, with Simeon his brother, murdered the Shechemites (Gen. xxxiv), by fraud and deceit. There is the whoredom of Ephraim, both corporal and spiritual whoredom; too plain to be denied. Look into Judah, and you find them sharing with Israel (v. 11): Also, O Judah! he has set a harvest for thee; thou that hast ploughed iniquity, and sown wickedness, shalt reap the same.

CHAP. VII

I. A general charge drawn up against Israel for those high crimes and misdemeanours by which they had obstructed the course of God's favours to them, ver. 1, 2. II. A particular accusation, 1. Of the court—the king, princes, and judges, ver. 3–7. 2. Of the country. Ephraim is here charged with conforming to the nations (ver. 8), senselessness and stupidity under the judgments of God (ver. 9–11), ingratitude to God for his mercies (ver. 13), incorrigibleness under his judgments (ver. 14), contempt of God (ver. 15), and hypocrisy in their pretences to return to him, ver. 16. They are also threatened with a severe chastisement, which shall humble them (ver. 12), and, if that prevail not, then with an utter destruction (ver. 13), particularly their princes, ver. 16.

I. A general idea given of the present state of Israel, v. 1, 2.

1. God graciously designed to do well for them: I would have healed Israel. He would have reformed them, would have purged out the corruptions that were among them. He would have delivered them out of their troubles, and restored to them their peace and prosperity. Their own folly put them back again.

2. They stood in their own light and put a bar in their own door. When God would have healed them that wickedness which had been concealed was found out. When endeavours were used to reform them vice grew more outrageous. They dissemble with God in their professions of repentance.

3. A practical disbelief of God's omniscience and government was at the bottom of all their wickedness (v. 2): "They consider not in their hearts, they never say it to their own hearts, never think of this, that I remember all their wickedness." This is the sinner's atheism; as good say that there is no God as say that he is either ignorant or forgetful. But the time will come when those who thus deceive themselves shall be undeceived: Now their own doings have beset them about.

4. God had begun his judgments: The thief comes in, and the troop of robbers spoils without. Some take this as an instance of their wickedness, that they robbed and spoiled one another. It seems rather to be a punishment of their sin; they were infested with secret thieves among themselves, and troops of robbers, foreign invaders, that with open violence spoiled abroad.

II. A particular account of the sins of the court, of the king and princes, who were pleased with the wickedness of their subjects (v. 3): They make the king and princes glad with their wickedness. Drunkenness and revelling abound much at the court, v. 5. The day of our king was a merry day with them, and they made him sick with bottles of wine. When he was thus intoxicated, he stretched out his hand with scorners; then he that was entrusted with the government of a kingdom lost the government of himself. Adultery and uncleanness prevailed much among the courtiers. This is spoken of v. 4, 6, 7, and the charge of drunkenness comes in in the midst of this article; for wine is oil to the fire of lust, Prov. xxiii.

33. Adulterers (v. 4) are here again and again compared to an oven heated by the baker (v. 4): They have made ready their heart like an oven (v. 6); they are all hot as an oven, v. 7. An unclean heart is like an oven heated. The baker kindled a fire in his oven and laid sufficient fuel to it. In the morning he finds his oven well heated, and ready for his purpose. So these wicked people, when they have formed a design for the gratifying of some covetous or unclean lusts, have their hearts so fully set in them to do evil that, though they may stifle them for a while, yet the fire is still glowing within, and, as soon as there is an opportunity for it, their purposes break out into overt acts, as a fire flames out when it has vent given it. They have devoured their judges, those few good judges that were among them, that would have put out these fires with which they were heated. All their kings have fallen one after another, and their families with them, which could not but put the kingdom into confusion. There are heart-burnings; they are hot as an oven with rage and malice at one another, and this occasions the devouring of their judges, the falling of their kings. But in the midst of all this disorder there is none among them that calls unto God.

Verses 8–16

The iniquity of Ephraim is discovered, as well as the sin of Samaria, of the people as well as the princes.

I. They did not distinguish themselves from the heathen, as God had distinguished them: Ephraim, he has mingled himself among the people, has associated with them, and conformed himself to them, and lost his character among them. They went up and down among the heathen, to beg help of one of them against another. They were not entirely devoted to God: Ephraim is a cake not turned, and so is burnt on one side and dough on the other side, but good for nothing on either side.

II. They were strangely insensible of the judgments of God, v. 9. They were slowly drawing towards the ruin of their state partly by the encroachments of foreigners: Strangers have devoured his strength, and eaten him up. Some devoured them by open wars (as 2 Kings xiii. 7, when the king of Syria made them like the dust by threshing), others by pretending treaties of peace, in which they made them pay dearly for that which did them no good, as 2 Kings xvi. 9. They were reduced partly by their own maladministrations: Yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him, that is, the sad symptoms of a decaying declining state, which is waxing old and ready to vanish away.

III. They went on in their wicked ways (v. 10): The pride of Israel still testifies to his face, as it had done before (ch. v. 5); their hearts were still unhumbled; they do not return to the Lord their God, though they suffer for going astray, yet they think not of applying to God.

IV. They took wrong methods when they were in distress (v. 11, 12): Ephraim is like a silly dove without heart. To be harmless as a dove is commendable; but to be sottish as a dove is shame. This dove laments not the loss of her young that are taken from her, but will make her nest again in the same place; so they have their people carried away by the enemy, but continue their dealings with those that deal barbarously with them. She is easily enticed into the net, and has no heart, no understanding, to discern her danger. So they were drawn into leagues with neighbouring nations that were their ruin. When she is frightened, she has not courage to stay where she is safe, under the careful protection of her owner, but hovers, seeking shelter first in one place, then in another, and exposes herself the more. So this people in distress did not fly like the doves to their windows, where they might have been secured from the birds of prey, but threw themselves out of God's protection, and called to Egypt to help them, and went to Assyria, to seek that aid which they might, by repentance, and prayer, have found in their God. They are ensnared: "I will spread my net upon them, bring them into straits, that they may see their folly and think of returning." They soar upward, proud of their foreign alliances; but I will bring them down. I will chastise them as their congregation has heard; they have been many a time told that vain is the help of man, that in the son of man there is no help; they have heard both from the law and from the prophets, and as they have heard now they shall see, they shall feel.

V. They revolted from God notwithstanding the methods he took to retain them, v. 13–15. God, as a gracious sovereign towards a people dear unto him, had redeemed them (v. 13), and delivered them out of many a distress. He had bound and strengthened their arms, v. 15. When their power was weakened, like an arm broken, God set it again. He had given Israel victories over the Syrians (2 Kings xiii. 16, 17), had restored their coast (2 Kings xiv. 25, 26), had girded them with strength for battle. He had taken them into covenant but they fled from him, as if he had been their dangerous enemy. He had given them his laws, which were all holy, just, and good, by which he designed to keep them in the right way; but they transgressed against him. They rejected his messages sent them by his prophets. In their hypocritical professions of religion, and promises of amendment, they lied to the Lord. He designed well for them, but they imagined mischief against him, v. 15. Sin is a mischievous thing; it is mischief against God, it is treason. They shall be punished for this (v. 13): Woe unto them! for they have fled from me.

VI. Their shows of devotion were but shows, v. 14. When they were under personal troubles, and called upon God, they were not sincere. They used many good words, but they did not cry with their heart, and therefore God reckons it as no crying to him. Moses is said to cry unto God when he spoke not a word, only his heart prayed with faith, Exod. xiv. 15. These made a great noise, and yet did not cry to God, because their hearts were not right with him. God is so far from approving their prayer and accepting it that he calls it howling. Some think it intimates the noisiness of their prayers as they used to cry to Baal. They did not pray for the grace of God or that God would pardon their sins, but only that he would not take away from them their corn and wine. Carnal hearts covet temporal mercies only, and dread no other but temporal judgments. They pretended reformation, but neither was that sincere, v. 16. They return, that is, they make as if they would return; whereas God says (Jer. iv. 1), If thou wilt return, O Israel! return to me; do not only turn towards me, but return to me. This dissimulation of theirs makes them like a deceitful bow, which is bent and drawn, but when strength comes to be laid to it, either the bow or the string breaks. The sin of the princes of Israel is the rage of their tongue, quarrelling with God and with all about them. The princes shall fall by the sword either of their enemies or of their own people, and this shall be their derision, v. 16.

CHAP. VIII

This chapter, as that before, divides itself into the sins and punishments of Israel. I. The sin of Israel is set forth, 1. In many general expressions, ver. 1, 3, 12, 14. 2. In many particular instances; setting up kings without God (ver. 4), setting up idols against God (ver. 4–6, 11), and courting alliances with the neighbouring nations, ver. 8–10. 3. They still kept up a profession of religion and relation to God, ver. 2, 13, 14. II. The punishment of Israel is set forth answering to the sin. God would bring an enemy upon them, ver. 1, 3. All their projects should be blasted, ver. 7. Their confidence in their idols and in their foreign alliances should disappoint them, ver. 6, 8, 10. Their strength at home should fail them, ver. 14.

Verses 1–7

The prophet must sound an alarm. An enemy is coming to seize their land.

I. The people have transgressed my covenant, v. 1. They have not only done foolishly, but have dealt deceitfully. They have trespassed against my law. They have cast off the thing that is good; the service and worship of God, which is, in effect, casting God off.

II. The enemy shall come as an eagle against the house of the Lord, and (v. 3) shall pursue him. If by the house of the Lord we understand the temple at Jerusalem, by the eagle we must suppose to be meant either Sennacherib, or Nebuchadnezzar, who burnt the temple. But, if we make it to point at the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes by the king of Assyria, we must reckon it is the body of that people which, as Israelites, is here called the house of the Lord. Those who break their covenant of friendship with God make themselves a cheap and easy prey.

III. The people's hypocritical claim of relation to God (v. 2): Israel shall cry unto me; and in their distress will pretend to that knowledge of God's ways which in their prosperity they desired not, but despised. But what stead will it stand a man in to be able to say, My God, I know thee, when he cannot say, "My God, I love thee"?

IV. The prophet's expostulation (v. 5): How long will it be ere they attain to innocency? It is not meant of absolute innocency, but how long will it be ere they become innocent and free from the sin of idolatry? In trouble they cry, How long will it be ere God return to us in a way of mercy? but they do not hear him ask, How long will it be ere they return to God in a way of duty?

V. Some particular sins.

1. In their civil affairs. They set up kings without God, v. 4. So they did when they rejected Samuel and chose Saul. So they did when they set up Jeroboam. So they did now about the time when Hosea prophesied, when it seems to have grown fashionable to set up kings, and depose them again, 2 Kings xv. 8, &c.

2. In their religious matters they did much worse; for they set up calves against God. They called them gods (1 Kings xii. 28, Behold thy gods, O Israel!) but God calls them idols; the word signifies griefs, or troubles, because they are offensive to God and will be ruining to those that worship them. Trace them to their original, and they will be found the creatures of their fancies and the work of their hands, v. 6. The calf they worshipped is here called the calf of Samaria, because it is probable that when Samaria, in Ahab's time, became the metropolis of the kingdom, a calf was set up there to be near the court. It was a device of their own (some think), not borrowed from the Egyptians, for, though they worshipped Apis in a living cow, they never worshipped a golden calf. The gold and silver of which it was made were collected from the people of Israel: it was a poor god that was framed by contribution. The workmen made it, therefore it is not God, v. 6. A made god is no God. If they are not gods, they will not last. They have made to themselves idols, that they may be cut off (v. 4) from God, from their own land, from the land of the living. Those that suffer themselves to be deceived into any idolatries will certainly find themselves deceived in them. Their disappointment in their idols is illustrated (v. 7) by a similitude: They have sown the wind. They have put themselves to a great deal of trouble and expense to make and worship their idols, as the husbandman does by sowing his corn, in expectation of reaping advantage from it. They did it to be as prosperous as the neighbouring nations were, that worshipped idols. But it is like sowing the wind, which can yield no increase. They shall reap the whirlwind, a great whirlwind. They have not their false gods for them, but they set the true God against them. The service of idols is an unprofitable service, and the works of darkness are unfruitful; Rom. vi. 21, The end of those things is death.

I. They multiplied their alliances (v. 9): They have hired lovers. They were at great expense to purchase the friendship of the nations about them. Those surely have behaved ill among their neighbours who have no lovers, but what they hire. Israel is swallowed up, devoured by strangers, their land eaten up (v. 7), and being impoverished, they have lost their reputation, like a merchant that has become a bankrupt. Israel made court to the nations notwithstanding (v. 9): They have gone to Assyria to help them; and herein they are as a wild ass alone by himself, headstrong, and unruly. Though they have hired among the nations, what they provided for their own safety shall but make them easier prey to their enemies. The king of Assyria, whose friendship they courted, laid burdens upon Israel, levied taxes upon them, 2 Kings xv. 19, 20. And for these they shall sorrow a little. They have begun to be diminished (so some read it), by the burden of the king of princes (see Isa. x. 8).

II. They multiplied their altars and temples. They denied the power of godliness (v. 12): I have written to him the great things of my law. The things of God's law are magnalia Dei—the great things of God. They are things that proclaim the greatness of the Law-maker, things of great importance to us; they are our life, and our eternal welfare depends upon our observance of them and obedience to them. It is a great privilege to have the things of God's law written. Moses and the prophets were his amanuenses, and holy men wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. And, if those were happy who had the great things of God's law written to them, how much happier are we who have the much greater things of his gospel written to us! But these great things of the law were counted as a strange thing, as unintelligible and unreasonable. We desire not the knowledge of thy ways. They kept up the form of godliness notwithstanding to little purpose. They multiplied their altars (v. 11): Ephraim made many altars to sin. Their multiplying of altars dedicated to the God of Israel would introduce altars dedicated to other gods. They multiplied their sacrifices, v. 13. Their altars were smoking altars: They sacrificed flesh for the sacrifices of God's offerings, as if they hoped by their observing a ceremonial law of their own to excuse themselves from the obligation of all God's moral precepts. The Lord accepts them not. How should he, when they only sacrificed flesh, but not the spiritual sacrifice of a penitent believing heart? A petition for leave to sin amounts to an imprecation of the curse for sin, and so it shall be answered, according to the multitude of the idols. Israel has forgotten his Maker, v. 14, and builds temples. Some by temples here understand palaces, which defy God's judgments. Judah is likewise charged with multiplying fenced cities, and trusting in them for safety, when the judgments of God were abroad.

CHAP. IX

I. God threatens to deprive this degenerate seed of Israel of all their worldly enjoyments, ver. 1–5. II. He dooms them to ruin, for their own sins and the sins of their prophets, ver. 6–8. III. He upbraids them with the wickedness of their fathers whose steps they trod in, ver. 9, 10. IV. He threatens them with the rooting out of their posterity, ver. 11–17.

Verses 1–6

I. The people of Israel are charged with spiritual adultery: O Israel! thou hast gone a whoring from thy God, v. 1. When they set up idols and worshipped them, they went a whoring from God as their God, and honoured the pretenders with the affection, adoration, and confidence, which were due to God only. They loved a reward upon every corn-floor, to give to their idols the offerings and first-fruits. Or, they loved to receive rewards from their idols; and such they reckoned the fruits of the earth to be.

II. They are forbidden to rejoice: "Rejoice not, O Israel! for joy. What peace, what joy, what hast thou to do with either, while thy whoredoms and witchcrafts are so many?" (2 Kings ix. 19–22). Some think that they had at this time particular occasions for joy, probably upon the account of some league made with a potent ally.

III. They are threatened with judgments for their spiritual whoredoms. Their land shall not yield its wonted increase. Canaan, that fruitful land, shall be turned into barrenness for the wickedness of those that dwell therein (v. 2). The floor and the winepress shall not feed them, much less feast them. Their land shall not only cease to feed them, but cease to be a habitation for them; it shall spue them out, as it had done the Canaanites before them (v. 3). It was a sad and sore judgment to be driven out from such a land as this; it was like driving our first parents out of the garden of Eden. Note, Those cannot expect to dwell in the Lord's land that will not be subject to the Lord's laws. They shall have no rest nor satisfaction in any other land. Some shall return into Egypt, the old house of bondage; thither they shall flee from the Assyrian (ch. viii. 13). Others shall be carried captives to Assyria and there shall be forced to eat unclean things—things not fit for Jews to eat, being prohibited by their law. In the land of their enemies they shall have no opportunity either of giving honour to God or obtaining favour with God, by offering any acceptable sacrifice to him. They shall have no sacrifices to offer, nor any altar. They shall not so much as offer drink-offerings to the Lord, much less any other sacrifices. Instead of sacrifices of joy they shall eat the bread of mourners. Their bread for their soul, the bread which they shall have for the support of their lives, shall not come into the house of the Lord. The return of the days of their sacred feasts would therefore be uncomfortable to them (v. 5). They should perish in the land of their dispersion (v. 6): For, lo, they have gone out of the Lord's land, gone because of destruction, gone to Egypt because of the destruction of their own country by the Assyrians, flattering themselves that they shall return when the storm is over; but they shall find there are graves in Egypt, as their murmuring ancestors said (Exod. xiv. 11). As for their tabernacles, where they formerly dwelt and kept their stores, the pleasant places for their silver, they shall be laid in ruins, be overgrown with nettles.

I. The destruction spoken of shall come speedily. It is at the door (v. 7): The days of visitation have come, the days of recompence have come, and the time of the divine patience has expired.

II. Hereby they shall be made ashamed of their sentiments concerning their prophets. 1. They shall know then that the pretenders to prophecy, who flattered them in their sins, and rocked them asleep in their security (as Ahab's prophets did, 1 Kings xxii. 24), were fools and madmen. 2. They shall know then the true prophets, God's faithful ambassadors to them. Mocking the messengers of the Lord was the sin for which they were punished.

III. The wickedness of the false prophets themselves shall be manifested to their shame (v. 8). "The watchman of Ephraim pretends to have been with my God, and prefaces his lies with, Thus saith the Lord; but he is a snare of a fowler in all his ways. The best things, when corrupted, become the worst.

IV. God will now reckon with them for the sins of their fathers, v. 9, 10. They were as bad as their fathers: They have deeply corrupted themselves; they are far gone in the depths of Satan (Isa. xxxi. 6). Lewdness and wickedness were as impudent and daring now as in the days of Gibeah; and therefore what can be expected but such a vengeance as was then taken on Gibeah? Hence God takes occasion to upbraid them with the degeneracy of their ancestors, v. 10. God first formed them into a people: I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness. He took as much delight in them as a poor traveller would if he found grapes in a wilderness. God set them apart for himself as a peculiar people, but they went to Baal-peor, joined with the Moabites in sacrificing to that dirty dunghill deity (Num. xxv. 2, 3), and they separated themselves unto that shame, that shameful idol. This was the way of their fathers; God had done well for them, but they had acted ungratefully towards him, and in the same manner had the present generation deeply corrupted themselves.

Verses 11–17

I. The sin of Ephraim. Their worship was corrup (v. 15): All their wickedness is in Gilgal, a place infamous for idolatry, as appears, ch. iv. 15; xii. 11; Amos iv. 4; v. 5. That place had been famous in other ages for solemn transactions between God and Israel, as Joshua v. 2, 10; 1 Sam. x. 8; xi. 15. Grotius conjectures that there is a mystical sense here. Golgotha in Syriac is the same with Gilgal in Hebrew, and therefore he thinks this may have reference to the putting of Christ to death at Golgotha, which was the greatest sin of the Jewish nation, and of which it might truly be said, All their wickedness was summed up in that.

II. The displeasure of God against Ephraim. He departs from them, v. 12. He hates them. In Gilgal, where all their wickedness is, there I hated them. There, where the abominations of sin are committed, there God abominates the sinners. For the wickedness of their doings, I will drive them out of my house. They shall be castaways.

III. The fruits of this displeasure comes in the cutting off and abandoning of their posterity. The name Ephraim is derived from fruitfulness, Gen. xli. 52. Moses's blessing foretold the ten thousands of Ephraim, Deut. xxxiii. 17. This was his glory, v. 11. Ephraim is as strong and rich as ever Tyre was, and as proud and secure. Their glory shall fly away like a bird (v. 11); their children shall be taken away and the hopes of their families cut off. Ephraim is smitten; their root is dried up; they shall bear no fruit, v. 16. They shall perish of themselves (v. 11): They shall fly away from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception. They shall perish by the hand of their enemies; they shall die violent deaths (v. 12). Again (v. 13), Ephraim shall bring forth his children to the murderer. The mothers shall travail with pain to bear their children, and a cruel enemy comes and puts all to the sword. The Chaldee-paraphrase, and many of the rabbin, by the murderers to whom the children were brought forth, understand those that sacrificed their children to Moloch. Those few that escape shall be dispersed (v. 17): They shall be wanderers among the nations. The prophet's prayer relating to it (v. 14): Give them, O Lord! what wilt thou give? Rather let them have no children than have them to be made miserable. Christ said, Blessed is the womb that never bore and the paps that never gave suck, Luke xxiii. 29. "Give therefore a miscarrying womb and dry breasts; for it is better to fall into the hands of the Lord, whose mercies are great, than into the hands of man."

CHAP. X

I. The people of Israel are charged with gross corruptions in the worship of God, ver. 1, 2, 5, 6, 8. II. They are charged with corruptions in the administration of the civil government, ver. 3, 4, 7. III. They are charged with imitating the sins of their fathers, and their own sins, ver. 9–11. IV. They are earnestly invited to repent and reform, ver. 12–15.

Verses 1–8

I. National sins bring down national judgment.

1. They were not fruitful in the fruits of righteousness. Here all their wickedness began (v. 1): Israel is an empty vine. A vine is of all trees least serviceable if it do not bear fruit. It is thenceforth good for nothing, Ezek. xv. 3, 5.

2. They multiplied their altars and images, and the more bountiful God's providence was to them the more prodigal they were in serving their idols.

3. Their hearts were divided, v. 2. They were at variance about their idols, at variance about their kings, and alienated one from another, and there was no such thing as friendship among them. They halted between God and Baal, that was the dividing of their heart.

4. They made no conscience of what they said and what they did in the most solemn manner, v. 4. They swore falsely in making a covenant; subjects violated their oaths of allegiance and kings their coronation-oaths; they broke their leagues with the nations. God is greatly offended with corruptions, not only in his own worship, but in the administration of justice between man and man.

II. They shall have no joy of their kings and of their government. Now they shall say, "We have no king, that is, we are as if we had none, none to preserve the public peace nor to fight our battles; and justly has this come to us." Those that keep themselves in the fear and favour of God may say, "What can the greatest of men do against us?" But those that throw themselves out of his protection must say, with despair, "What can the greatest of men do for us?" Their civil government shall not only be weakened, but quite destroyed (v. 7): As for Samaria, the royal city, her king is cut off as the foam from the water. The foam makes a great show upon the face of the water, yet it is but a heap of bubbles. Such were the kings of Israel, after their revolt from the house of David, a mere scum; their government had no foundation. He shall break down their altars. God shall do it by the hand of the Assyrians: the Assyrians shall do it by order from God. He shall spoil their images, v. 2. If the grace of God prevail not to destroy the love of sin in us, it is just that the providence of God should destroy the food and fuel of sin about us. The thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars, that is, they shall lie in ruins. Thus idolaters are brought in trembling when God arises to shake terribly the earth, Isa. ii. 21. And here (v. 8), They shall say to the mountains, Cover us; and to the hills, Fall on us.

I. They are put in mind of the sins of their fathers. It was told them (ch. ix. 9) that they had corrupted themselves, as in the days of Gibeah, and here (v. 9), O Israel! thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah. The wickedness that was committed in that age is revived in this, and reacted. It has been continued in a constant series and succession through all the intervening ages. The case was bad then, for there they stood; and the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them till the third engagement, and then did not overtake them all, for 600 made their escape. But thy sin is worse than theirs.

II. They have warning given them of the judgments of God that were coming upon them, v. 10. God had hitherto pitied and spared them. Because God does not desire the death and ruin of sinners, therefore he does desire their chastisement. "Because they receive not chastisement from me by my prophets, who in my name rebuke them, I will chastise them by the hands of the people who shall be gathered against them, when they shall bind themselves in their two furrows," that is, within a double entrenchment. Or, When I shall bind them for their two transgressions (so the margin reads it), meaning their corporal and spiritual whoredom. Or, When I shall bind them to their two furrows, that is, bring them into servitude to the Assyrians, as oxen in the plough, who are bound to the two furrows up the field and down it. Thus those that would not be God's freemen shall be their enemies' slaves.

III. Ephraim is as a heifer that is taught to tread out the corn, and loves that work, because, not muzzled, she has liberty to eat at pleasure, v. 11. "But," says God, "I have a yoke to put upon her fair neck. I will make Ephraim to ride, I will cause them to be ridden by the Assyrians and other conquerors that shall rule them with rigour, as men do the beasts they ride upon (Ps. lxvi. 12); and Judah shall be made to plough, and Jacob to break the clods," that is, they shall be used hardly, but not so hardly as Ephraim. Dr. Pocock inclines to another sense of these words, as intimating the gentle methods God took with this people, to bring them into obedience to his law; he had managed them as the husbandman does his cattle that he trains up for service. Ephraim a docile heifer, fit to be employed, God took hold of her fair neck, to accustom her to the hand, harnessed her, or put the yoke of his commandment upon her, gave his people Israel a law, that they might not be tempted by the usages of the heathen. He had used all fair and likely means with them to keep them in their obedience, had set Judah to plough and Jacob to break the clods, and yet they would not be retained in their obedience, but started aside.

IV. They are invited and encouraged to return to God by prayer, repentance, and reformation, v. 12, 13. They are God's husbandry (1 Cor. iii. 9), and the duties are expressed in language borrowed from the husbandman's calling. Let them break up the fallow ground; let them cleanse their hearts from all corrupt affections and lusts, which are as weeds and thorns, and let them be of a broken and contrite spirit; let them prepare to receive the divine precepts, as the ground that is ploughed is to receive the seed, that it may take root. See Jer. iv. 3. Let them sow to themselves in righteousness; let them return to the practice of good works, and let them sow to the Spirit, as the apostle speaks, Gal. vi. 7, 8. Let them seek the Lord; let them look up to him for his grace, and beg of him to bless the seed sown. It is time to do it; it is high time. If we sow to ourselves in righteousness —if we be careful and diligent to do our duty, in a dependence upon his grace—he will shower down his grace upon us, will rain righteousness, the very thing that those need most who are to sow in righteousness. We have ploughed wickedness and reaped iniquity; and the time past of our life may suffice that we have done so, v. 13. "You have taken a great deal of pains in the service of sin, and will you grudge to bear the burden and heat of the day in God's service? You have done much to damn your souls; will you not undo it again, and do something to save them?" "Thou didst trust in thy ways, in the multitude of thy mighty men; thou hast stayed thyself upon creatures, thy own power and policy, and thy hopes have deceived thee; come therefore, and seek the Lord, and thy hope in him shall not deceive thee."

V. They are threatened with utter destruction, both for their carnal practices and for their carnal confidences, v. 14, 15. Therefore, a tumult shall arise among thy people, either by insurrections at home or invasions from abroad. The fortresses which they confided in, shall be seized and rifled, as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle. This refers to some event that had lately happened, and probably Shalman is the same with Shalmaneser king of Assyria, who had lately sacked some town, or castle (Beth-arbel is the house of Arbel), to terrify other garrisons into a speedy surrender. God tells them that thus Samaria should be spoiled. The inhabitants shall be put to the sword, as it was at Beth-arbel. In a morning shall the king of Israel utterly be cut off, v. 15. Hoshea was the last king of Israel; in him the whole kingdom was cut off; it may refer to him or to some of his predecessors that were cut off by treachery. It shall be done in a morning, as suddenly as the dawning of the morning. What is the spring of this bloodshed? He tells us (v. 15): So shall Bethel do unto you. Bethel was the place where one of the calves was; Gilgal, where all their wickedness is said to have been, was hard by; there was their great wickedness, the evil of their evil (so the word is), the sum and quintessence of their sin. He does not say, "So shall the king of Assyria do to you"; but, "So shall Bethel do to you." Whatever mischief is done to us it is sin that does it.

CHAP. XI

I. The great goodness of God towards his people Israel, ver. 1, 3, 4. II. Their ungrateful conduct towards him, ver. 2–4, 7, 12. III. Threatenings of wrath against them for their treachery, ver. 5, 6. IV. Mercy remembered in the midst of wrath, ver. 8, 9. V. Promises of what God would yet do for them, ver. 10, 11. VI. An honourable character given of Judah, ver. 12.

I. God very gracious to Israel. 1. He had a kindness for them when they were young (v. 1): When Israel was a child then I loved him; when they first began to multiply into a nation in Egypt God then set his love upon them, and chose them because he loved them, Deut. vii. 7, 8. When they were helpless as children, foolish as children, when they were outcasts, and children exposed, then God loved them. Those that have grown up, nay, those that have grown old, ought often to reflect upon the goodness of God to them in their childhood. 2. He delivered them out of the house of bondage: I called my son out of Egypt, because a beloved son. These words are said to have been fulfilled in Christ, when, upon the death of Herod, he and his parents were called out of Egypt (Matt. ii. 15). The calling of Christ out of Egypt was a figure of the calling of all that are his, through him, out of spiritual slavery. I taught Ephraim also to go, as a child in leading-strings is taught. He taught them to go in the way of his commandments, by the institutions of the ceremonial law, which were as tutors. When anything was amiss with them he was their physician: I healed them. He brought them into his service by mild and gentle methods (v. 4): I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love. He draws, (1) With the cords of a man, with such cords as men draw with that have a principle of humanity. (2) With bands of love, or cart-ropes of love. This word signifies stronger cords than the former. He eased them of burdens: I was to them as those that take off the yoke on their jaws, alluding to the care of the good husbandman, who is merciful to his beast, and will not tire him with hard and constant labour. In Egypt they fared hard, but, when God brought them out, he laid meat unto them, as the husbandman, when he has unyoked his cattle, fodders them. God rained manna about their camp, bread from heaven, angels' food.

II. Israel ungrateful to God. They were deaf and disobedient to his voice. They were fond of idols, and worshipped them. Idolatry was the sin which from the beginning, and all along, had most easily beset them. They were regardless of God, and of his favours to them: They knew not that I healed them. Ignorance is at the bottom of ingratitude, ch. ii. 8. They were strongly inclined to apostasy. This is the blackest article in the charge (v. 7): My people are bent to backsliding from me. They are bent to backslide; they are ready to sin. It also intimates that they are resolute in sin; their hearts are fully set in them to do evil. They were strangely averse to repentance and reformation. They refused to return, v. 5. God's prophets and ministers called them to return to the God from whom they had revolted, to the most high God, from whom they had sunk into this wretched degeneracy; but they called in vain.

III. God had brought them out of Egypt to take them for a people to himself but they would not be faithful to him (v. 5): "Therefore Israel shall not return into the land of Egypt, though that was a house of bondage grievous enough; but he shall go into a harder service, for the Assyrian shall be his king, who will use him worse than ever Pharaoh did." God, who gave them Canaan, shall bring his judgments upon them there (v. 6): The sword shall come upon them, the sword of a foreign enemy, triumphing over them. They continued their rebellions against God, and therefore God continued his judgments on them.

I. God's debate within himself concerning Israel's case, a debate between justice and mercy, in which victory plainly inclines to mercy's side. Not that there are such struggles in God as there are in us, but they are expressions after the manner of men, to show what severity the sin of Israel had deserved, and yet how divine grace would spare them notwithstanding. How shall I give thee up? 1. The proposals that justice makes concerning Israel. Let Ephraim be given up, as an incorrigible son. Let Israel be delivered into the enemy's hand, as a lamb to the lion to be torn in pieces; let them be made as Admah and set as Zeboim, the two cities that with Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed. Ephraim and Israel deserve to be thus abandoned, and God will do them no wrong if he deal thus with them. 2. The opposition that mercy makes to these proposals: How shall I do it? As the tender father reasons with himself, "How can I cast off my untoward son? for he is my son. I cannot do it. They have been a people near unto me; there are yet some good among them; it may be they will yet repent and reform; and therefore how can I do it?" God speaks as if he were conscious to himself of a strange striving of affections in compassion to Israel: My repentings are kindled together. After a long contest mercy rejoices against judgment, and carries the day, v. 9. It is decreed that the reprieve shall be lengthened out yet longer, and I will not now execute the fierceness of my anger. They shall be corrected, but not consumed. The reason for this determination: For I am God and not man, the Holy One of Israel. He is Lord of his anger, whereas men's anger commonly lords it over them. It is a great encouragement to our hope in God's mercies to remember that he is God, and not man.

II. He will qualify them to receive the good he designs for them (v. 10, 11): They shall walk after the Lord. It is spoken of the ten tribes, and had its accomplishment, in part, in the return of some of them with those of the two tribes in Ezra's time; but it had its more full accomplishment in God's spiritual Israel, the gospel-church, brought together by the gospel of Christ. They were to be called and brought together. This call should make such an impression as the roaring of a lion makes upon all the beasts of the forest: When he shall roar then the children shall tremble. When those whose hearts the gospel reached trembled, and cried out, What shall we do?—when they were working out their salvation, and worshipping God with fear and trembling, then this promise was fulfilled. The children shall tremble from the west. This seems to have reference to the calling of the Gentiles that lay westward from Canaan, for that way especially the gospel spread. The apostle speaks of mighty signs and wonders that were wrought by the preaching of the gospel from Jerusalem round about to Illyricum, Rom. xv. 19. Then the children trembled from the west. And, whereas Israel after the flesh was dispersed in Egypt and Assyria, it is promised that they shall be effectually summoned thence (v. 11): They shall tremble; they shall come with all haste, as a bird upon the wing, out of Egypt, and as a dove out of the land of Assyria. Those that lay most remote from each other shall meet in Christ, and be incorporated in the church. Our holy trembling at the word of Christ will draw us to him, not drive us from him. When he roars like a lion the slaves tremble and flee from him, the children tremble and flee to him. At their return (v. 11): I will place them in their houses; all those that come at the gospel-call shall have a place and a name in the gospel-church. They shall dwell in God, and be at home in him as a man in his own house; they shall have mansions, for there are many in our Father's house.

III. The treachery of Ephraim and Israel may be an intimation that it is not Israel after the flesh, but the spiritual Israel, to whom the foregoing promises belong, for as for this Ephraim, this Israel, they compass God about with lies and deceit.

IV. A pleasant commendation of the integrity of the two tribes comes as an aggravation of the perfidiousness of the ten tribes, and a reason why God had that mercy in store for Judah which he had not for Israel (ch. i. 6, 7). Judah rules with God, that is, he serves God, and the service of God is dignity and dominion. They walk in the way of good men; and those that do so rule with God, they have a mighty interest in Heaven.

CHAP. XII

I A high charge drawn up against both Israel and Judah for their sins, ver. 1, 2. Particularly the sin of fraud and injustice, which Ephraim is charged with (ver. 7), and justifies himself in, ver. 8. And the sin of idolatry (ver. 11), by which God is provoked to contend with them, ver. 14. II. The aggravations of the sins they are charged with, taken from the honour God put upon their father Jacob (ver. 3–5), the advancement of them into a people from low and mean beginnings (ver. 12, 13), and the provision he had made them of helps for their souls by the prophets he sent them, ver. 10. III. A call to the unconverted to turn to God, ver. 6. IV. An intimation of mercy that God had in store for them, ver. 9.

Verses 1–6

I. Ephraim is convicted of folly, in staying himself upon Egypt and Assyria, when he was in straits (v. 1): Ephraim feeds on wind. The men of Ephraim thought to secure the Assyrians in their interests by a solemn league: They make a covenant with the Assyrians, but they will find that potent prince will be a slave to his word no longer than he pleases. They thought to secure the Egyptians for their confederates by a rich present: Oil is carried into Egypt. But the Egyptians, when they had got the bribe, dropped the cause.

II. The Lord has also a controversy with Judah; for though he had awhile ago ruled with God, and been faithful with the saints, yet now he begins to degenerate.

III. Both Ephraim and Judah are put in mind of their father Jacob, that they might be encouraged to return to God. He had called this people Jacob (v. 2), threatening to punish them; but how shall I give them up? How shall that dear name be forgotten? From what passed between God and Jacob we may learn that Jehovah, the Lord God of hosts, is the God of Israel; he was the God of Jacob, and this is his memorial throughout all the generations of the seed of Jacob (v. 5). Here are two memorials by which he is distinguished from all others, and is to be acknowledged by us. The first denotes his existence of himself. He is Jehovah, much the same with I AM, the same that was, and is, and is to come, infinite, eternal, and unchangeable. Jehovah is his memorial, his peculiar name. The second denotes his dominion over all: He is the God of hosts, that has all the hosts of heaven and earth at his command. God's names, titles, and attributes, are the memorials of him; there is no need for images to be such. "Therefore turn thou to thy God. He that was the God of Jacob is the God of Israel, is thy God; from him thou hast revolted; therefore turn thou to him by repentance and faith, turn to him as thine, to love him, obey him, and depend upon him. Keep mercy and judgment, mercy in relieving and succouring the poor and distressed, judgment in rendering to all their due; be kind to all."

I. Reproofs for sin. Ephraim is charged with turning from his God by idolatry, and breaking the laws of justice and judgment.

1. He is a merchant. The margin reads it as a proper name, He is Canaan, or a Canaanite, unworthy to be dominated from Jacob and Israel. See Amos ix. 7. But Canaan sometimes signifies a merchant, and here Ephraim is charged with deceit in trade. Though God had given his people a land flowing with milk and honey, yet he did not forbid them to enrich themselves by merchandise. And, if they had been fair merchants, it would have been no reproach at all. But he is such a merchant as the Canaanites were, who cheated all they dealt with. Ephraim deceives and thereby oppresses. With a great deal of art and cunning: The balances of deceit are in his hand.

2. He justifies himself in this sin, v. 8. Ephraim stands indicted for a common cheat. He does not deny the charge, but insists upon his own justification. Suppose he did use balances of deceit, yet he had got a good estate. Let the prophet say what he pleased of his deceit, he could not be convinced there was any harm in it: "Yet I have become rich, I have found me out substance." Carnal hearts are often confirmed in their evil ways by their worldly prosperity and success in those ways. But it is a great mistake. Every word in what Ephraim says here proclaims his folly. It is folly to call the riches of this world substance, for they are things that are not, Prov. xxiii. 5. It is folly to think that what we have is for ourselves. I have found me out substance, as if we had it for our own use, whereas we hold it in trust, only as stewards. It is folly to think that growing rich in a sinful way makes us innocent, or will make us safe. See Isa. xlvii. 10; Prov. i. 32. He pleads that he had kept a good reputation. Carnal hearts are apt to build a good opinion of themselves upon the fair character they have among their neighbours. He excused the fraud, so that none condemned it: "They shall find no iniquity in me that were sin, nothing very bad, nothing but what is very excusable." It is a fashionable iniquity; it is customary; it is what everybody does; nobody will think the worse of them for it. But God sees not as man sees; he judges not as man judges. He is also charged with idolatry, with the making and worshipping of images, which are vanities (v. 11): Surely they are vanity; they do not profit, but deceive. The prophet mentions two places notorious for idolatry: (1) Gilead on the other side Jordan, which had been branded for it before (ch. vi. 8): Is there iniquity in Gilead? It is a thing to be wondered at; it is a thing to be sadly lamented. (2) And in Gilgal too; there they sacrifice bullocks (ch. ix. 15), and there their altars are as thick as heaps of manure in the furrows of the field that is to be sown, ch. viii. 11.

II. Threatenings of wrath for sin. Some make that to be so (v. 9), I will make thee to dwell in tabernacles as in the days of the appointed time, as did the Israelites when they dwelt in tents and wandered for forty years; that was the time appointed in the wilderness. Ephraim thought that there was no iniquity in him that deserved to be called sin (v. 8); but God told him that there was that in him which was sin, and would be found so if he did not repent and reform. Ephraim provoked him to anger most bitterly. He shall take away his forfeited life: He shall leave his blood upon him, that is, he shall not hold him guiltless. His blood shall be upon his own head (2 Sam. i. 16). His reproach shall his Lord return upon him.

III. Here are memorials of former mercy, which come in to convict them of base ingratitude.

1. That God had raised them from meanness. When Ephraim had become rich he forgot that which God obliged them every year to acknowledge (Deut. xxvi. 5), A Syrian ready to perish was my father. But God here puts them in mind of it, v. 12. Let them remember, not only the honours of their father Jacob, v. 3, but what a poor servant he was to Laban. Jacob fled into Syria from a malicious brother, and there served a covetous uncle for a wife and for a wife he kept sheep, because he had no estate. He was a plain man, dwelling in tents, and keeping sheep; therefore balances of deceit ill became them. God wonderfully preserved him, which magnifies the goodness of God both to him and them and leaves them under the stain of base ingratitude to God who was their founder and benefactor.

2. That God had rescued them from misery, raised them out of poverty and slavery (v. 13). God brought Israel out of Egypt by a prophet, Moses, who, though he is called king in Jeshurun (Deut. xxxiii. 5), yet did what he did for Israel as a prophet, by direction from God and by the power of his word. This shows how ungrateful this people were in rejecting their God. They should have loved and valued his prophets and have studied to answer God's end in sending them, for the sake of that prophet by whom God had brought them out of Egypt.

3. That God had taken care of their education as they grew up. This instance of God's goodness we have, v. 10. As by a prophet he delivered them, so by prophets he still continued to speak to them.

IV. Here are intimations of further mercy in the midst of sin and wrath (as some understand v. 9): "I that am the Lord thy God from the land of Egypt, who then and there took thee to be my people, and have approved myself thy God ever since, in a constant series of merciful providences, have yet a kindness for thee, bad as thou art; and I will make thee to dwell in tabernacles, not as in the wilderness, but as in the days of the solemn feast," the feast of tabernacles, which was celebrated with great joy, Lev. xxiii. 40.

CHAP. XIII

I. The people of Israel are reproved and threatened for their idolatry, ver. 1–4. II. They are reproved and threatened for their wantonness, pride, and luxury, and other abuses of their wealth and prosperity, ver. 5–8. III. The ruin coming upon them is foretold, ver. 12, 13, 15, 16. IV. Those among them that yet retain a respect for their God are here encouraged to hope that he will yet appear for their relief, ver. 9–11, 14.

Verses 1–4

Idolatry was the sin that did most easily beset the Jewish nation till after the captivity; the ten tribes from the first were guilty of it, but especially after the days of Ahab.

I. The provision that God made to prevent their falling into idolatry. This we have, v. 4. He made himself known to them as the Lord their God. He told them so from heaven at Mount Sinai. This he continued to prove to them by his prophets and by his providences. He gave them a law forbidding them to worship any other: "Thou shalt know no God but me." He gave them a good reason for it: There is no saviour besides me.

II. The honour that Ephraim had, while he kept himself clear from idolatry (v. 1): While Ephraim spoke trembling, or with trembling, so long he exalted himself in Israel. Those that humble themselves, especially that humble themselves before God, shall be exalted.

III. The lamentable growth of idolatry among them (v. 2): Now they sin more and more. They made themselves molten images. They made them of their silver. They made them according to their own understanding, according to their own fancy. Or according to their own likeness, in the form of a man. Though they were thus the work of their hands, yet they were the beloved of their souls; for they say of them, Let the men that sacrifice kiss the calves.

IV. Threatenings of wrath for their idolatry. Because they are so fond of kissing their calves, therefore God will give them sensible convictions of their folly, v. 3. God tells them that they shall be disappointed, and driven away in their wickedness. They shall be like the morning cloud or the early dew. Both pass away, and the day proves as dry and hot as ever; so their prosperity should be, and so their expectations from their idols. They are as the chaff, light and worthless. They are as the smoke, noisome and offensive (see Isa. lxv. 5), and they shall be driven away as the smoke out of the chimneys.

Verses 5–8

1. The plentiful provision God had made for Israel (v. 5): "I did know thee in the wilderness, made provision for thee, even in a land of great drought, when no relief was to be had in an ordinary way." The God that knew them and fed them there, was a friend indeed. 2. Their unworthy ungrateful abuse of God's favour to them. God not only took care of them in the wilderness, but put them in possession of Canaan (v. 6), according to their pasture so were they filled. When they came into Canaan they fed themselves to the full. It would have promised better, if they had been more moderate in the use of their plenty. They were filled, and their heart was exalted. Their luxury and sensuality made them proud, insolent, and secure. The best comment upon this is that of Moses, Deut. xxxii. 13–15. But Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked. They began to think they had no further need of God: Their heart was exalted, therefore have they forgotten me. We ought to know that we live upon God when we live upon common providence, though we do not, as Israel in the wilderness, live upon miracles. 3. God's just resentment of their base ingratitude, v. 7, 8. I will be unto them as a lion and as a leopard. Some read it (and the original will bear it), I will be as a leopard in the way of Assyria. The judgments of God shall surprise them just when they are going to the Assyrians to seek for protection and help from them. He will rend the caul of their heart. The lion is observed to aim at the heart of the beasts he preys upon, and thus will God devour them like a lion. The judgments of God against impenitent sinners will be terrible. They will rend the caul of the heart, will fill the soul with confusion.

Verses 9–16

The first of these verses is the summary, or contents, of all the rest (v. 9). 1. All the blame of Israel's ruin laid upon themselves: O Israel! thy perdition is thence; it is of and from thyself; or, "It has destroyed thee, O Israel!" 2. All the glory of Israel's relief ascribed to God: But in me is thy help. It may be: "Thy case is bad, but it is not desperate. Thou hast destroyed thyself; but come to me, and I will help thee."

1. Israel destroyed themselves. It is said (v. 16), They rebelled against God.

1. They treasure up wrath against the day of wrath, and so they destroy themselves. Their former sins contributed to their present destruction; for they were laid up in store with God, Deut. xxxii. 34, 35; Job xiv. 17. The sin of sinners is not forgotten till it is pardoned.

2. They are their own ruin because they will not do what they should do towards their own salvation, v. 13. They shall be thrown into pangs and agonies, very sharp and severe, and yet, like the pains of a woman in labour, in order to deliverance; and by these, though God corrects them, yet he designs their good. They are chastened, that they may not be destroyed. But they do not repent and so cannot expect the joy of deliverance, v. 13. Those are in danger of miscarrying in conversion who delay it. Here is a sad description of the desolation they are doomed to, v. 15, 16. It is taken for granted that Ephraim is fruitful among his children; but sin turns this fruitful tribe into barrenness. The instrument is an east wind, representing a foreign enemy that should invade it. It is called the wind of the Lord. Was it a rich tribe? The foreign enemy shall make it poor enough and shall exhaust the sources of its wealth. Was it a populous tribe, and numerous? The enemy shall depopulate it and make its men few: Samaria shall become desolate, without inhabitants.

II. How God was the help of this self-destroying people, their only help (v. 10): I will be thy King, to rule and save thee. Though they had rebelled against him, yet he would still be their King. Our case would be sad indeed if God were not better to us than we are to ourselves.

1. God will be their King when they have no other king. "Where is the king that may save thee in all thy cities? Where are thy judges, who by administering public justice should preserve the public peace?" They rejected Samuel when they said, Give us a king like the nations, whereas the Lord was their King. The ten tribes desired a kingly government different from that of the house of David, because they thought that bore too hard upon them, and they hoped to better themselves by setting up Jeroboam. Providence gave them Saul first, and afterwards Jeroboam. And what better were they for them? Saul was given in anger (given in thunder, 1 Sam. xii. 18, 19) and soon after was taken away in wrath, upon Mount Gilboa. The kingly government of the ten tribes was given in anger against the ten tribes, for their disaffection to the house of David; and God was now about to take that away in wrath by the power of the king of Assyria.

2. God will do that for them which no other king could do if they had one (v. 14): I will ransom them from the power of the grave. Their deliverance shall be by ransom; and we know who it was that paid their ransom, and what the ransom was, for it was the Son of man that gave his life a ransom for many, Matt. xx. 28. Christ has abolished death, has broken the power of it and altered the property of it, and so enabled us to triumph over it. Thanks be to God therefore who gives us the victory.

CHAP. XIV

This chapter is a lesson for penitents; and some such there were in Israel. I. Direction in repenting, ver. 1–3. II. Encouragements to repent, taken from God's readiness to receive returning sinners (ver. 4, 8) and the comforts he has for them, ver. 5–7. III. A solemn recommendation of these things, ver. 9.

I. A kind invitation given to sinners to repent, v. 1. It is directed to Israel, God's professing people. They are called to return. Conversion must be preached even to those that are within the pale of the church as well as to heathen. "Thou hast fallen by thy iniquity." Thou hast stumbled; so some read it. Their idols were their stumbling-blocks. Sin is a fall; and it concerns those that have fallen by sin to get up again by repentance. "Return to the Lord thy God; return to him as the Lord whom thou hast a dependance upon, as thy God." Return even to the Lord, or quite home to the Lord. The ancient Jews had a saying, grounded on this, Repentance is a great thing, for it brings men quite up to the throne of glory.

II. How to repent. 1. They must bethink themselves what to say to God when they come to him: Take with you words. They are required to bring, not sacrifices and offerings, but penitential prayers, the fruit not of the lips only, but of the heart. The heart must dictate to the tongue. 2. They must bethink themselves what to do. They must not only take with them words, but must turn to the Lord; inwardly in their hearts, outwardly in their lives.

III. For their assistance and encouragement, God is pleased to put words into their mouths, to teach them what they shall say. They are,

1. Petitioning words. Two things we are here directed to petition for: (1) To be acquitted from guilt. When we return to the Lord we must say to him, "Lord, take away all iniquity. Lift it off as a burden or as the stumbling-block which we have often fallen over. Take it all away by a free and full remission, for we cannot strike it off by a satisfaction of our own." (2) To be accepted as righteous in God's sight: "Receive us graciously. Let us have thy favour and love. Receive our prayer graciously; be well pleased with that good which by thy grace we are enabled to do." Take good (so the word is); take it to bestow upon us, so the margin reads it—Give good. This follows upon the petition for the taking away of iniquity; for, till iniquity is taken away, we have no reason to expect any good from God. Give good, that good which will make us good and keep us from returning to iniquity again.

2. Promising words. These also are put into their mouths, not to move God, but to move themselves. Two things they are to promise and vow: (1) Thanksgiving. "Pardon our sins, and accept of us, so will we render the calves of our lips," The fruit of our lips (so the LXX), a word they used for burnt-offerings, and so it agrees with the Hebrew. The apostle quotes this phrase (Heb. xiii. 15). (2) Amendment of life. They are taught to promise, not only verbal acknowledgments, but a real reformation. They will not trust to their alliances abroad: Asshur (that is, Assyria) shall not save us. "We will not court the help of the Assyrians when we are in distress, as we have done (ch. v. 13; vii. 11; viii. 9); we will scorn to be beholden to the Assyrians for help. We will not ride upon horses, that is, we will not make court to Egypt," for thence they fetched their horses, Deut. xvii. 16; Isa. xxx. 16; xxxi. 1, 3. We must promise that we will not set our hearts upon the gains of this world, nor pride ourselves in our external performances in religion, for that is, in effect, to say to the work of our hands, You are our gods.

3. Pleading words are here put into their mouths: For in thee the fatherless find mercy. Those may expect to find help in God that are truly sensible of their helplessness in themselves and are willing to acknowledge it. They plead God's wonted lovingkindness to such as were in that condition: With thee the fatherless not only may find, but does find, and shall find, mercy.

An answer of peace to the prayers of returning Israel. They seek God's face, and they shall not seek in vain.

I. Do they dread and deprecate God's displeasure, and therefore return to him? He assures them that, upon their submission, his anger is turned away from them. This is laid as the ground of all the other favours here promised.

II. Do they pray for the taking away of iniquity? He assures them that he will heal their backslidings; so he promised, Jer. iii. 22. He will heal the guilt of their backslidings by pardoning mercy and their bent to backslide by renewing grace.

III. Do they pray that God will receive them graciously? In answer to that, behold, it is promised, I will love them freely.

IV. Do they pray that God will give good, will make them good? In answer to that, behold, it is promised, I will be as the dew unto Israel, v. 5. This ensures spiritual blessings in heavenly things; and it follows upon the healing of their backslidings, for pardoning mercy is always accompanied with renewing grace. The bad being by the grace of God made good, they shall by the same grace be made better; for grace, wherever it is true, is growing. They shall grow as the lily. The growth of the lily is very speedy. The root of the lily seems lost in the ground all winter, but, when it is refreshed with the dews of the spring, it starts up in a little time; so the grace of God improves young converts sometimes very fast. They shall grow downwards, and be more firm. The lily indeed grows fast, and grows fine, but it soon fades and is easily plucked up; and therefore it is here promised to Israel that with the flower of the lily he shall have the root of the cedar: He shall cast forth his roots as Lebanon, as the trees of Lebanon, which, having taken deep root, cannot be plucked up, Amos ix. 15. Spiritual growth consists most in the growth of the root, which is out of sight. The more we depend upon Christ and draw sap and virtue from him, the more we act in religion from a principle and the more steadfast and resolved we are in it, the more we cast forth our roots. They shall grow round about (v. 6): His branches shall spread on all sides. And (v. 7) he shall grow as the vine, whose branches extend furthest of any tree. They shall be graceful and acceptable both to God and man. They are here compared to such trees as are pleasant, 1. To the sight: His beauty shall be as the olive-tree, which is always green, Jer. xi. 16. Ordinances are the beauty of the church. Holiness is the beauty of a soul. 2. To the smell: His smell shall be as Lebanon (v. 6) and his scent as the wine of Lebanon, v. 7. The church is compared to a garden of spices (Cant. iv. 12, 14). Grace is the perfume of the soul, Eccles. vii. 1. The memorial thereof shall be as the wine of Lebanon (so the margin reads it), their surviving honours when they are gone, shall be as the wine of Lebanon, that has a delicate flavour. The church is compared here to the vine and the olive, which bring forth useful fruits, to the honour of God and man.

Verses 8–9

I. Concerning Ephraim, v. 8.

1. His repentance and reformation: Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? As some read it, God here reasons and argues with him, why he should renounce idolatry: "O Ephraim! what to me and idols? What concord or agreement can there be between me and idols?" As we read it, God promises to bring Ephraim and keep him to this: Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? He had promised (v. 3) not to say any more to the works of his hands, You are my gods. Ephraim had been joined to idols (ch. iv. 17), and yet God will work such a change in him that he shall loathe them as much as ever he loved them.

2. The gracious notice God is pleased to take of it: I have heard him, and observed him. I have heard, and will look upon him; so some read it. God observed Ephraim, to see whether he would bring forth fruits meet for this profession of repentance.

3. Before, Israel was compared to a tree, now God compares himself to one. "I am like a green fir-tree, and will be so to thee." He will be either a sun and a shield or a shade and a shield, according as their case requires. As the root of a tree: From me is thy fruit found—from him we receive grace and strength to enable us to do our duty. Whatever fruits of righteousness we bring forth, all the praise of them is due to God.

II. Concerning everyone that reads the words of the prophecy of this book (v. 9): Who is wise? and he shall understand these things. Those that are wise in the doing of their duty, that are prudent in practical religion, are most likely to know and understand the truths and providences of God, which are a mystery to others, John vii. 17. The right ways of God to those that are good are, and will be, a savour of life unto life: The just shall walk in them. The transgressors shall fall not only in their own wrong ways, but even in the right ways of the Lord. Recipitur ad modum recipientis—What is received influences according to the qualities of the receiver. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. But of all transgressors those certainly have the most dangerous fatal falls that fall in the ways of God.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET JOEL

We are uncertain concerning the time when this prophet prophesied; it is probable that it was about the same time that Amos prophesied. Hosea and Obadiah prophesied about the same time; and it appears that Amos prophesied in the days of Jeroboam II, king of Israel, Amos vii. 10. God sent a variety of prophets, that they might strengthen the hands one of another. In this prophecy, I. The desolations made by hosts of noxious insects is described, ch. i and part of ch. ii. II. The people are called to repentance, ch. ii. III. Promises are made of the return of mercy upon their repentance (ch. ii), and promises of the pouring out of the Spirit in the latter days. IV. The cause of God's people is pleaded against their enemies, whom God would in due time reckon with (ch. iii); and glorious things are spoken of the gospel-Jerusalem and of the prosperity and perpetuity of it.

CHAP. I

This chapter is the description of a lamentable devastation made of the country of Judah by locusts and caterpillars. Some think that the prophet speaks of it as a thing to come and gives warning of it beforehand, as usually the prophets did of judgments coming. Others think that it was now present, and that his business was to affect the people with it and awaken them by it to repentance. I. It is spoken of as a judgment, ver. 1–7. II. All sorts of people sharing in the calamity are called upon to lament it, ver. 8–13. III. They are directed to look up to God in their lamentations, and to humble themselves before him, ver. 14–20.

Verses 1–7

Joel here speaks of a sore judgment which was now brought, or to be brought, upon Judah, for their sins.

I. The judgment was such as could not be paralleled in the ages that were past, or in the memory of any living, v. 2. Those that outdo their predecessors in sin may expect to fall under greater judgments than any of their predecessors knew. It was such as would not be forgotten in the ages to come (v. 3): "Tell you your children of it; that they may take warning, and learn obedience by the things which you have suffered. Yea, let your children tell their children, and their children another generation; let them tell it to teach their children to stand in awe of God and of his judgments, and to tremble before him."

II. The judgment is an invasion of the country of Judea by a great army. Many interpreters both ancient and modern understand it of armies of men, the forces of the Assyrians, which, under Sennacherib, took all the defended cities of Judah, and made havoc of the country. Some make the four sorts of animals here named (v. 4) to signify the four monarchies which, in their turns, were oppressive to the Jews, one destroying what had escaped the fury of the other. But it seems much rather to be understood literally of armies of insects coming upon the land and eating up the fruits of it. The plague of locusts in Egypt lasted but for a few days; this seems to have continued for four years successively (as some think), because here are four sorts of insects mentioned (v. 4), but others think they came all in one year. Though a devastation by these insects is primarily intended here, yet it is expressed in language applicable to the destruction of the country by a foreign enemy. If this nation of worms do not subdue them, another nation shall come to ruin them. These animals are locusts and caterpillars, palmer-worms and canker-worms, v. 4. They were all little insects, but when they came in vast swarms they were formidable and ate up all before them. The weaker the instrument is that God employs the more is his power magnified. They are here called a nation (v. 6), because they act as it were with a common design; for, though the locusts have no king, yet go they forth all of them by bands (Prov. xxx. 27). They are said to have the teeth of a lion because of the great and terrible execution they do. Locusts become as lions when they come armed with a divine commission. They destroy not only the grass and corn, but the trees (v. 7): The vine is laid waste. These vermin eat the leaves which should be a shelter to the fruit while it ripens. They eat the very bark of the fig-tree, and so kill it. Thus the fig-tree does not blossom, nor is there fruit in the vine.

III. A call to the drunkards to lament this judgment (v. 5): Awake and weep, all you drinkers of wine. It should touch them in a tender part; the new wine which they loved so well should be cut off from their mouth. The more men place their happiness in the gratifications of sense the more pressing temporal afflictions are upon them. The drinkers of water needed not to care when the vine was laid waste; they could live as well without it as they had done.

They are called to lament (v. 8), as a virgin laments the death of her lover to whom she was espoused, or as a young woman lately married, from whom the husband of her youth, or the husband to whom she was married when she was young, is suddenly taken away by death.

I. Let the husbandmen and vine-dressers lament, v. 11. They shall see the fruit of their labour eaten up before their eyes, and shall not be able to save any of it. The field is laid waste (v. 10); all is consumed that it produced; the land mourns; the ground has a melancholy aspect. They are justly brought to lament the loss and want of the wheat and barley. The trees are destroyed, not only the vine and the fig-tree (as before, v. 7), but the pomegranate, palm-tree, and apple-tree, all the trees of the field, as well as those of the orchard, timber-trees as well as fruit-trees. See what need we have to live in a continual dependence upon God and his providence, for our own hands are not sufficient for us.

II. Let the priests, the Lord's ministers, lament, for they share deeply in the calamity: Gird yourselves with sackcloth (v. 13). The ministers of the altar must lament and howl. "He is your God in a particular manner, and therefore it is expected that you should be more concerned than others for that which is a hindrance to the service of his sanctuary." As far as any public trouble is an obstruction to the course of religion it is to be upon that account, more than any other, sadly lamented, especially by the priests, the Lord's ministers.

Abundance of tears were shed for the destruction of the fruits of the earth by the locusts; now those tears must be turned into the right channel, that of repentance and humiliation before God.

I. A proclamation issued for a general fast. The priests are ordered to appoint one. Under public judgments there ought to be public humiliations. 1. A day is to be appointed for this purpose, a day of restraint (so the margin reads it), a day in which people must be restrained from their ordinary business. 2. It must be a fast, a religious abstaining from meat and drink, further than is of absolute necessity. Hereby we own ourselves unworthy of our necessary food, and that we have forfeited it. We punish ourselves and mortify the body. 3. There must be a solemn assembly. All had contributed to the national guilt, all shared in the national calamity, and therefore they must all join in the professions of repentance. 4. They must come together in the temple, the house of the Lord their God, because that was the house of prayer, and there they might hope to meet with God because it was the place which he had chosen to put his name there. 5. They must sanctify this fast, must observe it with sincere devotion.

II. Some considerations suggested to induce them to proclaim this fast and to observe it strictly.

1. God was beginning a controversy with them. It is time to cry unto the Lord, for the day of the Lord is at hand, v. 15. "The day of his judgment is very near, it is at hand; it will not slumber, and therefore you should not." It will be terrible. There is no fleeing from him but by fleeing to him.

2. They saw themselves already under the tokens of his displeasure. It is time to fast and pray, for their distress is very great, v. 16. Let them look into God's house, and see the effects of the judgment there; joy and gladness were cut off from the house of God.

3. The prophet returns to describe the grievousness of the calamity, in some particulars. Corn and cattle are the husbandman's staple commodities; now here he is deprived of both these. (1) The caterpillars have devoured the corn, v. 17. The seed is rotten under the clods, either through too much rain or for want of rain, or perhaps some insects underground ate it up. (2) The cattle perish too for want of grass (v. 18): How do the beasts groan! Even the flocks of sheep, which will live upon very short grass, are made desolate.

III. The prophet stirs them up to cry to God.

1. His own example (v. 19): O Lord! to thee will I cry. That which engaged him to cry to God was, not so much any personal affliction, as the national calamity: The fire has devoured the pastures of the wilderness, which seems to be meant of some parching scorching heat of the sun, which consumed them all.

2. The example of the inferior creatures: "The beasts of the field do not only groan, but cry unto thee, v. 20." The complaints of the brute-creatures here are for want of water, and for want of grass.

CHAP. II

I. A further description of that terrible desolation which should be made in the land of Judah by the locusts and caterpillars, ver. 1–11. II. A call to the people to return and repent, to fast and pray, and to seek unto God for mercy, with directions how to do this aright, ver. 12–17. III. A promise that, upon their repentance, God would remove the judgment, and restore unto them plenty of all good things, ver. 18–27. IV. A prediction of the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world, by the pouring out of the Spirit in the latter days, ver. 28–32. Thus the beginning of this chapter is made terrible with the tokens of God's wrath, but the latter end of it made comfortable with the assurances of his favour, so that, though it is only the last paragraph of the chapter that points directly at gospel-times, yet the whole may be improved as a type and figure, representing the curses of the law and the comforts of the gospel flowing upon repentance.

Verses 1–11

God contending with his own professing people for their sins and executing upon them the judgment written in the law (Deut. xxviii. 42), The fruit of thy land shall the locust consume, v. 60.

I. The war proclaimed (v. 1): Blow the trumpet in Zion to give notice to Judah and Jerusalem of the approach of the judgment, that they might prepare to meet their God by prayers and tears. It was the priests' business to sound the trumpet (Num. x. 8), both as an appeal to God in the day of their distress, and a summons to the people to come together to seek his face. It is the work of ministers to give warning from the word of God of the fatal consequences of sin.

II. A general idea given of the day of battle which is nigh at hand. It is the day of the Lord, the day of his judgment, a day of darkness and gloominess (v. 2), literally so, the swarms of locusts and caterpillars being so large and so thick as to darken the sky (Exod. x. 15). The darkness of this day will come as suddenly as the morning light, as irresistibly.

III. The army drawn up in array (v. 2): They are a great people, and a strong. The army is here described to be daring: They are as horses, as war-horses, and as horsemen, carried on with martial fire and fury, so they shall run, v. 4. Some of the ancients have observed that the head of a locust is very like, in shape, to the head of a horse. They are loud and noisy—like the noise of chariots when driven furiously over rough ground, on the tops of the mountains, v. 5. The noise is like the noise of a flame that devours the stubble. When God's judgments are abroad they make a great noise. They are very regular, and keep ranks as a strong people set in battle array (v. 5). They shall not break their ranks, nor one thrust another, v. 7, 8.

IV. The terrible execution done by this formidable army, 1. In the country, v. 3. Look upon the fields that they have eaten up and they are as a desolate wilderness. 2. In the city. They shall climb the wall (v. 7), they shall run upon the houses, and enter in at the windows like a thief (v. 9).

V. The impressions upon the people. These enemies are invulnerable and therefore irresistible, v. 8. "One is in pain for his field, another for his vineyard, and all faces gather blackness." When God frowns upon men the lights of heaven will be small joy to them.

VI. The commander-in-chief of this formidable army is God himself, v. 11. And this makes the great day of the Lord very terrible.

Verses 12–17

God brings us into straits, that he may bring us to repentance and so bring us to himself. Here is a gracious invitation.

I. To a personal repentance, exercised in the soul. Everyone must mend one and mourn for one, and then we should all be mended.

1. What it is to repent, for it is the same that the Lord our God still requires of us. (1) We must be truly humbled for our sins, must be sorry we have by sin offended God, and ashamed we have by sin wronged ourselves. There must be outward expressions of sorrow and shame, fasting, and weeping, and mourning. But the outward expressions of sorrow must spring from within. And therefore it follows, Rend your heart, and not your garments. Rending the heart is that which God looks for and requires; that is the broken and contrite heart which he will not despise, Ps. li. 17. (2) We must be thoroughly converted to our God, and come home to him when we fall out with sin. Turn you even to me, saith the Lord (v. 12), and again (v. 13), Turn unto the Lord your God.

2. Arguments used to persuade this people thus to turn to the Lord with all their hearts. We are sure that he is a good God. We must turn to the Lord our God, not only because he has been just and righteous in punishing us for our sins, but because he is gracious and merciful, in receiving us upon our repentance. He repents him of the evil, not that he changes his mind, but, when the sinner's mind is changed, God's way towards him is changed; the sentence is reversed, and the curse of the law is taken off. There is no question at all but that if we truly repent of our sins God will forgive them, and be reconciled to us; but whether he will remove this or the other affliction which we are under may well be questioned, and yet the probability of it should encourage us to repent.

II. They are here called to a public national repentance, as a national act, for the glory of God, and that the neighbouring nations might know what it was that qualified them for God's gracious returns in mercy to them. The congregation must be called together, v. 15, 16. The trumpet was blown (v. 1), to sound an alarm of war; but now it must be blown in order to a treaty of peace. What was said ch. i. 14 is here repeated: "Call a solemn assembly; gather the people; sanctify the congregation; appoint a time for solemn preparation beforehand and put them in mind to prepare themselves. Let not the greatest be excused, but assemble the elders, the judges and magistrates. Let not the meanest be passed by, but gather the children, and those that suck the breasts." Private joys must give way to public sorrows, both those for affliction and those for sin. The priests, the Lord's ministers, must preside in the congregation, and be God's mouth to the people, and theirs to God. They must officiate between the porch and the altar. There the people must see them weeping and wrestling, like their father Jacob, and be helped into the same devout frame. Their petition must be, Spare thy people, O Lord! "Let not the heathen make them a proverb, or a by-word" (so some read it); "let it never be said, As poor and beggarly as an Israelite."

Verses 18–27

They prayed that God would spare them, and see here with what good words and comfortable words he answered them; for God's promises are real answers to the prayers of faith.

I. Whence this mercy promised shall take rise (v. 18): God will be jealous for his land and pity his people. He will restore them their forfeited comforts.

II. Instances of his mercy: 1. The destroying army shall be dispersed and defeated (v. 20): "I will remove far off from you the northern army, that army of locusts and caterpillars that invaded you from the north. Nothing shall remain of these swarms of insects but the ill savour of them. "Many interpreters, by this northern army, understand that of Sennacherib, which was dispersed when God by it had accomplished his whole work upon Mount Zion and upon Jerusalem, Isa. x. 12. It is promised (v. 22) that the pastures of the wilderness, the pastures which the locusts had left as bare as the wilderness, shall again spring and the trees shall again bear their fruit, particularly the fig-tree and the vine. It shall be, for (v. 23) the Lord has given and will give you the former rain and the latter rain, and will give them moderately, and in due season, the latter rain in the first month, when it was wanted and expected. All their losses shall be repaired (v. 25): "I will restore to you the years that the locust has eaten; you shall be comforted according to the time that you have been afflicted, and shall have years of plenty to balance the years of famine." Look into the stores and you shall find the floors full of wheat, and the vats overflowing with wine and oil (v. 24), whereas, in the day of their distress, the wine and oil languished and the barns were broken down, ch. i. 10, 17. Some expositors understand these promises figuratively, as pointing at gospel-grace. When God sends us his promises to be the matter of our comfort, his graces to be the grounds of it, and his Spirit to be the author of it, he has sent us (according to his promise here, v. 19) corn, and wine, and oil, or that which is unspeakably better.

III. What use shall be made of these returns of God's mercy.

1. God shall have the glory for they shall rejoice in the Lord their God (v. 23), and not praise their idols, nor call their corn and wine the rewards that their lovers had given them.

2. They shall have the comfort, and spiritual benefit, thereof. Their reputation shall be retrieved (v. 19): "I will no more make you a reproach among the heathen, that triumphed in your calamities and insulted over you; and v. 26, 27. Their joys shall be revived (v. 23). They shall rejoice in the Lord their God, not so much in the good things themselves that are given them as in the good hand that gives them. The joy of harvest and the joy of a feast must both terminate in God, whose love we should taste in all the gifts of his bounty, that we may make him our chief joy, as he is our chief good, and the fountain of all good to us. Their faith in God shall be confirmed and increased. This is promised here (v. 27): You shall know that I am in the midst of Israel, the Holy One in the midst of thee (Hos. xi. 9). and that I am the Lord your God, and none else. We should labour to grow in our acquaintance with God by all providences, both merciful and afflictive.

Verses 28–32

The promises of corn, and wine, and oil, would be acceptable to a wasted country; but we must not rest in those things. These verses have reference to better things, both the kingdom of grace and the kingdom of glory.

I. How the kingdom of grace shall be introduced by a plentiful effusion of the Spirit, v. 28, 29. The apostle Peter has given us an assurance that when the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 1, &c.), that was the very thing which was spoken of here by the prophet Joel, v. 16, 17. We often read in the Old Testament of the Spirit of the Lord coming by drops, as it were, upon the judges and prophets whom God raised up for extraordinary services; but now the Spirit shall be poured out plentifully in a full stream, as was promised, Isa. xliv. 3. The time fixed for this is afterwards; after the fulfilling of the foregoing promises this shall be fulfilled. The Spirit shall be poured out upon all flesh, not as hitherto upon Jews only, but upon Gentiles also; for in Christ there is no distinction between Jew and Greek, Rom. x. 11, 12. The Jews understand it of all flesh in the land of Israel, and Peter himself did not fully understand it as speaking of the Gentiles till he saw it accomplished in the descent of the Holy Ghost upon Cornelius and his friends, who were Gentiles (Acts x. 44, 45), which was but a continuation of the same gift which was bestowed on the day of Pentecost. "Your old men, who are past their vigour and whose spirits begin to decay, your young men, who have yet but little experience of divine things, shall yet dream dreams and see visions; God will reveal himself by dreams and visions both to young and old. They shall prophesy; they shall receive new discoveries of divine things, and that not for their own use only, but for the benefit of the church. They shall interpret scripture, and speak of things distant, and future. By these extraordinary gifts the Christian church was first founded and set up, and the scriptures were written, and the ministry settled.

II. How the kingdom of glory shall be introduced by the change of nature, v. 30, 31. The pouring out of the Spirit will be very comfortable to the righteous; but let the unrighteous hear this and tremble. There is a great and terrible day of the Lord coming. It will be accomplished in full at the end of time. It was accomplished in part in the death of Christ (which is called the judgment of this world, when the earth quaked and the sun was darkened), and in the destruction of Jerusalem, which was a figure of the general judgment. The judgments of God upon a sinful world, and the frequent destruction of wicked kingdoms by fire and sword, are presages of the judgment of the world in the last day.

III. The safety and happiness of all true believers both in the first and second coming of Jesus Christ, v. 32. This speaks of particular persons, for to them the New Testament has more respect, and less to kingdoms and nations, than the Old. Though the day of the Lord will be great and terrible, yet in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem there shall be deliverance from the terror of it. Christ is himself not only the Saviour, but the salvation; he is so to the ends of the earth. This deliverance, laid up for us in the covenant of grace, is in performance of the promises made to the fathers. See Luke i. 72. There is a remnant interested in this salvation, and for whom the deliverance is wrought. Christ in you, the hope of glory. Those that sincerely call upon God: Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, whether Jew or Gentile, Rom. x. 13, shall be delivered. This calling on God supposes knowledge of him, faith in him, desire towards him, dependence on him, and a conscientious obedience to him; for, without that, crying Lord, Lord, will not stand us in any stead.

CHAP. III

In the close of the foregoing chapter we had a gracious promise of deliverance in Mount Zion and Jerusalem: now this whole chapter is a comment upon that promise, showing what that deliverance shall be, how it shall be wrought by the destruction of the church's enemies, and how it shall be perfected in the everlasting rest and joy of the church. This was in part accomplished in the deliverance of Jerusalem from the attempt that Sennacherib made upon it in Hezekiah's time, and afterwards in the return of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, and other deliverances wrought for the Jewish church between that and Christ's coming. But it has a further reference, to the great redemption wrought out for us by Jesus Christ, and the destruction of our spiritual enemies and all their agents. Here is a prediction, I. Of God's reckoning with the enemies of his people, ver. 1–8. II. Of God's judging all nations when the measure of their iniquity is full, ver. 9–17. III. Of the provision God has made for the refreshment of his people, ver. 18–21. Those promises were written for our learning, "that we, through patience and comfort of this scripture, might have hope."

Verses 1–8

The year of the redeemed, and the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion. A prophecy of what shall be done whenever it comes, for it comes often, and at the end of time it will come once for all.

I. It shall be the year of the redeemed, for God will bring again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem, v. 1. Though the bondage of God's people may be grievous and long, yet it shall not be everlasting. That in Egypt ended at length. Let my son go, that he may serve me. That in Babylon shall likewise end well. And the Lord Jesus will provide for the effectual redemption of enslaved souls from under the dominion of sin and Satan, and will proclaim that acceptable year, and the opening of the prison to those that were bound.

II. It shall be the year of recompences for the controversy of Zion. God will lead captivity captive (Ps. lxviii. 18), will lead those captive that led his people captive, Rev. xiii. 10. All nations had made themselves liable to the judgment of God for wrong done to his people. Whatsoever nation injured God's nation, they should not go unpunished; for he that touches the Israel of God shall be made to know that he touches the apple of his eye. But the neighbouring nations shall be particularly reckoned with—Tyre, and Sidon, and all the coasts of Palestine, or the Philistines, who have been troublesome neighbours to the Israel of God, v. 4. They shall all be gathered (v. 2). They shall be brought down into the valley of Jehoshaphat, which lay near Jerusalem, and there God will plead with them. It was in this valley of Jehoshaphat (as Dr. Lightfoot suggests) that Sennacherib's army, or part of it, lay, when it was destroyed by an angel. This prosecution is set on foot for my people, and for my heritage Israel. Many affronts they had put upon God by their idolatries, but that for which God has a quarrel with them is the affront they have put upon his people and upon the vessels of his sanctuary. They had been abusive to the people of Israel, had scattered them among the nations. They parted their land, and have cast lots for my people, and sold them. When they had taken them prisoners they did not increase their wealth by their price, but sold them for pleasure rather than profit; they gave a boy taken in war for the hire of a harlot, and a girl for so many bottles of wine as would serve them for one sitting, a goodly price for a son and daughter of Israel to be a slave and a drudge in a tavern or a brothel. That which is got by one sin is commonly spent upon another. The Tyrians and Philistines, when they seized any of the children of Judah and Jerusalem, sold them to the Grecians, that they might remove them far from their own border, v. 6. They had unjustly seized God's silver and gold (v. 5), by which some understand the wealth of Israel. But it seems rather to be meant of the vessels and treasures of the temple, which God here calls his goodly pleasant things. These they carried into their temples as trophies of their victory over God's Israel, thinking that therein they triumphed over Israel's God, and that their idols triumphed over him. Thus the ark was put in Dagon's temple. Can they pretend that either God or his people have done them any injury, for which they may justify themselves in doing them these mischiefs? Those that contend with God will find themselves unable to make their part good with him. He will recompense them suddenly. They shall not gain their end in the mischief they designed against God's people. They thought to remove them so far from their border that they should never return to it again, v. 6. But (says God) "I will raise them out of the place whither you have sold them, and they shall not, as you intended, be buried alive there." The sellers shall be paid in their own coin. They shall justly be sold to the Sabeans, to a people far off. This (some think) had its accomplishment in the victories obtained by the Maccabees over the enemies of the Jews; others think it looks as far forward as the last day.

The notice of God's judging the nations may have reference to the destruction of Sennacherib, Nebuchadnezzar, Antiochus, and to the Antichrist especially, and all the proud enemies of the Christian church; but some of the best interpreters, ancient and modern, think the scope of these verses is to set forth the day of the last judgment.

I. A challenge given to all the enemies of God's kingdom, v. 9–11. It seems to be here spoken ironically: "Proclaim you this among the Gentiles; let all the forces of the nations be summoned to join in confederacy against God and his people." Thus does a God of almighty power bid defiance to all the opposition of the powers of darkness. The heathen must come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat, to receive their doom (v. 12). Jehoshaphat signifies the judgment of the Lord. Let them come to the place of God's judgment, which perhaps is the chief reason for the using of this name. The challenge (v. 9) is turned into a summons, v. 12.

II. A charge given to the ministers of God's justice to appear and act against these enemies of his kingdom among men: And therefore cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord! v. 11. Some think the words (v. 9, 10), Prepare war, wake up the mighty men, are not a challenge to the enemies' hosts, but a charge to God's hosts. However, it is plain that to them the charge is given (v. 13), Put you in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe; that is, their wickedness is great, they are ripe for ruin.

III. The vast appearance that shall be in that solemn day (v. 14): Multitudes, multitudes, in the valley of decision, the same which before was called the valley of Jehoshaphat. The day of judgment will be the day of decision. The valley of the distribution of judgment (so the Chaldee), when every man shall receive according to the things done in the body. The valley of threshing (so the margin), carrying on the metaphor of the harvest, v. 13. The proud enemies of God's people will then be made as the dust of the summer threshing-floors.

IV. The amazing change that shall then be made in the kingdom of nature (v. 15): The sun and moon shall be darkened, as before, ch. ii. 31. Their glory and lustre shall be eclipsed by the far greater brightness of that glory in which the Judge shall then appear.

V. The different impressions which that day will make. 1. To the wicked it will be a terrible day. The Lord shall then speak from Zion and Jerusalem, from the throne of his glory. His speaking will be to the wicked, terrible as the roaring of a lion (for so the word signifies). 2. To the righteous it will be a joyful day. Their longings shall be satisfied: The Lord will be the hope of his people. He will be the harbour of his people (so the word is), their home. Their happiness shall be confirmed. Their holiness shall be completed (v. 17): Then shall Jerusalem be holy, the holy city indeed. The gospel-church is a holy society, even in its militant state, but will never be holiness itself till it comes to be triumphant. There shall not enter into the New Jerusalem anything that defiles or works iniquity. So shall you know that I am the Lord your God. It is an experimental knowledge. They shall find him their hope and strength in the worst of times, and so they shall know that he is the Lord their God.

These promises have their accomplishment in part in the kingdom of grace, but will have their full accomplishment in the kingdom of glory.

I. It is promised that the enemies of the church shall be vanquished and brought down, v. 19. Egypt, that old enemy of Israel, and Edom, which had an inveterate enmity to Israel, these shall be a desolation, no more to be inhabited. The quarrel God has with these kingdoms is for their violence against the children of Judah; see Ezek. xxv. 3, 8, 12, 15; xxvi. 2.

II. It is promised that the church shall be very happy in spiritual privileges, even during its militant state, but much more when it comes to be triumphant. Three things are promised:

1. Purity. This is put last here, as a reason for the rest (v. 21); but we may consider it first, as the ground and foundation of the rest: I will cleanse their blood that I have not cleansed. That shall be cleansed by the blood of Christ which could not be cleansed by the sacrifices and purifications of the ceremonial law. Though the refining and reforming of the church is work that goes on slowly, and still there is something that is not cleansed, yet there is a day coming when everything that is amiss shall be amended.

2. Plenty, v. 18. It intimates the abundance of vineyards, and of cattle in the pastures. And, to make the corn-land fruitful, the rivers of Judah shall flow with water, so that the country shall be like the garden of Eden, Ps. lxv. 9. But this seems to be meant spiritually; the graces and comforts of the new covenant are compared to wine and milk (Isa. lv. 1), and the Spirit to rivers of living water, John vii. 38. And these gifts abound much more under the New Testament than they did under the Old. The fountain of this plenty is in the house of God, whence the streams take their rise, as those waters of the sanctuary (Ezek. xlvii. 1) from under the threshold of the house. Christ himself is this fountain; his merit and grace cleanse and refresh us. This is said to water the valley of Shittim, which lay on the other side of Jordan, a barren valley, which intimates that gospel-grace, flowing from Christ, shall reach far, even to the Gentile world.

3. Perpetuity. This crowns all the rest (v. 20): Judah shall dwell for ever, and Jerusalem shall continue from generation to generation. The church of Christ shall continue in the world to the end of time.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROPHECY OF AMOS

Amos was a country-farmer. Amos signifies a burden, whence the Jews have a tradition that he spoke with stammering lips; we may rather say that his speech was weighty and his word the burden of the Lord. He was (as most think) of Judah, yet prophesied chiefly against Israel, and at Bethel, ch. vii. 13. Some think his style is plain and rustic. It appears by his contest with Amaziah the priest of Bethel that he met with opposition, but was faithful and bold in reproving sin, and pressing in his exhortations to repentance and reformation. He begins with threatenings against the neighbouring nations that were enemies to Israel, ch. i and ii. He then calls Israel to account, and judges them for their idolatry, and their incorrigibleness under God's judgments, ch. iii and iv. He calls them to repentance (ch. v), foretells the desolations that were coming upon them not withstanding their security (ch. vi), some particular judgments (ch. vii), particularly on Amaziah; and, after other reproofs and threatenings (ch. viii and ix), concludes with a promise of the setting up of the Messiah's kingdom and the happiness of God's spiritual Israel.

CHAP. I

I. The general title of this prophecy (ver. 1), with the general scope of it, ver. 2. II. God's particular controversy with Syria (ver. 3–5), with Palestine (ver. 6–8), with Tyre (ver. 9, 10), with Edom (ver. 11, 12), and with Ammon (ver. 13–15), for their cruelty to his people. This explains God's pleading with the nations, Joel iii. 2.

Verses 1–2

I. The general character of this prophecy. It consists of the words which the prophet saw. The prophet saw these words, that is they were revealed to him in a vision, as John is said to see the voice that spoke to him, Rev. i. 12.

II. The person by whom this prophecy was sent—Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa, and was one of them. Some think he was a rich dealer in cattle. Others think he was a poor keeper of cattle, for we find (ch. vii. 14, 15) that he was withal a gatherer of wild figs, by which we may suppose he could but just get his bread. When God would send a prophet to reprove and warn his people, he employed a shepherd.

III. The persons concerned in the prophecy of this book; the ten tribes, who were now ripening apace for ruin. God had raised them up prophets among themselves (ch. ii. 11), but they regarded them not; therefore God sends them one from Tekoa, in the land of Judah.

IV. The book is dated by the reigns of the kings under whom the prophet prophesied. It was in the days of Uzziah king of Judah, when the affairs of that kingdom went very well, and of Jeroboam II, king of Israel, when the affairs of that kingdom went pretty well; yet then they must both be told of their sins and of the judgments that were coming upon them, that they might not with the present gleam of prosperity flatter themselves into a confidence of their perpetual security. It was two years before the earthquake, that earthquake which is mentioned to have been in the days of Uzziah (Zech. xiv. 5).

V. The introduction to these prophecies, containing the general scope of them (v. 2): The Lord will roar from Zion. His threatenings by his prophets will be as terrible as the roaring of a lion is to the shepherds and their flocks. See Hosea (ch. xi. 10) and Joel, ch. iii. 16.

Verses 3–15

What the Lord says here may be explained by what he says Jer. xii. 14. Damascus was a near neighbour to Israel on the north, Tyre and Gaza on the west, Edom on the south, Ammon and Moab on the east; and all had been evil neighbours.

I. Though those nations will not worship him as their God, yet they shall be made to know that they are accountable to him as their Judge.

1. The indictment drawn up against them all is thus far the same, (1) That they are charged in general with three transgressions, and with four, that is, with many transgressions (as by one or two we mean a few, so by three or four we mean many), where we read of three things, yea, four, generally one seems to be more especially intended. (2) That the particular sin which is the fourth, is the sin of persecution.

2. The judgment given against them all is thus far the same, (1) That, their sin having risen to such a height, God will not turn away the punishment thereof. Justice shall take its course. (2) That God will kindle a fire among them; this is said concerning all these evil neighbours, v. 4, 7, 10, 12, 14. God will send a fire into their cities.

II. What is peculiar to each of them.

1. Concerning Damascus, the capital of Syria, a kingdom that was often vexatious to Israel. (1) The peculiar sin of Damascus: They threshed Gilead with threshing-instruments of iron (v. 3), which may be understood literally of their putting to the torture the inhabitants of Gilead whom they got into their hands, as David put the Ammonites under saws and harrows, 2 Sam. xii. 31. Or it may be taken figuratively. 2 Kings xiii. 7, He destroyed them, and made them like the dust by threshing. (2) The peculiar punishment of Damascus is, [1] That fire shall fasten not on the chief city, but on the house of Hazael, which he built; and it shall devour the palaces of Ben-hadad. [2] That the enemy shall force his way into the city (v. 5): I will break the bar of Damascus may be understood figuratively: the strength and safety of that great city shall fail, and prove insufficient. [3] That the people shall be destroyed with the sword: I will cut off the inhabitant from the plain of Aven, the valley of idolatry (1 Kings xx. 23). [4] That the body of the nation shall be carried off. The people shall go into captivity unto Kir, which was in the country of the Medes. We find this fulfilled (2 Kings xvi. 9) about fifty years after.

2. Concerning Gaza, a city of the Philistines. (1) The peculiar sin of the Philistines was carrying away captive the whole captivity, either of Israel or Judah, which some think refers to that inroad made upon Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi. 17), or, perhaps, to their seizing those that fled to them for shelter when Sennacherib invaded Judah, and selling them to the Grecians (Joel iii. 4–6), or to the Edomites. (2) The peculiar punishment of the Philistines is that fire shall devour the palaces of Gaza, and that the inhabitants of the other cities of the Philistines, Ashdod (or Azotus), Ashkelon, and Ekron, shall all be cut off.

3. Concerning Tyre, that famous city, that was itself a kingdom, v. 9. (1) The peculiar sin of Tyre is delivering up the whole captivity to Edom, that is, selling to the Edomites those of Israel that fled to them for shelter. (2) In the punishment of Tyrus the palaces thereof shall be devoured, which was done when Nebuchadnezzar took it after thirteen years' siege.

4. Concerning Edom, the posterity of Esau. (1) Their peculiar sin was an unmerciful pursuit of the people of God to do them a mischief, v. 11. He did pursue his brother with the sword, not only of old (Num. xx. 18), but ever since. Whenever any other enemy had put Judah or Israel to flight, then the Edomites fell upon the rear, slew those that were half dead already, and did cast off all pity. (2) In their punishment a fire shall be sent to devour their palaces.

5. Concerning the Ammonites, v. 13–15. The fire of their anger turned against the people of God; they ripped up the women with child of Gilead. It was done with a devilish design to extirpate the race of Israel by killing not only all that were born, but all that were to be born. It was that they might enlarge their border, that they might make the land of Gilead their own. We find (Jer. xlix. 1) that the Ammonites inherited Gad (that is, Gilead) under pretence that Israel had no heirs. (2) See how violently the fire of God's anger burned against them. Shall not his soul be avenged. The fire shall be kindled with shouting in the day of battle, that is, war shall kindle the fire. It is particularly threatened that their king and his princes shall go together into captivity, carried away by the king of Babylon. Milchom shall go into captivity; some understand it of the god of the Ammonites, whom they called Moloch—a king.

CHAP. II

I. God, by the prophet, proceeds with Moab as with other nations, ver. 1–3. II. He shows what quarrel he had with Judah, ver. 4, 5. III. He at length begins his charge against Israel, to which all that goes before is but an introduction. 1. The sins they are charged with—injustice, oppression, whoredom, ver. 6–8. 2. The temporal and spiritual mercies God had bestowed upon them, for which they had made him such ungrateful returns, ver. 9–12. 3. God's complaint of them for their sins (ver. 13) and his threatenings of their ruin, ver. 14–16.

Verses 1–8

I. The judgment of Moab. 1. Moab's fourth transgression was cruelty. The instance given refers not to the people of God: The king of Moab burnt the bones of the king of Edom into lime. There was war between the Edomites and the Moabites, in which the king of Moab offered his own son for a burnt-offering, to appease his deity, 2 Kings iii. 26, 27. Afterwards he, or his successors, having an advantage against the king of Edom, seized him alive and burnt him to ashes, or slew him and burnt his body, or dug up the bones and burnt them to lime. 2. Moab's doom for this transgression is death. Moab shall die; the Moabites shall be cut off with the sword. The king, judges and princes, shall be cut off together.

II. Judah also is a near neighbour to Israel, and had made itself like the heathen and mingled with them, and therefore the indictment here runs in the same form: For three transgressions of Judah, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof. The sentence is the same (v. 5): "I will send a fire upon Judah, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem, though it is the holy city, and God has formerly been known in its palaces for a refuge." But the sin charged upon Judah is different from all the rest. The other nations were reckoned with for injuries done to men, but Judah is reckoned with for indignities done to God, v. 4. They have despised the law of the Lord, and herein they despised the wisdom, justice, and goodness, as well as the authority and sovereignty, of the Lawmaker. They put honour upon his rivals, their idols, here called their lies, which caused them to err.

III. The words which Amos saw concerning Israel. He begins with them as with the rest: For three transgressions of Israel, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof. Their sins were, 1. Perverting justice. They made nothing of selling a righteous man for a piece of silver; the bribe always turned the scale. Those who will wrong their consciences for anything will come at length to sell justice for a pair of old shoes. 2. Oppressing the poor: They pant after the dust of the earth on the head of the poor; they make a prey of those that are in sorrow with dust on their heads, poor orphans in mourning for their parents; to get their estates. 3. Abominable uncleanness, even incest itself. 4. Regaling themselves, and yet pretending to honour their God with that which they had got by oppression and extortion, v. 8. They lay themselves down at ease upon clothes laid to pledge, which they ought to have restored the same night, according to the law, Deut. xxiv. 12, 13. And they drink the wine of the condemned, of such as they have fined, spending that in sensuality which they have got by injustice. They think to make atonement for this by drinking this wine in the house of their God, in the temples where they worshipped their calves.

I. God puts his people Israel in mind of the great things he had done for them, v. 9, 10. "Israel, remember God brought thee out of Egypt, where thou wouldst otherwise have perished in slavery. He led thee forty years through a desert land, and fed thee in a wilderness." He made room for them in Canaan: I destroyed the Amorite before them. They were of great stature (whose height was like the height of the cedars) and the people of Israel were as shrubs to them; and they were strong as the oaks. I destroyed his fruit from above and his roots from beneath, so that the Amorites were no more a nation. Thus highly did God value Israel. How ungrateful then were those who put such contempt upon him!

II. He upbraids them with the spiritual privileges they enjoyed as a holy nation, v. 11. They had prophets divinely inspired, and commissioned to make known the mind of God to them. It was an honour that they had children of their own to be God's messengers to them. They had Nazarites that were bright examples of piety. These God raised up to be his witnesses against the impieties of that degenerate age.

III. He charges them with the abuse of the means of grace they enjoyed, v. 12. They did what they could to debauch good people: You gave the Nazarites wine to drink, contrary to their vow. They did what they could to silence good ministers, and to stop their mouths: You commanded the prophets, saying, Prophesy not, and threatened them if they did prophesy (ch. vii. 12).

IV. He complains of the wrong they did him by their sins (v. 13): "I am pressed under you, I am straitened by you (Hos. xi. 8, 9). I am loaded and burdened by you (Isa. i. 24). I am pressed under you and the load of your sins as a cart is pressed that is full of sheaves, is loaded with corn, in the midst of the joy of harvest."

V. He threatens them with unavoidable ruin. And so some read, v. 13, "Behold I will press, or straiten, your place, as a cart full of sheaves presses; they shall be loaded with judgments till they sink." If God load us daily with his benefits, and we, notwithstanding that, load him with our sins, how can we expect any other than that he should load us with his judgments? When the Assyrian army comes to lay the country waste by sword and captivity none shall escape. He that is swift of foot shall not deliver himself, v. 15. Or do they say, We will flee upon horses, and we will ride upon the swift? Yet they shall be overtaken. It will be in vain to think of fighting it out. The strong shall not strengthen his force. And the mighty shall not be able to deliver himself. And, as the bodily strength shall fail, so shall the weapons of war. Neither shall he stand that handles the bow. He that is courageous among the mighty, that used to look danger in the face, shall flee away naked in that day.

CHAP. III

A stupid, heedless people, are called upon to take notice, I. Of the judgments of God against them and the warnings he gave them, and to be hereby awakened out of their security, ver. 1–8. II. Of the sins that were found among them, by which God was provoked thus to threaten, thus to punish, so that they unless they repented and reformed, might expect no other than that God should proceed, ver. 9–15.

Verses 1–8

The children of Israel would not regard the words of counsel that God had spoken to them, and now they shall be made to hear the word of reproof.

I. The gracious cognizance God had taken of them, and the favours he had bestowed, should not exempt them from the punishment due for their sins. Israel is a family that God brought up out of the land of Egypt (v. 1), and it was no more than a family when it went thither; thence God delivered it. It is a family that God has owned in a peculiar manner. In Judah is God known, and therefore Judah is known of God. God has covenanted with them, and conversed with them. Therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities. The favours of God, if they do not restrain us from sin, shall not exempt us from punishment. It is necessary that God should vindicate his own honour by making it appear that he hates sin and hates it most in those that are nearest to him.

II. They could not expect any comfortable communion with God unless they first made their peace with him (v. 3): Can two walk together except they be agreed? Where there is not friendship, there cannot be fellowship.

III. The warnings God gave them of judgments approaching were not groundless (v. 4): "Will a lion roar in the forest when he has no prey in view? No; he roars upon his prey. Nor would God thus give you warning if he were not really about to fall upon you with judgments." The threatenings of the word and providence of God are not bugbears, to frighten children and fools, but are inferences from the sin of man and presages of the judgments of God.

IV. Their own wickedness was the cause of these judgments, v. 5. It is their own sin that has entangled them; for can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth where no gin is for him? Nothing but their own repentance can disentangle them.

V. All their troubles came from the hand of God's providence (v. 6).

VI. Their prophets, who give them warning of judgments approaching, deliver nothing to them but what they have received from the Lord (v. 7): Surely the Lord Jehovah will do nothing, none of that evil in the city spoken of (v. 6), but he reveals it to his servants the prophets. The secret of God is in a peculiar manner with the prophets, to whom the Spirit of prophecy is a Spirit of revelation. The prophets cannot but make that known to the people which God has made known to them (v. 8): The Lord God has spoken; who can but prophesy? They received a command from God to deliver what they had been charged with; and they would have been false to their trust if they had not done it.

VII. They ought to tremble before God as they would on the sounding of a trumpet. Shall a trumpet be blown in the city, and the people not be afraid, or run together? (so some read it, v. 6). Yet when God by his prophets gives them notice of their danger it makes no impression.

The Israelites are again convicted and condemned.

I. Notice is given of it to their neighbours. The prophet is ordered to publish it in the palaces of Ashdod, one of the chief cities of the Philistines; the summons must go even to the palaces in the land of Egypt. God's controversies with sinners do not fear a scrutiny; even Philistines and Egyptians will be made to see that the ways of the Lord are equal, but our ways are unequal.

1. Let them observe the behaviour of the inhabitants of Samaria; and they may see how boisterous they are, and hear how loud the cry of their sin is, as was that of Sodom. In their streets you will see great tumults in the midst thereof; reason and justice run down by the fury of an outrageous mob. The oppressed are in the midst thereof, thrown down and crushed by their oppressors. In their courts of justice, those who preside know not to do right; they act as if they had no notion at all of justice. Their treasures and stores are replenished with violence and robbery, with that which was unjustly got and unjustly kept.

2. Let them see how heavy the doom is, v. 11, 12. Their country shall be invaded and ruined. The Assyrian forces shall surround it and break in on every side. They stored up robbery in their palaces, and therefore their palaces shall be spoiled. Their countrymen shall not escape, v. 12. They shall be in the hands of the enemy, as a lamb in the mouth of a lion, devoured and eaten up, and if any do escape, yet they shall be very few, and those of the meanest and least considerable, like two legs, or shanks, of a lamb, or a piece of an ear, which the lion drops, or the shepherd takes from him, when he has eaten the body; so, perhaps, here and there one may escape from Samaria and from Damascus, but those shall do so with the utmost hazard, by hiding themselves in the corner of a bed or under the bed's feet, which intimates that their spirits shall be quite cowed and broken.

II. Notice is given to themselves, v. 13. Let this be testified, and heard, in the house of Jacob, for it is spoken by the Lord God, the God of hosts. 1. Woe to their altars, for God will visit them. He will bring into the account all their superstition and idolatry—the horns of the altar shall be cut off, and fall to the ground, and with them the altar itself broken to pieces. Some make the horns of the altar to signify all those things which they flee to for refuge; they shall all be cut off, so that they shall have nothing to take hold of. 2. Woe to their houses, for God will visit them too. He will enquire into the robbery they have stored up in their houses, and the luxury in which they lived: and I will smite the winter-house with the summer-house, v. 15. The houses of ivory shall perish, shall be burnt or pulled down; and the great houses shall have an end; their extravagance about them will be put to the score of their sins and follies.

CHAP. IV

I. The oppressors in Israel are threatened for their oppression of the poor, ver. 1–3. II. The idolaters in Israel are given up to their own heart's lusts, ver. 4, 5. III. All the sins of Israel are aggravated from their refusal to return and reform, ver. 6–11. IV. They are invited yet to humble themselves before God, ver. 12, 13.

Verses 1–5

Oppressors shall be humbled and idolaters shall be hardened.

I. Proud oppressors shall be humbled for their oppressions; for he that does wrong shall receive according to the wrong that he has done.

1. How their sin is described, v. 1. They are compared to the kine of Bashan, a breed of cattle very strong, especially if they were fed upon the mountain of Samaria. Amos had been a herdsman, and he speaks in the dialect of his calling, comparing the rich men, that lived in luxury and wantonness, to the kine of Bashan, which were wanton and unruly, broke through the hedges, and trespassed upon the neighbouring grounds; and not only so, but pushed and gored the smaller cattle. Those that had their summer-houses upon the mountains of Samaria were as mischievous as the kine upon the mountains of Bashan and as injurious to those about them. They oppress the poor and crush them, to squeeze something out of them. They are in confederacy with those that do so. They say to their masters (to the masters of the poor, that take from them what they have, when they ought to relieve them), "Bring, and let us drink; let us feast with you upon the gains of your oppression, and then we will protect you, and stand by you in it, and reject the appeals of the poor against you."

2. How their punishment is described, v. 2, 3. God will take them away with hooks, and their posterity with fish-hooks; he will send the Assyrian army upon them, that shall not only enclose the body of the nation in their net, but shall angle for particular persons, and take them prisoners as with fish-hooks, shall draw them out of their own land as fish are drawn out of the water. Some shall attempt to escape by flight: You shall go out at the breaches made in the wall of the city, every cow at that which is before her, to shift for her own safety, and now the unruly kine of Bashan are themselves crushed, as they crushed the poor and needy. Others shall think to shelter themselves: You shall throw yourselves (so some read it), or throw them (that is your children) into the palace, where the enemy will find them ready to be seized.

3. How their sentence to this punishment is ratified: The Lord God has sworn it by his holiness. He swears by his holiness, that attribute of his which is so much his glory.

II. Obstinate idolaters shall be hardened in their idolatries (v. 4, 5): Come to Bethel, and transgress. It is spoken ironically: "Do so; take your course; multiply your transgressions by multiplying your sacrifices, for this liketh you; but what will you do in the end?" They mimicked God's institutions. They had their daily sacrifice at the altar of Bethel, as God had at his altar; they had their thank-offerings as God had, only they allowed leaven in them. Holy bread would not serve them, unless it were pleasant bread. They are upbraided with it. "Your foolish hearts shall be more and more darkened and besotted, and you shall be quite given up to these strong delusions, to believe a lie." Thus Christ said to the Jews, Fill you up the measure of your fathers, Matt. xxiii. 32.

I. God had by several tokens intimated to them his displeasure, but it had no effect.

1. It is five times repeated in these verses, as the burden of the charge, "Yet have you not returned unto me, saith the Lord; there is no sign of amendment. This intimates that that which God designed in all his rebukes was to influence them to return to him. If they had returned to their God, they would have been accepted. It is no pleasure to the Almighty that he should afflict.

2. He recounts the less judgments with which he had tried to bring them to repentance. There had sometimes been a scarcity of provisions (v. 6): "I have given you cleanness of teeth in all your cities, for you had no meat to chew." Or, I have given you emptiness of teeth, nothing to fill your mouths with. Some think this refers to that seven years' famine that was in Elisha's time, which we read of 2 Kings viii. 1. I have withholden the rain from you. The rain was withheld when there were yet three months to the harvest. Sometimes the fruits of their ground were eaten up by caterpillars, or blasted with mildew, v. 9. But they did not take warning: Yet have you not returned unto me. Sometimes the plague had raged among them, and the sword of war had cut off multitudes, v. 10. It was a pestilence after the manner of Egypt. In the way of Egypt (so the margin); when they were making their escape to Egypt, or going thither to seek for aid, the pestilence seized them by the way. The dead carcases of those that were slain either with sword or pestilence were so many that the stench of their camps came up into their nostrils. And yet this did not prevail to make them religious. In these judgments some were remarkably cut off, and made monuments of justice, others were remarkably spared, and made monuments of mercy, but it had no effect, v. 11. I have overthrown some of you, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah. Others very narrowly escaped: "You were many of you as a firebrand plucked out of the burning, like Lot out of Sodom, and yet you hate sin never the more, nor love God ever the more for the deliverance he wrought for you."

II. God calls upon his people, now in this their day, to understand the things that belong to their peace, before they were hidden from their eyes, v. 12, 13. He threatens them with sorer judgments than any they had yet been under. Nothing but reformation will prevent the ruin of a sinful people. I will punish you yet seven times more, if you will not be reformed (Lev. xxvi. 23, 24). "Resolve therefore to meet him as a humble suppliant, to meet him as thy God, in covenant with thee, to submit, and stand it out no longer." Since we cannot flee from God we are concerned to prepare to meet him; and therefore he gives us warning, that we may prepare. He sets forth the greatness and power of God as a reason why we should prepare to meet him, v. 13. He that formed the great mountains can make them plain, when they stand in the way of his people's salvation. He declares unto man what is his thought. He makes known by his servants the prophets the thought of his justice against impenitent sinners, and the thought of good he thinks towards those that repent. He knows the thought that is in man's heart; he understands it afar off. He treads upon the high places of the earth, tramples upon proud men, and upon the idols that were worshipped in the highest places. Jehovah the God of hosts is his name, for he has his being of himself, and is the fountain of all being, and all the hosts of heaven and earth are at his command. Let us humble ourselves before this God.

CHAP. V

The prophet here tells them, I. What preparation they must make; they must seek the Lord, and not idols (ver. 4–8); they must seek good, and love it, ver. 14, 15. II. Why they must make this preparation to meet their God. 1. Because of the present deplorable condition they were in, ver. 1–3. 2. Because it was by sin that they were brought into such a condition, ver. 7, 10–12. 3. Because it would be their happiness to seek God, and he was ready to be found of them, ver. 8, 9, 14. 4. Because he would proceed to their ruin, if they did not seek him, ver. 5, 6, 13, 16, 17. 5. Because all their confidences would fail them if they did not make him their friend. Their contempt of God's judgments would not secure them, ver. 18–20. Their external services in religion would not avail, ver. 21–24. Their having been long in possession of church-privileges would not be their protection, ver. 25–27. They have therefore no way left them to save themselves but by repentance and reformation.

This chapter begins with Hear this word. It is the word which I take up—not the prophet only, but the God that sent him. It is the word that the Lord has spoken, ch. iii. 1, a lamentable account of the present state of the kingdom of Israel, and a prediction of its destruction. The virgin of Israel has fallen (v. 2), she has fallen into contempt, and is universally slighted. She shall no more rise, shall never recover her former dignity again. She is forsaken upon her land. Those she was in alliance with abroad failed her, but friends at home deserted her; she would not have been carried captive into a strange land if she had not first been forsaken upon her own land. Their people, that should have helped them up, were diminished, v. 3. The city that had a militia, 1,000 strong, after the battle, shall find but 100 left; and, in proportion, the city that sent out 100 shall have but ten come back.

Verses 4–15

A message from God to the house of Israel.

I. They are told of their faults. God tells them, in general (v. 12), "I know your manifold transgressions, and your mighty sins; and you shall be made to know them too." What a multitude of vain and vile thoughts lodge within us! What a multitude of idle, wicked words have been spoken by us! In what a multitude of instances have we indulged our corrupt appetites and passions! And how many are our omissions of duty. He specifies some of these mighty sins. They corrupted the worship of God, and turned to idols; this is implied, v. 5. They had sought to Bethel, where one of the golden calves was; they had frequented Gilgal, a place where they chose to set up idols. Beer-sheba, famous in the days of the patriarchs, was now another rendezvous of idols. They perverted justice among themselves (v. 7): "You turn judgment to wormwood, that is, you make your administrations of justice bitter and displeasing to God and man." They trod upon the poor (v. 11), and such as they could get nothing by. The judges aimed at nothing but to enrich themselves; and therefore they took from the poor burdens of wheat by extortion. The poor had no other way to save themselves than by presenting to them horse-loads of corn which they and their families should have had to subsist upon. They took from the poor debts of wheat, so some read it. This sin of oppression they are again charged with (v. 12): They afflict the just, by turning the law against those that are innocent and quiet in the land; and he that departed from evil thereby made himself a prey to them. They take a bribe from the rich to patronise and protect them in oppressing the poor. Thus they turn aside the poor in the gate, in the courts of justice, from their right. Furthermore they were malicious persecutors of God's faithful ministers and people, v. 10. They could not bear to be reproved by the reading and expounding of the law, and the messages which the prophets delivered to them in the name of the Lord. They hate him that rebukes in the gate. Though things were generally very bad, yet there were some among them that spoke uprightly, and condemned them. For that reason they abhorred them; they were such inveterate enemies to honesty that they could not endure the sight of an honest man. Prophets cannot keep silence; the impulse they are under will not allow them to act on prudential considerations; they must cry aloud, and not spare. The prudent, who were wise as serpents, because they knew not how what they said might be misrepresented, were so cautious as to say nothing. The cautious men will say to a bold reprover, as Erasmus to Luther: "Abi in cellam, et dic, Miserere mei, Domine—Away to thy cell, and cry, Have mercy on me, O Lord!" Evil times will not bear plain dealing, that is, evil men will not.

II. They are told of what judgments they lay exposed to for their sins. The places of their idolatry are in danger of being ruined, v. 5. Gilgal, the headquarters of idolatry, shall go into captivity, and Bethel with its golden calf shall come to nought. The body of the kingdom is in danger of being ruined with them, v. 6. There is danger lest, if you seek not God, he break out like a fire in the house of Joseph and devour it. And there shall be none to quench it in Bethel. God tells them that when the fire of his judgments should kindle upon them all the gods they served at Bethel should not be able to quench it. What they have got by extortion shall be taken from them (v. 11): "You have built houses of hewn stone, which you thought would be lasting; but you shall not dwell in them, for your enemies shall burn them down, or take you into captivity. You have planted pleasant vineyards, but you shall never drink wine of them."

III. They are told their duty, and have great encouragement to set about it. The duties here prescribed are godliness and honesty, seriousness in their applications to God and justice in their dealings with men.

1. They are exhorted to be sincere and devout in their addresses to God, v. 4. God is not sought truly if he be not sought exclusively: "Seek you the Lord, and seek not Bethel (v. 5), for you forsake your own mercies if you observe those lying vanities. But seek the Lord (v. 6, 8); enquire after him; seek to know his mind as your rule." Seeking God will be our life. So he tells them (v. 4): Seek you me, and you shall live. So the prophet tells them (v. 6): Seek the Lord, and you shall live. "You shall be delivered from the judgments you are threatened with; your nation shall live, shall recover from its present languishings; your souls shall live; you shall be sanctified and comforted, and made for ever blessed. You shall live." God whom we are to seek (v. 8, 9) is a God of almighty power. Divers instances are here given of God's power as Creator. Compare ch. iv. 13. First, The stars are the work of his hands (v. 26), the stars of your god, those stars are God's creatures and servants. He makes the seven stars and Orion, two constellations, which Amos, a herdsman, while he kept his cattle by night, had particularly observed. He made them and either binds or looses the sweet influences of Pleiades and Orion, the two constellations mentioned. See Job xxxviii. 31; ix. 9. Secondly, The constant succession of day and night is under his direction. It is he that turns the night into the morning by the rising of the sun, and by the setting of the sun makes the day dark with night; and the same power can, for humble penitents, easily turn affliction and sorrow into prosperity and joy, but can as easily turn the prosperity of presumptuous sinners into darkness. Thirdly, The rain rises and falls as he appoints. He calls for the waters of the sea; out of them vapours are drawn up by the heat of the sun, which gather into clouds, and are poured out upon the face of the earth, to make it fruitful. It is God that has made these things; Jehovah is his name. As he is a God of almighty power himself, so he gives strength and power unto his people that seek him, and renews strength to those that had lost it, if they wait upon him for it; for (v. 9) he strengthens the spoiled against the strong. This is an encouragement to the people to seek the Lord, that, if they do so, they shall find him able to retrieve their affairs.

2. They are exhorted to be honest and just in their dealings with men, v. 14, 15: Seek good, and not evil. Hate the evil, and love the good, and establish judgment in the gate; re-establish it there, whence it has been banished, v. 7. If the right course be taken grievances may be redressed and abuses rectified: justice may yet triumph where injustice tyrannizes. In order to this, good must be loved and sought, evil must be hated. We must love good principles, love to do good, love good people; and, whatever good we do, we must do it from a principle of love, and with delight. "He will be with you as you have spoken, that is, as you have gloried." Or, "As you have prayed when you sought the Lord. Live up to your prayers, and you shall have what you pray for." This is the likeliest way to make the nation happy: "If you seek and love that which is good, you may contribute to the saving of the land from ruin."

I. A terrible threatening of destruction approaching, v. 16, 17. The threatening is introduced with more than ordinary solemnity, to strike an awe upon them; it is not the word of the prophet only, but it is the Lord Jehovah, it is the God of hosts, and it is Adonai—the Lord, who has an absolute sovereignty; it is he who can and will make his words good. The land of Israel shall be put in mourning. Look into the cities, and wailing shall be in all streets. Look into the country, and they shall say in all the highways, Alas! alas! The husbandman shall be called from the plough by the calamities of his country. Even in all vineyards, where there used to be nothing but mirth and pleasure, there shall be general wailing, when a foreign force invades the country. I will pass through thee, as the destroying angel passed through the land of Egypt.

II. A reproof to those who made light of these threatenings, v. 18. Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord, that really wish for times of war and confusion, as some do who have restless spirits, and long for changes. Or it is spoken to those who, in their lamentations for the calamities, wished they might die. Or, rather, it is spoken to those who speak jestingly of the day of the Lord. Let him do his worst; let him make speed, and hasten his work, Isa. v. 19. In answer to this, 1. He shows the folly of those who impudently wished for God's judgments: "To what end is it for you that the day of the Lord should come? You will find it not a thing to be bantered. The day of the Lord is darkness, and not light, v. 18. And, when God makes a day dark, all the world cannot make it light." He shows the folly of those who desire the day of the Lord, in hope to better themselves, or, at least, to know the worst. But the prophet tells them that they know not what they ask, v. 19. It is as if a man did flee from a lion and a bear met him, or as if a man, to escape all dangers abroad, went into the house for security, and leaned his hand on the wall to rest himself, and there a serpent bit him.

These verses show how little God valued their shows of devotion while they went on in their sins.

I. How displeasing their hypocritical services were to God. They had their feast-days at Bethel, in imitation of those at Jerusalem. They had their solemn assemblies for religious worship. They offered to God burnt-offerings, to the honour of God, together with the meat-offerings; they offered the peace-offerings, to implore the favour of God, and they offered the fat beasts they had, v. 21, 22. In imitation likewise of the temple-music, they had the noise of their songs and the melody of their viols (v. 23). With these services they hoped to obtain leave to go on in sin. He hated, he despised, their feast-days. Nothing more hateful, more despicable, than hypocrisy. God will not smell in their solemn assemblies, for there is nothing in them that is grateful to him, but a great deal that is offensive. He will not accept them. Now this intimates, 1. That sacrifice itself is of small account with God in comparison with moral duties; to love God and our neighbour is better than all burnt-offering and sacrifice. 2. That the sacrifice of the wicked is really an abomination to him, Prov. xv. 8. Dissembled piety is double iniquity.

II. What it was that he required without which no sacrifice would be acceptable (v. 24): Let judgment run down as waters, among you, and righteousness as a mighty stream, that is, "Let there be a general reformation of manners among you; let religion (God's judgment) and righteousness have their due influence upon you; let your land be watered with it, and let it bear down all vice and profaneness; let it run wide as overflowing waters, and strong as a mighty stream. Let justice be duly administered, let not the current of it be stopped by partiality and bribery; let it be pure as running waters, not muddied with corruption; let it run like a mighty stream.

III. What little stress God had laid upon the law of sacrifices, in comparison with the moral precepts (v. 25): "Did you offer unto me sacrifices in the wilderness forty years? No, you did not." For part of that time sacrifice was neglected; after the second year, the passover was not kept till they came into Canaan; and yet he never imputed the omission to them as their fault, but continued his kindness to them: it was their murmuring and unbelief for which God was displeased with them. But, though ritual sacrifices may thus be dispensed with, spiritual sacrifices will not; even justice and honesty will not excuse for the want of prayer and praise, a broken heart and the love of God.

IV. What little reason they had to expect that their sacrifices should be acceptable to God, when they and their fathers had been all along addicted to the worship of other gods. So some take v. 25, "Did you offer to me sacrifices, that is, to me only? No, and therefore not at all to me acceptably." "But you have borne the tabernacle of your Moloch (v. 26), little shrines that you made to carry. You have had the images of your Moloch—your king" (probably representing the sun, that sits king among the heavenly bodies), "and Chiun, or Remphan" (as Stephen calls it, Acts vii. 43, after the LXX), which, it is supposed, represented Saturn. The worship of the sun, moon, and stars, was the most ancient, and most plausible idolatry. They made to themselves the star of their God, the name of which they gave to their god.

V. What punishment God would inflict upon them for their persisting in idolatry (v. 27): I will cause you to go into captivity beyond Damascus. Their captivity by the Assyrians was far beyond that by the Syrians. Or the captivity of Israel under Shalmaneser was far beyond that of Damascus under Tiglath-pileser, and much more grievous, which was foretold, ch. i. 5.

CHAP. VI

I. A sinful people studying to put a slight upon God's threatenings and to make them appear trivial (ver. 2, 3), their power (ver. 13), their pleasures, ver. 4–6. II. A serious prophet studying to put a weight upon God's threatenings and to make them appear terrible (ver. 7), God's abandoning them and theirs to death (ver. 8–11), and bringing desolation upon them, ver. 12–14.

Verses 1–7

The first words of the chapter are the contents of these verses: Woe to those that are at ease!

I. A description of their pride, security, and sensuality, for which God would reckon with them.

1. They were vainly conceited of their own dignities, and thought those would secure them from the judgments threatened. (1) Those that dwelt in Zion thought that was honour and protection enough. Those that dwelt there doubted not but that God's sanctuary would be a sanctuary to them and would shelter them from his judgments. (2) Those that dwelt in the mountain of Samaria, trusted in it, because it was the metropolis of a potent kingdom, and the headquarters of its religion. (3) Both these two kingdoms valued themselves upon their relation to Israel, which they looked upon as making them the chief of the nations. The house of Israel came to them, that is, was divided into those kingdoms, of which Zion and Samaria were the mother cities. Those that were at ease were the princes and rulers. Great nations and great men are apt to overvalue themselves. But, for a check to their pride, the prophet bids them take notice of those cities that had been as illustrious in their time as ever Zion or Samaria was, and yet were destroyed, v. 2. "Go to Calneh (an ancient city built by Nimrod, Gen. x. 10), it is now in ruins; so is Hamath the great, one of the chief cities of Syria. Gath was likewise made desolate by Hazael, 2 Kings xii. 17. Now were they better than these kingdoms of Judah and Israel? Yes, and their border greater than your border, so they had more reason than you to be confident of their safety; yet you see what has become of them, and dare you be secure?"

2. They persisted in their wicked courses upon a presumption that they should never be called to an account for them (v. 3). You put it far away, and therefore you cause the seat of violence to draw near.

3. They indulged themselves in all manner of sensual pleasures and delights, v. 4–6. That which they are here charged with is not in itself sinful (these things might be soberly and moderately used), but they placed their happiness in the gratification of their carnal appetites. They were extravagant. They were lazy. They abound in superfluities (so the margin reads it), when many of their poor brethren wanted necessaries. They must have everything of the best and abundance of it: They ate the lambs out of the flock and the calves out of the midst of the stall. Some men never show their ingenuity but in their luxury; on that they bestow all their faculty of invention. Or it intimates their profaneness in their mirth; they mimicked the temple-music, and made a jest of that, because, it may be, it was old-fashioned, and they took a pride in bantering it. They drank to excess. They affected the strongest perfumes to make them more in love with their own bodies.

4. They had no concern at all for the interests of the church of God, and of the nation: They are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph; the church of God, including both the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (which are called Joseph, Ps. lxxx. 1), was in distress, invaded. As to their own kingdom, great breaches were made upon it, upon its peace and welfare; and they were so besotted that they were not aware of them. It is all one to them whether the nation sink or swim, so that they can but live in pleasure. Some think that, in calling the afflicted church Joseph, there is an allusion to the story of Pharaoh's butler, who remembered not Joseph, but forgot him, Gen. xl. 21, 23. Thus they drank wine in bowls, but were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph.

II. The doom passed upon them (v. 7): Therefore now shall they go captive with the first that go captive. Those who lived in luxury shall lose even their liberty. Those who stretched themselves shall be made to contract themselves, and to come into a less compass.

Verses 8–14

I. This burden is bound on by the Lord the God of hosts.

II. How heavily this burden lies! 1. God will abhor and abandon them, and that implies misery enough. Their temple, altar, and priesthood, were the excellencies of Jacob; but, when these were polluted by sin, God abhorred them, ch. v. 21. And, if God abhor them, He will deliver up the city with all that is therein, into the hands of the enemy, that will lay it waste, and make a prey of all its wealth. 2. There shall be a great and general mortality among them (v. 9). That which makes this judgment the more grievous is that their hearts seem to be hardened under it. 3. Their houses shall be destroyed, v. 11. God will smite the great house with breaches, and the little house with clefts.

III. How justly they are thus burdened. If we understand the matter aright, we shall say, The Lord is righteous. God had sent them his prophets, to break up their fallow-ground; but they found them as hard as the rock. Though they are the house of Israel, yet he will raise up against them a nation which they had many a time hoped in, even the Assyrians, and this nation shall afflict them, from the entering in of Hamath, in the north, to the river of the wilderness, the river of Egypt, Sihor or Nile, in the south.

CHAP. VII

I. God contending with Israel. 1. They are threatened with less judgments, but are reprieved at the prayer of Amos, ver. 1–6. 2. God's patience worn out by their obstinacy, and they are sentenced, ver. 7–9. II. Israel contending with God, by the opposition given to his prophet. 1. Amaziah informs against Amos (ver. 10, 11) and does what he can to rid the country of him, ver. 12, 13. 2. Amos justifies himself in what he did as a prophet (ver. 14, 15), the judgments of God against Amaziah his prosecutor (ver. 16, 17).

Verses 1–9

God bears long, but he will not bear always, with a provoking people.

I. Two instances of God's sparing mercy.

1. God is here coming against this sinful nation, first by one judgment and then by another. (1) He begins with the judgment of famine. The prophet saw this in vision. He saw God forming grasshoppers, or locusts, v. 1. God formed these grasshoppers (and the wisdom and power of God appears in the structure of an ant as of an elephant), as instruments of his wrath. These grasshoppers were sent in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth, after the king's mowings. The judgment was mitigated by the mercy that went before it. God could have sent these insects to eat up the grass at the beginning of the first growth, in the spring, when the grass was most needed; but God suffered that to grow, and suffered them to gather it in. The grasshoppers were commissioned to eat up only the latter growth (the edgrew we call it in the country), the after-grass, is of little value in comparison with the former. The remembrance of the mercies of the former growth should make us submissive to the will of God when we meet with disappointments in the latter growth Some understand this figuratively of a wasting destroying army brought upon them. (2) He proceeds to the judgment of fire (v. 4): The Lord God called to contend by fire. A fire was kindled among them, by which perhaps is meant a great drought (the heat of the sun scorched it, and burnt up the roots of the grass which the locusts had eaten the spires of), or a raging fever, which was as a fire in their bones, or lightning, fire from heaven, which consumed their houses, as Sodom and Gomorrah were consumed (ch. iv. 11), or it was the burning of their cities, either by accident or by the hand of the enemy. Thus were the towns wasted, as the country was by the grasshoppers. This fire devoured the great deep, as the fire that fell from heaven on Elijah's altar licked up the water that was in the trench.

2. The prophet, by prayer, seeks to turn away his wrath, v. 2. It was the business of prophets to pray for those to whom they prophesied, and so to show they did not desire the woeful day.

(1) The prophet's prayer: O Lord God! Forgive, I beseech thee, and take away the sin, v. 2. He sees sin at the bottom of the trouble, and that the pardon of sin must be at the bottom of the deliverance. Cease, I beseech thee, and take away the judgment; cause thy anger towards us to cease. Take away the cause and the effect will cease.

(2) The prophet's plea to enforce this prayer: By whom shall Jacob arise, for he is small? v. 2. And it is repeated (v. 5). It is Jacob that he is interceding for, the professing people of God, called by his name. Jacob is small, weakened and brought low by former judgments; if these come, he will be brought to nothing. The people are unable to help themselves or one another. Sin will soon diminish the numerous and weaken the courageous. By whom shall he arise? He has no friend to help him, none to raise him, unless the hand of God do it.

3. In answer to the prophet's prayer (v. 3): The Lord repented for this. He did not change his mind; he changed his way, took another course in mercy. He said, It shall not be. And again (v. 6), This also shall not be. This was not the first time that Israel's life was begged, and so saved. What a blessing praying people, praying prophets, are to a land. Amos moves for a reprieve, and obtains it, because God inclines to grant it. It is the glory of God that he multiplies to pardon, that he spares, and forgives, to more than seventy times seven times.

II. The rejection of those at last who had been often reprieved, and yet never reduced to their duty. This is represented to the prophet by a vision (v. 7, 8).

1. The vision is of a plumb-line, a line with a plummet at the end of it, such as masons and bricklayers use to run up a wall by, that they may work it straight and true. Israel was a wall which God had reared, as a bulwark to his sanctuary. This wall was made by a plumb-line, exact and firm. It had long stood fast as a wall of brass. But God now stands upon it with a plumb-line in his hand, to take measure of it. Thus God would bring the people of Israel to the trial, would show wherein they erred; and he would set a plumb-line in the midst of them, to mark how far their wall must be pulled down.

2. The prediction is of utter ruin, v. 9. (1) The body of the people shall be destroyed. They are here called the house of Isaac (v. 16), some think in allusion to the signification of Isaac's name; it is laughter; they shall become a jest among all their neighbours. Their castles they thought safe, and their temples sanctuaries. These shall be laid waste, to punish them for their idolatry and their carnal confidences. (2) The royal family shall sink first: Jeroboam the second, was now king of the ten tribes; his family was extirpated in his son Zecharias, 2 Kings xv. 10.

Amos is persecuted.

I. The malicious information brought to the king against the prophet Amos, v. 10, 11. The informer was Amaziah the priest of Bethel, the chief of the priests that ministered to the golden calf there, the president of Bethel (so some read it). He complained against Amos because he prophesied against his altars, which would soon be deserted if Amos' preaching could but gain credit. Priests have been bitter persecutors. Amaziah brings an information to Jeroboam against Amos. 1. The crime he is charged with is treason: "Amos has conspired against thee, to depose and murder thee; he aims at succeeding thee. The land is not able to bear his words." It is slyly insinuated that the country was exasperated against him. It is no new thing for the accusers of the brethren to misrepresent them as enemies to the king and kingdom, when really they are the best friends to both. 2. The words laid in the indictment for the support of this charge (v. 11): Amos says (and they have witnesses ready to prove it) Jeroboam shall die by the sword, and Israel shall be led away captive. He does not tell the king how Amos had interceded for Israel, and by his intercession had turned away first one judgment and then another. He does not tell him that he had often assured them that if they would repent the ruin should be prevented. It does not appear that Jeroboam took any notice of this information; perhaps he reverenced a prophet, and stood more in awe of the divine authority than Amaziah his priest did.

II. The method he used to persuade Amos to quit the country (v. 12, 13); he insinuated himself into his acquaintance, and endeavoured to persuade him to go and prophesy in the land of Judah, and not at Bethel. He suggests to him,

1. That Bethel was not a proper place for him to exercise his ministry in, for it was the king's chapel, or sanctuary, and it was the king's court, or the house of the kingdom, where the royal family resided and where were set the thrones of judgment. And why not? (1) Because Amos is too plain and blunt a preacher for the court and the king's chapel. (2) Because the worship that is in the king's chapel will be a continual vexation to Amos. (3) Because it was not fit that the king and his house should be affronted in their own court and chapel by reproofs and threatenings in the name of the Lord. (4) Because he could not expect any encouragement there, but, on the contrary, to be ridiculed and threatened. He could not think to persuade any from that idolatry which was supported by the authority and example of the king. To preach his doctrine there was but (as we say) to run his head against a post.

2. He persuades him that the land of Judah was the fittest place for him. Flee thee away thither with all speed, and there eat bread, and prophesy there. There thou wilt be safe; there thou wilt be welcome. (1) How willing wicked men are to get clear of their reprovers. (2) How apt worldly men are to measure others by themselves. Amaziah, as a priest, aimed at nothing but the profits of his place, and he thought Amos, as a prophet, had the same views.

III. The reply which Amos made to these suggestions of Amaziah's. He did not consult with flesh and blood, nor was it his care to enrich himself, but to make full proof of his ministry, not to sleep in a whole skin, but to keep a good conscience; and therefore he resolved to abide by his post, and, in answer to Amaziah,

1. He justified himself in his adherence to his work and his place (v. 14, 15). He had a divine commission: "I was no prophet, nor prophet's son, neither born nor bred to the office, as Samuel and Jeremiah, but I was a herdman, a keeper of cattle, and a gatherer of sycamore-fruit." He was a plain country-man, bred up and employed in country work and used to country fare. God made him a prophet, and a prophet to them, appointed him his work and his post. Therefore he ought not to be silenced, for, (1) He could produce a divine commission for what he did. Men will find it is at their peril if they oppose any that come in God's name. An affront done to an ambassador is an affront to the prince that sends him. (2) The mean character he wore before he received that commission strengthened his warrant. [1] He had no thoughts at all of ever being a prophet, and therefore his prophesying was due to a divine impulse. [2] He was not instructed in the art of prophesying, and therefore he must have his abilities for it immediately from God, an undeniable proof that he had his mission from him. The apostles, being originally unlearned and ignorant men, evidenced that they owed their knowledge to their having been with Jesus, Acts iv. 13. [3] He had an honest calling, by which he could comfortably maintain himself and his family, and therefore did not need to prophesy for bread, as Amaziah suggested (v. 12). If God, that sent him, had not strengthened him, he could not thus have set his face as a flint, Isa. l. 7. A herdman of Tekoa puts to shame a priest of Bethel, when he receives from God authority to act for him.

2. He condemns Amaziah for the opposition he gave him in the name of the Lord and by authority from him, v. 16, 17.

(1) For the opposition he gave to Amos God will bring ruin upon himself and his family. He shall have no comfort in his relations: His wife shall be a harlot. His sons and his daughters shall fall by the sword of war. He shall be stripped of all his estate. He shall himself perish in a strange country, in a polluted land, a heathen country.

(2) Amos was accused for saying, Israel shall be led away captive (v. 11), but he stands to it, and repeats it. The burden of the word of the Lord cannot be shaken off. Stopping the mouths of God's ministers will not stop the progress of God's word, for it shall not return void.

CHAP. VIII

Sinful times are here attended with sorrowful times. I. By the vision of "a basket of summer-fruit" is signified the hastening on of the ruin threatened (ver. 1–3). II. Oppressors are here called to account for their abusing the poor, ver. 4–10. III. A famine of the word of God is here made the punishment of a people that go a-whoring after other gods (ver. 11–14).

Verses 1–3

I. The approach of the threatened ruin is represented by a basket of summer-fruit which Amos saw in vision (v. 1 and 2). He saw a basket of summer-fruit gathered and ready to be eaten, which signified, 1. That they were ripe for destruction, they lay ready to be eaten up. 2. That the year of God's patience was drawing toward a conclusion; it was autumn with them. 3. Those we call summer-fruits will not keep till winter, must be used immediately, an emblem of this people, that had nothing consistent in them.

II. The intent and meaning of this vision is no more than this: It signifies that the end has come upon my people Israel. What was said ch. vii. 8 is here repeated as God's determined resolution, I will not again pass by them any more.

III. The consequence of this shall be a universal desolation (v. 3). Here in a sinful world, in a sinful nation, 1. Sorrow reigns, reigns to such a degree that the songs of the temple shall be howlings. When God's judgments are abroad, they will turn the joy into heaviness, the temple-songs, which used to sound so pleasantly, into loud howlings. 2. Death reigns. There shall be many dead bodies in every place (Ps. cx. 6), slain by sword or pestilence. They shall not so much as have the bell tolled, but they shall cast them forth with silence.

Verses 4–10

I. They had the character of the unjust judge (Luke xviii. 2) that neither feared God nor regarded man.

They do indeed keep up a show of godliness; they observe the sabbath and the new moon; but they were soon weary of them. They said, When will the sabbath be gone, that we may sell corn? They were weary of the restraints of the sabbaths and the new-moons, and wished them over. They were fond of market-days; they longed to be selling corn and setting forth wheat. Those are strangers to God, and enemies to themselves, that love market days better than sabbath days, that would rather be selling corn than worshipping God. They neither do justly nor love mercy. When they sell their corn they impose upon the buyer. They measure him the corn by their own measure, but they make the ephah small. When they receive his money they weigh it in their own scales, by their own weights. They make the shekel great, so that the money, being found too light, must have more added to it. They have in their hearts neither the fear nor the love of that God who has so plainly said that false weights and balances are an abomination to him. Another instance of their fraudulent dealing is that they sell the refuse of the wheat, and, taking advantage of their neighbours' ignorance or necessity, make them take it at the same price at which they sell the finest of the wheat. They are barbarous and unmerciful to the poor: They swallow up the needy, and make the poor of the land to fail. But he who thus reproaches the poor despises his Maker, in whose hands rich and poor meet together. They swallowed up the poor by making them hard bargains, and bring them so low that they may have their labour for next to nothing. Thus they buy the poor for silver; they bring them and their children into bondage. You might buy a poor man to be your slave for a pair of shoes. Property was first invaded and then liberty; it is the method of oppressors first to make men beggars and then to make them their vassals.

II. The punishment that shall be inflicted on them for this sin. God will remember their sin against them. He swears, Surely I will never forget any of their works. I will never forget them is as much as to say, I will never forgive them. He will bring ruin and confusion upon them. There shall be universal terror and consternation (v. 8). When God comes forth against them the waters of trouble and calamity shall rise up wholly as a flood, that swells, when it is dammed up, and soon overflows its banks. The whole land shall be cast out, and drowned, and laid under water, as the land of Egypt is every year by the overflowing of its river Nile. It shall come upon them when they little think of it (v. 9): "I will cause the sun to go down at noon, when it is in its full strength and lustre. The earth shall be darkened in the clear day, when everything looks pleasant and hopeful." It shall change their note, and mar all their mirth (v. 10): I will turn your feasts into mourning, as (v. 3) the songs of the temple into howlings. The state of impenitent sinners grows worse and worse, and the last of all will be the worst of all.

I. A spiritual famine coming upon the whole land, a famine of the word of God, the failing of oracles and the scarcity of good preaching. The days come when another kind of darkness shall come upon that land of light. When Amos prophesied, and for a considerable time after, they had great plenty of prophets, abundant opportunities of hearing the word of God. God threatens that hereafter he will deprive them of this privilege. They should have plenty of bread and water, and yet their teachers should be removed. Their nation had been great and high, for to them were committed the oracles of God; but, when these were taken from them, their beauty was stained and their honour laid in the dust. This was a token of God's highest displeasure against them. We should say at any time that a famine of the word of God is the sorest famine, the heaviest judgment. They shall wander from sea to sea, from the sea of Tiberias to the Great Sea, to see if God will send them prophets (v. 12). And in the day of this famine the fair virgins and the young men shall faint for thirst (v. 13). The Jewish churches, and the masters of their synagogues, some take to be meant by the virgins and the young men. Those that trust in their own merit and think they have no need of Christ, others take to be meant by the fair virgins and the choice young men; they shall faint for thirst, when those that hunger and thirst after the righteousness of Christ shall be filled.

II. The particular destruction of those that were ringleaders in idolatry, v. 14. They swear by the sin of Samaria, that is, by the god of Samaria, the idol that was worshipped at Bethel, not far off from Samaria. They say, Thy God, O Dan! liveth; that was the other golden calf, a dumb dead idol, and yet caressed as if it had been the living God. They say, The manner, or way, of Beer-sheba liveth; they swore by the religion of Beer-sheba. Those who thus give that honour to idols which is due to God alone shall fall, and the gods cannot stand their friends, so they shall never rise again.

CHAP. IX

I. Judgment threatened, which the sinners shall not escape (ver. 1–4), which an almighty power shall inflict (ver. 5, 6), which the people of Israel have deserved, (ver. 7, 8); and yet it shall not be the utter ruin of their nation (ver. 8), for a remnant of good people shall escape, ver. 9. But the wicked shall perish, ver. 10. II. Mercy promised, to be bestowed in the latter days (ver. 11–15), as appears by the application of it to the days of the Messiah, Acts xv. 16.

Verses 1–10

I. Sentence is passed. The prophet saw in vision the Lord standing upon the altar (v. 1), the altar of burnt-offerings. He is removed from the mercy-seat between the cherubim. He stands on the altar, to prohibit sacrifice. Now the order given is, Smite the lintel of the door of the temple with such a blow that the posts may shake, and cut them, wound them in the head, all of them; break down the door of God's house, in token that he is going out from it, and forsaking it. "Smite the king, who is as the lintel of the door, that the princes, who are as the posts, may shake; cut them in the head, cleave them down, all of them, and I will slay the last of them."

II. God's judgments will overtake the swiftest that think to out-run them, v. 2. "Though they dig into hell, into the centre of the earth, yet thence shall my hand take them." The grave is a hiding-place to the righteous from the malice of the world (Job. iii. 17), but it shall be no hiding-place to the wicked from the justice of God. The top of Carmel shall not protect them: "Though they hide themselves there, where they imagine nobody will look for them, I will search, and take them out thence." The bottom of the sea shall not serve to conceal them. Thence will I command the serpent, and he shall bite them, the crooked serpent, even the dragon that is in the sea, Isa. xxvii. 1. Remote countries will not befriend them, nor less judgments excuse them from greater (v. 4). Threatenings are more or less formidable according to the power of him that threatens. We laugh at impotent wrath; but the wrath of God is not so; it is omnipotent wrath. Those who have the Lord of hosts against them, have the whole creation at war with them. He is the Creator and governor of the upper world: It is he that builds his stories in the heavens, the celestial orbs, or spheres, one over another as so many stories in a high and stately palace. He has the command of this lower world too, both earth and sea. Do they think to make a land-fight of it? He has founded his troop in the earth, his troop of guards, for the protection of his subjects and the punishment of his enemies. All the creatures on earth make one bundle (as the margin reads it), one bundle of arrows, out of which he takes what he pleases to discharge against the persecutors, Ps. vii. 13. Do they think to make a sea-fight of it? He has the waters of the sea at command; even its waves, the most tumultuous rebellious waters, do obey him. How justly God passes this sentence upon the people of Israel. He does not destroy them by an act of sovereignty, but by an act of righteousness. Are you not as children of the Ethiopians unto me, O children of Israel? A sad change! Those that were trained up in the knowledge and fear of God, and promised fair, throw off their profession and become as bad as the worst. This is an intimation of the rejection of the unbelieving Jews in the days of the Messiah; because they embraced not the doctrine of Christ, the kingdom of God was taken from them, they were unchurched, and cast out of covenant. They thought he would not cast them off, and put them upon a level with other nations, because he had done that for them which he had not done for other nations. "No," says he, "the favours shown to you are not so distinguishing as you think they are: Have not I brought up Israel out of the land of Egypt? I have also brought the Philistines from Caphtor, or Cappadocia." In like manner the Syrians were brought up from Kir when they had been carried away thither, 2 Kings xvi. 9. If God's Israel lose the peculiarity of their holiness, they lose the peculiarity of their privileges. Though the wicked Israelites shall be as the wicked Ethiopians, and their being called Israelites shall stand them in no stead, yet the pious Israelites shall not be as the wicked ones. I will distinguish, as becomes a righteous judge. The house of Israel shall be sifted as corn is sifted; but still in the hands of God, as the sieve in the hands of him that sifts (v. 9): I will sift the house of Israel among all nations. The righteous ones among them, that are as the solid wheat, shall none of them perish; not the least grain shall fall on the earth, so as to be lost and forgotten—not the least stone (so the word is), for the good corn is weighty as a stone in comparison with that which we call light corn.

To him to whom all the prophets bear witness this prophet here bears his testimony, and speaks of that day in which God will do great things for his church, by the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah. The promise here may refer to the planting of the Christian church, Acts xv. 15–17. It is promised,

I. That in the Messiah the kingdom of David shall be restored (v. 11). The church militant, in its present state, dwelling as in shepherds' tents to feed, as in soldiers' tents to fight, is the tabernacle of David. The royal family was so impoverished, its power abridged, for many of that race degenerated, and in the captivity it lost the imperial dignity. So it was with the church of the Jews; in the latter days its glory departed; it was like a tabernacle brought to ruin. By Jesus Christ these tabernacles were raised and rebuilt. In him God's covenant with David had its accomplishment; and the glory of that house revived again. The spiritual glory of the family of Christ far exceeded the temporal glory of the family of David. In him also God's covenant with Israel had its accomplishment, and in the gospel-church the tabernacle of God was set up among men again. This is quoted in the first council at Jerusalem as referring to the calling in of the Gentiles and God's taking out of them a people for his name.

II. That that kingdom shall be enlarged (v. 12), that the house of David may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen, that is, that Christ may have them given him for his inheritance, Ps. ii. 8. Christ died to gather together in one the children of God that were scattered abroad, here said to be those that were called by his name.

III. That in the kingdom of the Messiah there shall be great plenty (v. 13): The ploughman shall overtake

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROPHECY OF OBADIAH

This is the shortest of all the books of the Old Testament, and yet is not to be passed by, for this penny has Caesar's image and superscription upon it; it is stamped with a divine authority. This book is entitled, The Vision of Obadiah. Who this Obadiah was does not appear. Some of the ancients imagined him to be the same with that Obadiah that was steward to Ahab's household (1 Kings xviii. 3); and, if so, he that hid and fed the prophets had indeed a prophet's reward, when he was himself made a prophet. But that is a conjecture which has no ground. This Obadiah, it is probable, was of a later date, some think contemporary with Hosea, Joel, and Amos; others think he lived about the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, when the children of Edom so barbarously triumphed in that destruction. However, what he wrote was what he saw; it is his vision. It is a foolish fancy of some of the Jews that because he prophesies only concerning Edom he was himself an Edomite by birth, but a proselyte to the Jewish religion. Other prophets prophesied against Edom, and some of them seem to have borrowed from him in their predictions against Edom, as Jer. xlix. 7, &c.; Ezek. xxv. 12, &c.

This book is wholly concerning Edom, a nation adjoining to Israel, and yet an enemy to the seed of Jacob, inheriting the enmity of their father Esau to Jacob. Now here we have, after the preface, ver. 1, I. Threatenings against Edom, 1. That their pride should be humbled, ver. 2–4. 2. That their wealth should be plundered, ver. 5–7. 3. That their wisdom should be infatuated, ver. 8, 9. 4. That their spiteful behaviour towards God's Israel should be avenged, ver. 10–16. II. Gracious promises to Israel; that they shall be restored and reformed, and shall be victorious over the Edomites (ver. 17–20), and that the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up by the bringing in of the great salvation, ver. 21.

Edom is the nation against which this prophecy is levelled, and which, some think, is put for all the enemies of Israel. Though Edom was mortified in the times of the Maccabees, as it had been before by Jehoshaphat, yet its destruction seems to have been typical, as their father Esau's rejection, and to have had further reference to the destruction of the enemies of the gospel-church. Some have well observed that it could not but be a great trial to the people of Israel, when they saw themselves, the children of beloved Jacob, in trouble, and the Edomites, the seed of hated Esau, triumphing over them in their troubles; and therefore God gives them a prospect of the destruction of Edom, and of a happy issue of their own correction.

I. A declaration of war against Edom (v. 1): "We have heard a rumour, or rather an order, from the Lord, the God of hosts; he has given the word of command that all who do mischief to his people shall certainly bring mischief upon themselves. We have heard a report that God is preparing his throne for judgment; and an ambassador is sent among the heathen," a herald rather, to alarm the nations. Arise ye, stir up yourselves and one another, and let us rise up against Edom in battle. The confederate forces under Nebuchadnezzar prepare to make a descent upon that country: Gather yourselves together, and come against her.

II. A prediction of the success of that war. Edom shall certainly be subdued. "Behold, I have made thee small among the heathen, so that none of thy neighbours will court an alliance with thee; thou art greatly despised among them, as an unfaithful nation." And thus (v. 3) the pride of thy heart has deceived thee. The fortifications of their country shall deceive them. They dwelt in the clefts of the rock, as an eagle in her nest, and their habitation was high, fortified against their enemies, so high as to be out of the reach of danger. Edom says in the pride of his heart: Who shall bring me down to the ground? He speaks with a confidence of his own strength, and a contempt of God's judgments. Carnal security is a sin that most easily besets men in the day of their pomp, power, and prosperity. If men will dare to challenge Omnipotence, their challenge shall be taken up: Who shall bring me down? says Edom. "I will," says God. "Though thou exalt thyself as the eagle that soars high and builds high, nay, though thou set thy nest among the stars, it is but in thy own imagination, and thence will I bring thee down." This we had Jer. xlix. 15, 16. Their money shall rather expose them than protect them; it shall be made a prey to the enemy, and they for the sake of it, v. 5, 6. How art thou fallen, and how great is thy fall! How art thou stupefied! so the Chaldee words it. The prophet shows that it should be an utter ruin, not a usual calamity; for it is indeed usual for those that have wealth to have it stolen, and to lose a little out of their great deal. Thieves come to them and steal no more than they think they can carry away, and out of a great stock it is scarcely missed. It shall not be so with Edom; his wealth shall all be taken away, and nothing shall escape the hands of the destroying army, v. 6. How are his hidden things, his hidden treasures, plundered, rifled, and sought up! Their alliances with neighbouring states and potentates shall fail them (v. 7): "The men of thy confederacy, all of them, the Ammonites and Moabites, and other allies that were at peace with thee, did eat thy bread, were entertained by thee, lived upon thee; they brought thee even to the border of thy land, were respectful to thy ambassadors, and brought them on their way home; but then they have deceived thee; they flew back and retreated when thou wast in extremity. They have prevailed against thee; they were too hard for thee in the treaty imposed upon thee, brought thee into danger, and there left thee an easy prey to thy enemy. They have laid a wound under thee; that is, they have laid that under thee for a support, which will prove a wound to thee; not as thorns only, but as swords." If God lay under us the arms of his power and love, these will be firm under us; the God of our covenant will never deceive us. But if we trust to the men of our confederacy, and what they will lay under us, it may prove to us a wound and dishonour. Just censure is passed upon Edom for trusting to those who played tricks with him: "There is no understanding in him, or else he would never have put it into their power to betray him by putting such a confidence in them. The politics of their counsellors shall fail them, v. 8. Edom had been famous for great statesmen, but now the counsellors have become fools. Shall I not in that day destroy the wise men out of Edom? This was just punishment of their folly in trusting to an arm of flesh; There is no understanding in them, v. 7. It was the forerunner of their destruction. A nation is certainly marked for ruin when God hides the things that belong to its peace from the eyes of those that are entrusted with its counsels. Do they depend upon the strength and courage of their soldiers? They are able-bodied men of spirit and courage, but now (v. 9), Thy mighty men, O Teman! shall be dismayed; their courage shall fail them, to the end that every one of the mount of Esau may be cut off by slaughter, and none escape.

Many things were amiss in Edom; they were a sinful people, and a people laden with iniquity. But that one single crime which is laid to their charge, as bringing this ruin upon them, is the injury they had done to the people of God (v. 10): "It is for thy violence against thy brother Jacob, that ancient grudge which thou hast borne to the people of Israel, that all this shame shall cover thee and thou shalt be cut off for ever." It is violence against thy brother, to whom thou shouldst be a goël—a redeemer, whom it is thy duty to right if others wronged him. Thou slanderest and abusest thy own mother's son. Much more if it is done against one of God's people; "it is thy brother Jacob that is in covenant with God, and dear to him. Thou hatest him whom God has loved."

I. The violence which Edom did against his brother Jacob. That which is laid to their charge is their barbarous conduct towards Judah and Jerusalem when they were in distress, and ready to be destroyed, probably by the Chaldeans. See this is charged upon the Edomites (Ps. cxxxvii. 7), that in the day of Jerusalem they said, Rase it, rase it, and Ezek. xxv. 12. Thou shouldst not have looked, thou shouldst not have entered; but thou didst do so. (v. 12–14). Let us see,

1. The case of Judah and Jerusalem when the Edomites insulted over them. With the Edomites it was a day of prosperity when with the Israelites it was a day of calamity, for judgment commonly begins at the house of God. Children are corrected when strangers are let alone. It was the day of their destruction (v. 12), when foreigners entered into the gates of Jerusalem, when the great officers of the king of Babylon's army sat in the gates, as judges of the land. It was a day when the strangers carried away captive his forces (v. 11). The Edomites, their neighbours and brethren, should have pitied them and helped them.

2. The Edomites are here condemned. They looked with pleasure upon the affliction of God's people (v. 12, 13), unconcerned. Those have a great deal to answer for that are idle spectators of the troubles and afflictions of their neighbours, when they are capable of being their active helpers. They rejoiced over the children of Judah in the day of their destruction. They went further, for they entered into the gate of God's people and laid hands on their substance. Though they did not help to conquer them, they helped to plunder them, v. 13. They not only robbed their brethren, but murdered them, v. 14. When the victorious sword of the Chaldeans was making bloody work among the Jews many made their escape, but the Edomites basely intercepted them, stood in the cross-way; some they barbarously cut off; others hey delivered up to the pursuers. In all this they oined with the open enemies and persecutors of Israel: Even thou wast as one of them.

II. The shame that shall cover them for this violence. When they come to be in the same calamitous condition that Israel is now in, they will be ashamed (v. 15): The day of the Lord is near upon all the heathen, when God will recompense tribulation to the troublers of his church. As you have drunk upon my holy mountain (v. 16), that is, as God's professing people have drunk deeply of the cup of affliction, so shall all the heathen drink of the same bitter cup. They may expect their case to be worse in the day of distress than that of Israel was in their day. The afflictions of God's people were but for a moment, but their enemies shall drink continually the wine of God's wrath, Rev. xiv. 10. The dregs of the cup are reserved for the wicked of the earth (Ps.lxxv. 8); they shall drink and swallow down, or sup up (as the margin reads it), shall drink it to the bottom.

Precious promises of salvation with which this prophecy concludes, as those of Joel and Amos did, which, however they might be in part fulfilled in the return of the Jews out of Babylon, are yet, doubtless, to have their full accomplishment in that great salvation wrought out by Jesus Christ.

I. There shall be salvation upon Mount Zion: Upon Mount Zion shall be deliverance, v. 17. A remnant of Israel, upon the holy mountain, shall be saved, v. 16.

II. Where there is salvation, there shall be sanctification: And there shall be holiness, to prepare and qualify the children of Zion for this deliverance; for wherever God designs glory he gives grace.

III. This salvation and sanctification shall spread, and prevail: The house of Jacob, even this Mount Zion, with the deliverance and the holiness there wrought, shall possess their possessions; that is, the gospel-church shall be set up among the heathen, and shall replenish the earth. When they possess their hearts they shall possess their possessions, for those who have given up themselves to the Lord give up all they have to him.

1. How this possession shall be gained (v. 18): The house of Jacob shall be a fire, and the house of Joseph a flame, for their God is a consuming fire; and the house of Esau shall be for stubble. The gospel, preached in the house of Jacob and Joseph, shall be as a fire and a flame to melt hard hearts, to burn up the dross, that they may be purified with the spirit of judgment and the spirit of burning. The word of God in the mouth of his ministers is said to be like fire, and the people as wood to be devoured by it, Jer. v. 14. Those that are not refined as gold by the fire of the gospel shall be consumed as dross by it.

2. How far this possession shall extend, v. 19, 20. The captivity of this host of Israel, that are still called the children of the captivity, these shall recover their own land, and gain ground upon their neighbours adjoining them. Some shall become proselytes and shall incorporate with the Jews, who, by possessing them in a holy communion, possess their land. The kingdom of Israel shall join with that of Judah both in civil and sacred interests, and, as friends and brethren, shall mutually possess and enjoy one another; and both together shall possess the Canaanites, even to Zarephath, which belongeth to Zidon; and Jerusalem shall possess the cities of the south, even to Sepharad. Thus did the Jews enlarge their borders on all sides. But the promise here, no doubt, has a spiritual signification, and had its accomplishment in the setting up of the Christian church, the gospel-Israel, in the world, and shall have its accomplishment more and more in the enlargement of it, till the mystical body is completed.

IV. The kingdom of the Redeemer shall be erected to the comfort of his loyal subjects and the shame of his enemies (v. 21): The kingdom shall be the Lord's, the Lord Christ's. The mountain of Zion shall be saved; on it saviours shall come, the preachers of the gospel, called saviours, because their business is to save themselves and those that hear them; and in this they are workers together with Christ. The mountain of Esau shall be judged; and the same that come as saviours on Mount Zion shall judge the mountain of Esau; for the word of the gospel in their mouth, that convinces and condemns them. And in the course of God's providence his scripture is fulfilled; when God raises up friends to the church in her distress, then saviours come on Mount Zion, to save it; and when the enemies of the church are brought down, then is the mount of Esau judged; and this shall be done in every age in such a way as God thinks best.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE BOOK OF JONAH

This book of Jonah, though it be placed in the midst of the prophetical books, is rather a history than a prophecy; one line of prediction there is in it, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown; the rest of the book is a narrative of the preface to and the consequences of that prediction. Probably Jonah was himself the penman of this book, and he, as other inspired penmen, records his own faults, which is an evidence that in these writings they designed God's glory and not their own. We read of this same Jonah 2 Kings xiv. 25, where we find that he was of Gath-hepher in Galilee, a city that belonged to the tribe of Zebulun, in a remote corner of the land of Israel. He was a messenger of mercy to Israel in the reign of Jeroboam the second; for the restoring of the coast of Israel, is said to be according to the word of the Lord which he spoke by the hand of his servant Jonah the prophet. The story contains remarkable instances of human infirmity in Jonah, and of God's mercy in pardoning repenting sinners, witness Nineveh, and in bearing with repining saints, witness Jonah.

CHAP. I

I. A command given to Jonah to preach at Nineveh, ver. 1, 2. II. Jonah's disobedience to that command, ver. 3. III. The pursuit and arrest of him for that disobedience by a storm, ver. 4–6. IV. The discovery of his disobedience, to be the cause of the storm, ver. 7–10. V. The casting of him into the sea, for the stilling of the storm, ver. 11–16. VI. The miraculous preservation of his life there in the belly of a fish (ver. 17), which was his reservation for further services.

Verses 1–3

1. The honour God put upon Jonah, in giving him a commission to go and prophesy against Nineveh. Jonah signifies a dove, a proper name for all God's prophets, all his people, who ought to be harmless as doves, and to mourn as doves for the sins and calamities of the land. His father's name was Amittai—My truth; for God's prophets should be sons of truth. To him the word of the Lord came—to him it was (so the word signifies). The orders now given were, Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city, v. 2. Nineveh was the metropolis of the Assyrian monarchy (Gen. x. 11), a great city, great in the number of the inhabitants, great in power and dominion; it was the city that for some time ruled over the kings of the earth. But great cities, as well as great men, are under God's government. Nineveh was a heathen city, without the knowledge and worship of the true God. This great city was a wicked city: Their wickedness has come up before me; and they sinned with a high hand. Jonah must cry against it; he must witness against their great wickedness, and must warn them of the destruction that was coming upon them for it. Cry aloud, spare not. He must not whisper his message, but publish it in the streets of Nineveh; he that has ears to hear let him hear what God has to say by his prophet against that wicked city. He must go to Nineveh, and cry there upon the spot against the wickedness of it. Other prophets were ordered to send messages to the neighbouring nations, but Jonah must go and carry the message himself. The dishonour Jonah did to God in refusing to go (v. 3): But Jonah, instead of rising to go to Nineveh, rose up to flee to Tarshish, to the sea, not bound for any port, but desirous to get away from the presence of the Lord. He consulted with flesh and blood, and declined the embassy because he was jealous for the prerogatives of his country, and not willing that any other nation should share in the honour of divine revelation. He owns himself (ch. iv. 2) that the reason of his aversion was because he foresaw that the Ninevites would repent, and God would forgive them and take them into favour, which would be a slur upon the people of Israel, who had been so long a peculiar people to God. He went to Joppa, a famous seaport in the land of Israel, in quest of a ship bound for Tarshish, and there he found one. Providence seemed to give him an opportunity to escape. The ready way is not always the right way. He found the ship and set sail for Tarshish. So he paid the fare thereof. He went with them, the mariners, the passengers, the merchants, whoever they were that were going to Tarshish. Jonah, forgetting his dignity as well as duty, herded with them.

Verses 4–10

I. God sends a pursuer after him, a mighty tempest in the sea, v. 4. The effect of this wind was a mighty tempest; for when the winds rise the waves rise. The tempest prevailed to such a degree that the ship was likely to be broken. This wind was sent after Jonah, to fetch him back again to God and to his duty; and it is a great mercy to be reclaimed and called home when we go astray, though it be by a tempest.

II. The ship's crew were alarmed by this mighty tempest, but Jonah only was unconcerned, v. 5. The mariners were afraid; though, their business leading them to dangers of this kind, they used to make light of them; yet the oldest and stoutest of them began to tremble, being apprehensive that there was something more than ordinary in this tempest, so suddenly did it rise, so strongly did it rage. They cried every man unto his god. Many will not be brought to prayer till they are frightened to it; he that would learn to pray, let him go to sea. Having called upon their gods to help them, they did what they could to help themselves. They cast forth the wares that were in the ship into the sea, to lighten it of them, as Paul's mariners in a like case, Acts xxvii. 18, 19, 38. But where is Jonah all this while? One would have expected him busier than any, but we find him gone down into the hold, between the sides of the ship, and there he lies, and is fast asleep; neither the noise without, nor the sense of guilt within, awoke him.

III. The master of the ship called Jonah up to his prayers, v. 6. The ship-master came to him, and bade him for shame get up, both to pray for life and to prepare for death. What meanest thou, O sleeper? We commend the ship-master. We pity Jonah, who needed this reproof; as a prophet of the Lord, if he had been in his place, he might have been reproving the king of Nineveh, but, being out of the way of his duty, he is open to the reproofs of a sorry ship-master. Yet we must admire God's goodness in sending him this seasonable reproof, for it was the first step towards his recovery, as the crowing of the cock was to Peter. "Arise, call upon thy God; we are here crying every man to his god, why dost not thou get up and cry to thine?" If so be that God will think upon us, that we perish not. It should seem, the many gods they called upon were considered by them only as mediators between them and the supreme God, for the ship-master speaks of one God still, from whom he expected relief.

IV. Jonah is found out to be the cause of the storm. The mariners observed so much peculiar and uncommon in the storm that they concluded it was a messenger of divine justice sent to arrest someone of those that were in that ship, as having been guilty of some enormous crime (Acts xxviii. 4), and it is for his sake they suffer. Let us cast lots, that we may know for whose cause this evil is upon us. They suspected one another, and would find out the man. These mariners desired to know the person that was the dead weight in their ship, that that one man might die for the people and that the whole ship might not be lost. In order to this they cast lots, by which they appealed to the judgment of God. The lot fell upon Jonah, who could have saved them this trouble if he would but have told them what his own conscience told him, Thou art the man. We may suppose there were those in the ship who were greater sinners than Jonah, and yet he is the man that the tempest pursues. The storm is sent after Jonah, because God has work for him to do, and it is sent to fetch him back to it. Jonah is brought under examination before the master and mariners. He was a stranger; none of them had anything to lay to his charge, and therefore they must extort a confession from him and judge him out of his own mouth. They did not fly outrageously upon him, but calmly enquired into his case. There is a compassion due to offenders when they are discovered and convicted. "Tell us for whose cause this evil is upon us; is it indeed for thy cause, and, if so, for what cause? What is the offence for which thou art thus prosecuted?" They enquire concerning his calling: What is thy occupation? Whence comest thou? In answer Jonah tells them he is a Hebrew (v. 9), and therefore is the more ashamed to own that he is a criminal; for the sins of Hebrews, that make such a profession of religion, are exceedingly sinful. He gives an account of his religion, for that was his calling: "I fear the Lord Jehovah; that is the God I worship, even the God of heaven, the sovereign Lord of all, that has made the sea and the dry land and has the command of both." He owns that he fled from the presence of the Lord, that he was here running away from his duty, and the storm was sent to fetch him back. The men were exceedingly afraid, and justly, for they perceived that God was angry with one that feared and worshipped him, for running from his work in a particular instance. "If a prophet of the Lord be thus severely punished for one offence, what will become of us that have been guilty of so many, and great, and heinous offences?" They said to him, "Why hast thou done this? Why hast thou involved us in the prosecution?"

Verses 11–17

Something more was to be done, for still the sea wrought and was tempestuous (v. 11), and (v. 13), it grew more and more tempestuous (so the margin reads it).

I. They enquired of Jonah himself what he thought they must do with him (v. 11). He appears to be a delinquent, but he appears also to be a penitent. They would not cast him into the sea if he could think of any other expedient by which to save the ship.

II. Jonah reads his own doom (v. 12): Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea. This is the language of true penitents, who earnestly desire that none but themselves may fare the worse, for their sins and follies. How ready Jonah is to take all the guilt upon himself, and to look upon all the trouble as theirs. "If it is I that have raised the storm, it is not casting the wares into the sea that will lay it again; no, you must cast me thither." When conscience is awakened, and a storm raised, nothing will turn it into a calm but parting with the sin that occasioned the disturbance.

III. The poor mariners did what they could to save throwing Jonah into the sea, but all in vain (v. 13): They rowed hard to bring the ship to the land, that, if they must part with Jonah, they might set him safely on shore; but they could not.

IV. When they cast Jonah into the sea they first prayed to God that his blood might not lie upon them, v. 14. They prayed to the God of Israel, being now convinced, by the providences of God concerning Jonah and the information he had given them, that he is God alone. "Lord," say they, "let us not perish for this man's life."

V. Having deprecated the guilt (v. 15): They took up Jonah, and cast him forth into the sea. When sin is the Jonah that raises the storm, it must thus be cast forth into the sea; we must drown that which otherwise will drown us.

VI. The throwing of Jonah into the sea immediately put an end to the storm. If we turn from our sins, God will soon turn from his anger.

VII. The mariners were hereby more confirmed in their belief that Jonah's God was the only true God (v. 16). As evidence they offered sacrifice to him when they came ashore again in the land of Israel, and for the present made vows that they would do so, in thankfulness for their deliverance.

VIII. Jonah's life is saved by a miracle. In the midst of judgment God remembers mercy. Though he flees from the presence of the Lord, and seems to fall into his avenging hands, yet God has more work for him to do, and therefore has prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah (v. 17), a whale our Saviour calls it (Matt. xii. 40), one of the largest sorts of whales, that have wider throats than others, in the belly of which has sometimes been found the dead body of a man in armour. It was of the Lord's mercies that Jonah was not now consumed. Jonah by this preservation was designed to be made, 1. A monument of divine mercy. 2. A successful preacher to Nineveh. 3. An illustrious type of Christ, who was buried and rose again according to the scriptures (1 Cor. xv. 4), for, as Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so was the Son of man three days and three nights in the heart of the earth, Matt. xii. 40. Was Jonah's grave a strange one, a new one? So was Christ's, one in which never man before was laid. Was Jonah there the best part of three days and three nights? So was Christ; but both in order to their rising again for the bringing of the doctrine of repentance to the Gentile world.

CHAP. II

God brings his people through fire, and through water (Ps. lxvi. 12); and by his power, behold, Jonah the prophet is yet alive. In this chapter God hears from him, for we find him praying: in the next Nineveh hears from him, for we find him preaching. In his prayer we have, I. The great distress and danger he was in, ver. 2, 3, 5, 6. II. The despair, ver 4. III. The encouragement he took to himself, ver. 4, 7. IV. The assurance he had of God's favour to him, ver. 6, 7. V. The warning and instruction he gives to others, ver. 8. VI. The praise and glory of all given to God, ver. 9. In the last verse we have Jonah's deliverance safe and sound upon dry land again.

Verses 1–9

God and his servant Jonah had parted in anger, and the quarrel began on Jonah's side; he fled from his country that he might outrun his work. The reconciliation begins on God's side. In the close of the foregoing chapter we found God returning to Jonah in a way of mercy, delivering him from going down to the pit, having found a ransom; in this chapter we find Jonah returning to God in a way of duty.

I. When he prayed (v. 1): Then Jonah prayed; when he was in trouble, under the sense of sin, then he prayed. Then when he was in a hopeful way of deliverance, being preserved alive by miracle, then he prayed.

II. Where he prayed—in the fish's belly. No place is amiss for prayer. Wherever God casts us we may find a way open heavenward. He that has Christ dwelling in his heart by faith, wherever he goes carries his altar along with him, that sanctifies the gift, and is himself a living temple. Men may shut us out from communion with one another, but not from communion with God. Jonah was now in the bottom of the sea, yet out of the depths he cries to God.

III. To whom he prayed—to the Lord his God. He had been fleeing from God, but now he sees the folly of it, and returns to him.

IV. What his prayer was. He reflects upon the workings of his heart towards God when he was in distress, and the conflict that was then in his breast between faith and sense, between hope and fear. He said, I cried, by reason of my affliction, unto the Lord. "Out of the belly of hell and the grave cried I." And it was not in vain: God heard him, heard the voice of his affliction. How low he was thrown (v. 3): Thou hadst cast me into the deep. The mariners cast him there; but he saw the hand of God casting him there. How terribly he was beset: The floods compassed me about. The channels and springs of the waters of the sea surrounded him on every side; it was high-water with him. All thy billows and thy waves passed over me. These words are plainly quoted by Jonah from Ps. xlii. 7, where in the original David's complaint is the same verbatim. If ever any man's case was singular, surely Jonah's was, and yet, to his great satisfaction, he finds even the man after God's own heart making the same complaint of God's waves and billows going over him. Our path of trouble is no untrodden path. To the same purport, v. 5, The waters compassed me about even to the soul. And this also is borrowed from David's complaint, Ps. lxix. 1, The waters have come in unto my soul. How fast he was held (v. 6): He went down to the bottom of the mountains; the earth with her bars was about him; it was likely to be about him for ever. He began to sink into despair. When the waters compassed him about even to the soul no marvel that his soul fainted within him. What hopes could he have of deliverance out of a trouble which his own ways and doings had procured to himself? He says, I am cast out of thy sight. Sometimes the condition of God's people may be such in this world that they may think themselves excluded from God's presence, so as no more to see him. But it is only the surmise of unbelief, for God has not cast away his people whom he has chosen. He recovered himself from sinking into despair, with some comfortable prospects of deliverance. Faith corrected and controlled the surmises of fear and distrust. Here was a fierce struggle between sense and faith, but faith had the last word and came off conqueror. Jonah's faith said, Yet I will look again towards thy holy temple. When Hezekiah desired that he might be assured of his recovery, he asked, What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the Lord? (Isa. xxxviii. 22), as if that were the only thing for the sake of which he wished for health; so Jonah here hopes he shall look again towards the temple. How modestly Jonah expresses himself; as one conscious to himself of guilt and unworthiness, he dares not speak of dwelling in God's house, but he hopes he may be admitted to look towards it. Or these words may be taken as Jonah's vow when he was in distress, and he speaks (v. 9) of paying what he vowed. His sin for which God pursued him was fleeing from the presence of the Lord. He will never again look towards Tarshish, but will again look towards the temple, and will go from strength to strength till he appear before God there. When our souls faint we must remember God; and when we think on his name we should call on his name. He reflects upon the favour of God to him when in his distress he sought and trusted him. God graciously accepted his prayer (v. 7): My prayer, being sent to him, came in unto him, even into his holy temple; it was heard in the highest heavens, though it was prayed in the lowest deeps. He wonderfully wrought deliverance for him (v. 6): Yet hast thou brought up my life from corruption, O Lord my God! Some think he said this when he was vomited up on dry ground. The earth with her bars was about me for ever, and yet thou hast brought up my life from the pit, from the bars of the pit. Or we may suppose it spoken while he was yet in the fish's belly, and then it is the language of his faith: "Thou hast kept me alive in the pit, and therefore thou canst, thou wilt, bring up my life from the pit"; and he speaks of it with as much assurance as if it were done already: Thou hast brought up my life. If the Lord be our God, he will be to us the resurrection and the life, will redeem our lives from destruction, from the power of the grave. He gives warning to others to keep close to God (v. 8): Those that observe lying vanities forsake their own mercy. Those that worship other gods, as the heathen mariners did, and expect relief and comfort from them, forsake their own mercy; they turn their back upon their own happiness. Or, those that follow their own inventions, as Jonah himself had done when he fled from the presence of the Lord to go to Tarshish, forsake their own mercy, that mercy which they might find if they would but keep close to God and their duty. He solemnly binds his soul with a bond that, if God work deliverance for him, the God of his mercies shall be the God of his praises, v. 9. Jonah promises, that with the sacrifice of thanksgiving he will mention the lovingkindness of the Lord, to his glory, and the encouragement of others. He will honour him by a punctual performance of his vows. Probably his vow was that if God would deliver him he would readily go wherever he should please to send him, though it were to Nineveh. He concludes with an acknowledgement of God as the Saviour of his people: Salvation is of the Lord; it belongs to the Lord, Ps. iii. 8. Jonah's experience shall encourage others, in all ages, to trust in God as the God of their salvation.

Verse 10

Jonah's discharge from his imprisonment, and his deliverance from death may be considered as an instance of God's mercy to a poor penitent, that in his distress prays to him. When God had him at his mercy he showed him mercy, and did not contend for ever. It seems a type and figure of Christ's resurrection. He died and was buried, to lay the storm which our sin had raised, and lay in the grave, as Jonah did, three days and three nights, a prisoner for our debt; but the third day he came forth, by his messengers to preach repentance, and remission of sins, even to the Gentiles.

CHAP. III

I. Jonah's mission renewed, and the command a second time given him to go preach at Nineveh, ver. 1, 2. II. Jonah's message to Nineveh faithfully delivered, ver. 3, 4. III. The repentance, humiliation, and reformation of the Ninevites, ver. 5–9. IV. God's gracious revocation of the sentence passed upon them, ver. 10.

Verses 1–4

I. Jonah's commission is renewed and readily obeyed.

God was perfectly reconciled to Jonah, and the commission anew given him was an evidence of the remission of his former disobedience. The word of the Lord came unto Jonah the second time (v. 1). After he has been thrown into the sea, and thrown out of it again, God comes and asks him, "Jonah, wilt thou go to Nineveh now?" Jonah shall be trusted. God might justly have said as we should concerning one that had dealt treacherously with us, that though we would not proceed to the rigour of the law against him, yet we would never again repose confidence in him. But, behold! the word of the Lord comes to him again, to show that when God forgives he forgets, and whom he forgives he receives into his family again, and restores them to their former estate. God's making use of us is the best evidence of his being at peace with us. Jonah was reconciled to God, not now disobedient to the heavenly vision. He neither endeavoured to avoid hearing the command, nor did he decline obeying it. But now, without murmuring and disputing, Jonah arose, and went unto Nineveh, according to the word of the Lord, v. 3. He went directly to Nineveh, though it was a great way off, and a place where, it is likely, he never was before; yet thither he took his journey, according to the word of the Lord.

II. The command given him. He was sent in the name of the God of heaven, to proclaim war with Nineveh (v. 2): "Arise, go up to Nineveh, that great city," that metropolis, and preach unto it, preach against it, so the Chaldee. Jonah is sent to Nineveh, which was at this time the chief city of the Gentile world, as an indication of God's gracious intentions to make the light of divine revelation to shine in those dark regions. God knew that if Sodom and Gomorrah, Tyre and Sidon, had had the means of grace, they would have repented, Matt. xi. 21, 23. He knew that if Nineveh had now the means of grace they would repent, and he gave them those means and sent Jonah. Go, and preach (says God) the preaching that I bid thee. Tell the men of Nineveh that their wickedness has come up to God, and God's vengeance is coming down upon them. This was the message Jonah was loth to deliver, and flew off and went to Tarshish; but, when he is brought to it the second time, God does not alter the message, to gratify him, or make it the more passable; no, he must now preach the very same that he was then ordered to preach and would not. It was an encouragement to him that God would go with him, that the Spirit of prophecy should abide upon him, when he was at Nineveh, to give him further instructions. Jonah must go with an implicit faith. Admirals, sometimes, when they are sent abroad, are not to open their commission till they have got so many leagues off at sea; so Jonah must go to Nineveh, and, when he comes there, shall be told what to say.

III. He faithfully and boldly delivered his errand. When he came to Nineveh he found it was an exceedingly great city of three days' journey (v. 3); a city great to God, so the Hebrew phrase is, meaning no more than as we render it, exceedingly great. The greatness of Nineveh consisted chiefly in the extent of it; it was much larger than Babylon, such a city, says Diodorus Siculus, as no man ever after built. When he came thither he lost no time; but opened his commission immediately, according to his instructions, and he cried, and said, Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown. This was the purport of his message. He meant, and they understood him, that it should be overthrown, not by war, but by some immediate stroke, either by an earthquake or by fire and brimstone as Sodom was. So long God will wait to see if, upon this alarm given, they will humble themselves and amend their doings, and so prevent the ruin threatened. But he will wait no longer. Forty days is a long time for a righteous God to defer his judgments, yet it is but a little time for an unrighteous people to repent and reform. The fixing of the day thus, with all possible assurance, would help to convince them that it was a message from God.

Verses 5–10

I. A wonder of divine grace in the repentance and reformation of Nineveh, upon the warning given them of their destruction approaching. It will rise up in judgment against the men of the gospel-generation, and condemn them; for the Ninevites repented at the preaching of Jonas, but behold, a greater than Jonas is here, Matt. xii. 41. It did condemn the impenitence and obstinacy of Israel at that time. God sent many prophets to Israel, well known to be mighty in word and deed; but to Nineveh he sent only one, and him a stranger, whose aspect was mean, and his bodily presence weak, after so long a journey; and yet they repented, but Israel repented not. Jonah preached but one sermon, and we do not find that he gave them any sign or wonder, and yet they were wrought upon, while Israel continued obstinate. Jonah only threatened wrath and ruin; we do not find that he gave them any encouragements to hope that they should find mercy if they did repent, and yet they repented; but Israel persisted in impenitence, though the prophets sent to them drew them with cords of a man, and with bands of love. The men of Nineveh believed God; they gave credit to the word which Jonah spoke to them in the name of God: they believed that there was but one living and true God—that to him they were accountable—that they had sinned against him—that this notice sent them of ruin approaching came from him—that he is a merciful God, and there might be some hopes of the turning away of the wrath threatened, if they did turn away from the sins for which it was threatened. They brought word to the king of Nineveh, who, some think, was at this time Sardanapalus. Jonah is not sent to the court, but to the streets of Nineveh, to make his proclamation. However, an account is brought to the king of Nineveh, not by way of information against Jonah, as a disturber of the public peace, but as a message from heaven, by some that were concerned for the public welfare. The king set them a good example of humiliation, v. 6. When he heard of the word of God sent to him he rose from his throne in sorrow and shame for sin, by which he and his people had become obnoxious. He laid aside his royal robe, the badge of his imperial dignity, as an acknowledgment that, having not used his power as he ought for the restraining of violence and wrong, and the maintaining of right, he had forfeited his throne and robe to the justice of God. Even the king himself disdained not to put on the garb of a penitent, for he covered himself with sackcloth, and sat in ashes. The people put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them, v. 5. Though bodily exercise alone profits nothing, and a man's spreading sackcloth and ashes under him, if that be all, is but a jest (it is the heart that God looks at, Isa. lviii. 5), yet when God calls to mourning and girding with sackcloth, we must by outward expressions of inward sorrow glorify God with our bodies, at least by laying aside their ornaments. A general fast was observed throughout that great city, v. 7–9. On the day appointed let neither man nor beast taste anything; nor so much as drink water. Let them make themselves uneasy in body, to show how uneasy they are in mind, through sorrow for sin and the fear of divine wrath. With their fasting and mourning they must join prayer and supplication to God; for the fasting is designed to fit the body for the service of the soul in the duty of prayer. In prayer we must cry mightily, with a fixedness of thought, firmness of faith, and fervour of pious and devout affections. Yet this is not all. They must to their fasting and praying add reformation and amendment of life: Let them turn everyone from his evil way, and particularly from the violence that is in their hands; let them restore what they have unjustly taken, and make reparation for what wrong they have done. It is not enough to fast for sin, but we must fast from sin. This fast is proclaimed and religiously observed (v. 9). They hope that God will, upon their repenting and turning, revoke his sentence against them. As when we pray for the favour of God we pray for all good, so when we pray against the wrath of God we pray against all evil. Jonah had not told them; they had not among them any other prophets to tell them, yet they had a general notion of the goodness of God's nature, his mercy to man, and from this they raised some hopes that he would spare them; they dare not presume, but they will not despair.

II. Here is a wonder of divine mercy in the sparing of these Ninevites upon their repentance (v. 10). God saw that they turned from their evil way, and that was the thing he looked for and required. Here were no sacrifices offered to God, that we read of, to make atonement for sin, but the sacrifice of God is a broken spirit; a broken and contrite heart, such as the Ninevites now had, is what he will not despise; it is what he will give countenance to and put honour upon.

CHAP. IV

In this chapter we read, with a great deal of uneasiness, concerning the sin of Jonah; and, as there is joy in heaven and earth for the conversion of sinners, so there is grief for the follies and infirmities of saints. In the first chapter we had him fleeing from the face of God; but here we have him flying in the face of God; and there we had an account of his repentance and return to God; but here, though no doubt he did repent, yet no account is left us of his recovering himself; but, while we read with wonder of his perverseness, we read with no less wonder of God's tenderness towards him, by which it appeared that he had not cast him off. I. Jonah's repining at God's mercy to Nineveh, ver. 1–3. II. The gentle reproof God gave him for it, ver. 4. III. Jonah's discontent at the withering of the gourd, ver. 5–9. IV. God's improving it for his conviction, that he ought not to be angry at the sparing of Nineveh, ver. 10, 11.

Verses 1–4

I. Jonah quarrelled with God for his mercy to Nineveh. This gives us occasion to suspect that Jonah had only delivered the message of wrath against the Ninevites, and had not assisted them in their repentance.

Jonah grudged them the mercy they found (v. 1): It displeased Jonah exceedingly; and he was very angry. Whatever pleases God should please us, and, though we cannot account for it, yet we must acquiesce in it. He had so little affection to men as to be angry at the conversion of the Ninevites and their reception into the divine favour. It was a point of honour that Jonah stood upon and that made him angry. He was jealous for the honour of his country; the repentance and reformation of Nineveh shamed the obstinacy of Israel that repented not, but hated to be reformed; and the favour God had shown to these Gentiles, upon their repentance, was an ill omen to the Jewish nation. He was jealous for his own honour, fearing lest, if Nineveh was not destroyed within forty days, he should be accounted a false prophet, and stigmatized accordingly. He quarrelled with God about it. When his heart was not within him, he spoke unadvisedly with his lips; and here he tells us what he said (v. 2, 3): He prayed unto the Lord, but it is a very awkward prayer. Being in discontent, his corruptions got head of his graces, and, when he should have been praying for benefit by the mercy of God himself, he was complaining of the benefit others had by that mercy. He now begins to justify himself in fleeing from the presence of the Lord when he was first ordered to go to Nineveh: "Lord," said he, "was not this my saying when I was in my own country? Did I not foresee that if I went to preach to Nineveh they would repent, and thou wouldst forgive them?" What a strange sort of man was Jonah, to dread the success of his ministry! It is unaccountable that that which all the saints had made the matter of their joy and praise Jonah should make the matter of reflection upon God, as if that were an imperfection of the divine nature which is indeed the greatest glory of it—that God is gracious and merciful. In a passion, he wishes for death (v. 3), "Now, O Lord! take, I beseech thee, my life from me. If Nineveh must live, let me die, rather than see thy word and mine disproved, rather than see the glory of Israel transferred to the Gentiles," as if there were not grace enough in God both for Jews and Gentiles. It was very absurd for him to wish he might die when he had a prospect of living to so good a purpose and could be so ill spared. Our business is to get ready to die by doing the work of life, and then to refer ourselves to God to take away our life when and how he pleases.

II. See how justly God reproved Jonah for this heat that he was in (v. 4): The Lord said, Doest thou well to be angry? See how mildly the great God speaks to this foolish man, to teach us to restore those that have fallen with a spirit of meekness, and with soft answers to turn away wrath. Doest thou well? We should often put this question to ourselves. When passion is up, let it meet with this check, "Do I well to be so soon angry, so often angry, so long angry, to put myself into such a heat, and to give others such ill language in my anger?"

Jonah persists here in his discontent.

I. Jonah's sullen expectation of the fate of Nineveh. He retires, goes out of the city, sits alone, and keeps silence, because he sees the Ninevites repent and reform, v. 5. The forty days were now expiring, or had expired, and Jonah hoped that, if Nineveh was not overthrown, yet some judgment or other would come upon it, sufficient to save his credit. He made himself a booth of the boughs of trees.

II. God's gracious provision for his shelter and refreshment when he thus foolishly afflicted himself, v. 6. Jonah was sitting in his booth, fretting at the cold of the night and the heat of the day. God looked on him with compassion, as the tender mother does on the froward child. He prepared a gourd, a plant with broad leaves, that suddenly grew up, and covered his hut or booth. It was a shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief, that, being refreshed in body, he might the better guard against the uneasiness of his mind. A gourd, one would think, was but a slender fortification at the best, yet Jonah was exceedingly glad of the gourd. A gourd in the right place may do us more service than a cedar. A small toy will serve sometimes to pacify a cross child, as the gourd did Jonah.

III. The sudden loss of this provision which God had made for his refreshment, and the return of his trouble, v. 7, 8. God prepared a worm to destroy the gourd. The gourd withered the next day after it sprang up; our comforts come forth like flowers and are soon cut down. A little thing withers them; a small worm at the root destroys a large gourd. Something unseen and undiscerned does it. God did not send an angel to pluck up Jonah's gourd, but sent a worm to smite it. He prepared a wind to make Jonah feel the want of the gourd, v. 8. It was a vehement east wind, which drove the heat of the rising sun violently upon the head of Jonah. Thus poor Jonah lay open to sun and wind.

IV. The further fret that this put Jonah into (v. 8). "If the gourd be killed, if the gourd be dead, kill me too, let me die with the gourd." It is just that those who love to complain should never be left without something to complain of, that their folly may be manifested and corrected, and, if possible, cured.

V. The rebuke God gave him for this; he again reasoned with him: Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd? v. 9. When afflicting providences deprive us of our relations, possessions, and enjoyments, we must bear it patiently, must not be angry at God, must not be angry for the gourd. It is comparatively but a small loss, the loss of a shadow. That which should especially silence our discontent is that though our gourd be gone our God is not gone.

VI. His justification of his passion and discontent is strange, v. 9. He said, I do well to be angry, even unto death. Passion often over-rules conscience, and forces it to give a false judgment, as Jonah here did. He has so little regard to himself as to abandon his own life, to kill himself with fretting.

VII. He did ill to murmur at the sparing of Nineveh. Out of his own mouth God will judge him; he made no reply, but, we hope, returned to his right mind and recovered his temper. 1. God argued (v. 10, 11): "Thou hast had pity on the gourd, hast spared it, and saidst, What a pity it is that this gourd should ever wither! and should not I then spare Nineveh? The gourd thou hadst pity on was but one; but the inhabitants of Nineveh, whom I have pity on, are numerous." It is very populous, as appears by the number of the infants, two years old and under, of which there are 120,000 in Nineveh. So many there were in Nineveh not guilty of any transgression, and consequently had not contributed to the common guilt, and yet, if Nineveh had been overthrown, they would all have been involved in the common calamity; "and shall not I spare Nineveh then, with an eye to them?" God took notice of the abundance of cattle too that were in Nineveh, which he had more reason to pity and spare than Jonah had to pity and to spare the gourd, inasmuch as the animal life is more excellent than the vegetable. 2. The gourd which Jonah was concerned for was none of his own; which he made not to grow; but the persons in Nineveh whom God had compassion on were all the work of his own hands, he made them, and his they were, and therefore he had much more reason to have compassion on them. 3. The gourd which Jonah had pity on was of a sudden growth, and therefore of less value; it came up in a night, it was the son of a night (so the word is); but Nineveh is an ancient city, of many ages standing, and therefore cannot be so easily given up. 4. The gourd which Jonah had pity on perished in a night; it withered, and there was an end of it. But the precious souls in Nineveh that God had pity on are immortal. One soul is of more value than the whole world, surely then one soul is of more value than many gourds. It may be that Jonah, after this was well reconciled to the sparing of Nineveh, and was as well pleased with it as ever he had been displeased. Jonah had said, I do well to be angry, but he could not prove it. God says and proves it, I do well to be merciful; and it is a great encouragement to poor sinners to hope that they shall find mercy with him. Such murmurers shall be made to understand this doctrine, that, how narrow soever their souls, their principles are, and how willing soever they are to engross divine grace to themselves and those of their own way, there is one Lord over all, that is rich in mercy to all that call upon him, and in every nation, in Nineveh as well as in Israel, he that fears God and works righteousness is accepted of him; he that repents, and turns from his evil way, shall find mercy with him.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROPHECY OF MICAH

There is a resemblance between Isaiah's prophecy and this. Compare Isa. ii. 2, 3, with Mic. iv. 1, 2. Isaiah's prophecy is said to be concerning Judah and Jerusalem, but Micah's concerning Samaria and Jerusalem; for, though this prophecy be dated only by the reigns of the kings of Judah, yet it refers to the kingdom of Israel, the approaching ruin of which, in the captivity of the ten tribes, he foretells and laments. I. To convince sinners of their sins, by charging both Israel and Judah with idolatry, covetousness, oppression, contempt of the word of God, and their rulers both in church and state, with the abuse of their power; and also by showing them the judgments of God. II. To comfort God's people with promises of mercy and deliverance, especially with an assurance of the coming of the Messiah and of the grace of the gospel through him. Two quotations out of it were made publicly upon very solemn occasions, and both refer to very great events. 1. One is a prediction of the destruction of Jerusalem (ch. iii. 12), which we find quoted in the Old Testament, by the elders of the land (Jer. xxvi. 17, 18), in justification of Jeremiah. "Micah (say they) foretold that Zion should be ploughed as a field, and Hezekiah did not put him to death; why then should we punish Jeremiah for saying the same?" 2. Another is a prediction of the birth of Christ (ch. v. 2) which we find quoted in the New Testament, by the chief priests and scribes of the people, in answer to Herod's enquiry, where Christ should be born (Matt. ii. 5, 6).

CHAP. I

I. The title of the book (ver. 1) and a preface demanding attention, ver. 2. II. Warning given of judgments hastening upon Israel and Judah (ver. 3, 4), for sin, ver. 5. III. The particulars of the destruction, ver. 6, 7. IV. The greatness of the destruction shown, 1. By the prophets sorrow for it, ver. 8, 9. 2. By the general sorrow that should be for it, in the places that must expect to share in it, ver. 10–16.

Verses 1–7

I. A general account of this prophet and his prophecy, v. 1. The prophecy is the word of the Lord; a divine revelation. This word of the Lord came to the prophet, and he saw the vision, saw the things themselves which he foretold, as if they had been already accomplished. The prophet is Micah the Morasthite; his name Micah is a contraction of Micaiah; his surname, the Morasthite, signifies that he was born, or lived, at Moresheth, which is mentioned (v. 14), or Mareshah, which is mentioned v. 15, and Joshua xv. 44. The date of his prophecy is in the reigns of three kings of Judah—Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. Ahaz was one of the worst of Judah's kings, and Hezekiah one of the best. The promises and threatenings of this book are interwoven; even in the wicked reign he preached comfort; and in the pious reign he preached conviction, for, however the times change, the word of the Lord is still the same. The prophecy is concerning Samaria and Jerusalem, the head cities of the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah.

II. A solemn introduction to the following prophecy (v. 2), in which, 1. The people are summoned to draw near. "Hear you people" (all of them, so the margin reads it). It is an unusual construction; but those words with which Micah begins his prophecy are the same in the original with those wherewith Micaiah ended his, 1 Kings xxii. 28. 2. The earth is called upon, with all that therein is, to hear what the prophet has to say: Hearken, O earth! If the church, and those in it, will not hear, the earth, and those in it, shall, and shame them. 3. God himself is appealed to in testimony against this people: "Let the Lord God be witness against you, a witness that you had fair warning given but you would not take the warning; let the accomplishment of the prophecy prove that it was the word of God, and no word of his shall fall to the ground." He will be a witness from his holy temple in heaven, when he comes down to execute judgment (v. 3) against those that turned a deaf ear to his oracles.

III. A terrible prediction of judgments which should come upon Judah and Israel, which had its accomplishment soon after in Israel, and at length in Judah; for it is foretold, 1. That God himself will appear against them, v. 3. God's way towards this people had long been a way of mercy, but now he changes his way, he comes out of his place, and will come down. 2. That when the Creator appears against them it shall be in vain for any creature to appear for them. High places, set up for the worship of idols or for military fortifications, shall all be trampled into the dust. Neither men of high degree, as the mountains, nor men of low degree, as the valleys, shall secure either themselves or the land from the judgments of God, when they are sent with commission to lay all waste. This is applied particularly to the head city of Israel (v. 6): I will make Samaria, that is now a rich and populous city, as a heap of the field, as a heap of stones gathered together to be carried away, and as plantings of a vineyard, as hillocks of earth raised to plant vines in. Their altars had been as heaps in the furrows of the fields (Hos. xii. 11) and now their houses shall be as ruinous heaps.

IV. A charge of sin upon them, as the cause of these judgments (v. 5): For the transgression of Jacob is all this. All the calamities of Jacob and Israel are owing to their transgressions. But it is asked, What is the transgression of Jacob? It is idolatry; it is the high places. It is the idolatry of Samaria and Jerusalem, the royal cities of those two kingdoms. These were the places that had the greatest influence upon the country, by authority and example. If the transgression of Jacob is Samaria, therefore shall Samaria become a heap. Let the ringleaders in sin hear this and fear.

V. The punishment made to answer the sin, v. 7. 1. The gods they worshipped shall be destroyed: The graven images shall be beaten to pieces by the army of the Assyrians, and all the idols shall be laid desolate. Samaria and her idols were ruined together by Sennacherib (Isa. x. 11), and their gods cast into the fire, for they were no gods (Isa. xxxvii. 19). The gifts that passed between them and their gods shall be destroyed; for all the hires thereof shall be burnt with fire. And all this wealth shall become a prey to the idolatrous nations, and so be the hire of a harlot again, wages to an army of idolaters.

Verses 8–16

The funeral of a ruined kingdom.

I. The prophet is himself chief mourner (v. 8, 9). The prophets usually expressed their own grief for public grievances. It was not out of ill-will that they denounced the judgments of God. They dreaded it more than anything. We ought to lament the punishments of sinners as well as the sufferings of saints in this world; the weeping prophet did so (Jer. ix. 1); so did this prophet. He makes a wailing like the dragons, or the jackals, ravenous beasts that meet in the night, and howl, and make hideous noises; he mourns as the owls, the screech-owls, or ostriches, as some read it. Israel's case is desperate: Her wound is incurable. She will not by repentance and reformation help herself. There is indeed balm in Gilead and a physician there; but they will not apply to the physician. Judah likewise is in danger. The cup is going round, and is now put into Judah's hand: The enemy has come to the gate of Jerusalem. Soon after the destruction of Samaria the Assyrian army, under Sennacherib, laid siege to Jerusalem, came to the gate, but could not force its way any further.

II. Several places are here called upon to mourn; but they must not let the Philistines hear them (v. 10): Declare it not in Gath; this is borrowed from David's lamentation for Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 20), for the uncircumcised will triumph in Israel's tears. One would not gratify those that make merry with the sins or the sorrows of God's Israel. But, though it may be prudent not to give way to a noisy sorrow, yet it is duty to admit a silent one when the church of God is in distress. "Roll thyself in the dust and so let the house of Judah and every house in Jerusalem become a house of Aphrah, a house of dust." Other places are here named that should be sharers in this universal mourning, the names of some of which we do not find elsewhere. Sennacherib's invasion is described by the impressions of terror it should make upon the several cities that fell in his way, Isa. x. 28, 29, &c. 1. The inhabitants of Saphir, which signifies neat and beautiful (thou that dwellest fairly, so the margin reads it), shall pass away into captivity, or be forced to flee, stripped of all their ornaments and having their shame naked. 2. The inhabitants of Zaanan, which signifies the country of flocks, a populous country, where the people are as numerous as flocks of sheep, shall yet be so taken up with their own calamities, that they shall not come forth in the mourning of Bethezel, which signifies a place near, shall not bring succour to their neighbours in distress; for he shall receive of you his standing; the enemy shall find footing among you. 3. As for the inhabitants of Maroth (which, some think, is put for Ramoth, others that it signifies the rough places), they waited carefully for good, but were disappointed; for evil came from the Lord unto the gate of Jerusalem, when the Assyrian army besieged it, v. 12. 4. Lachish was a city of Judah, which Sennacherib laid siege to, Isa. xxxvi. 1, 2. The inhabitants of that city are called to bind the chariot to the swift beast, to prepare for a speedy flight. God's quarrel with Lachish is that she is the beginning of sin, the sin of idolatry, to the daughter of Zion (v. 13); they had learned it from the ten tribes, their near neighbours, and so infected the two tribes with it. Lachish, having been so much accessory to the sin of Israel, shall certainly be reckoned with: Thou shalt give presents to Moresheth-gath, a city of the Philistines, to assist thee, but it shall be in vain, for (v. 14) the houses of Achzib (a city which joined to Mareshah, or Moresheth, and is mentioned with it, Joshua xv. 44) shall be a lie to the kings of Israel. Achzib signifies a lie. 5. Mareshah, that could not, or would not, help Israel, shall herself be made a prey (v. 15): "I will bring an heir (that is, an enemy) that shall take possession of thy lands, with as much assurance as if he were heir to them, and The glory of Israel shall come to be as Adullam, a poor despicable place." 6. The whole land of Judah seems (v. 16) called to weeping and mourning: "Make thee bald, by tearing thy hair and shaving thy head; poll thee for thy delicate children, that had been tenderly and nicely brought up; enlarge thy baldness as the eagle when she casts her feathers and is all over bald; for they have gone into captivity from thee, and their captivity will be the more grievous to them because they have not been inured to hardship."

CHAP. II

I. The sins with which the people of Israel are charged—covetousness and oppression, fraudulent and violent practices (ver. 1, 2), dealing barbarously, even with women and children, ver. 8, 9, opposition of God's prophets (ver. 6, 7), and delighting in false prophets, ver. 11. II. The judgments with which they are threatened that they should be humbled, and impoverished (ver. 3–5), and banished, ver. 10. III. Gracious promises of comfort, reserved for the good people among them, in the Messiah, ver. 12, 13.

Verses 1–5

I. The injustice of man contriving the evil of sin, v. 1, 2. It is the sin of oppression. 1. They desire that which is not their own—that is the root of bitterness, the root of all evil, v. 2. They covet fields and houses, as Ahab did Naboth's vineyard. 2. They invent ways of accomplishing their desire (v. 4). It is bad to do mischief upon a sudden thought, but much worse to do it with deliberation. They devised it upon their beds, when they should have been asleep. 3. They practise the iniquity they have devised, because it is in the power of their hand; by the help of their wealth, and the authority and interest they have. 4. They are industrious and as soon as the morning is light they practise it. 5. They stick at nothing to compass their designs; what they covet they take away—men's fields by violence, not only by fraud, and colour of law, but by force and with a high hand. They care not to whom they do wrong. They oppress a man and his house; they rob those that have families to maintain, though they send them and their wives and children begging. They oppress a man and his heritage; take away from men that which they have received from their ancestors, and which they have but in trust, to transmit it to their posterity.

II. The justice of God contriving punishment for this sin (v. 3): Therefore thus saith the Lord, Behold, against this family do I devise an evil, that is, against the whole kingdom, the house of Israel, and particularly those families in it that were cruel and oppressive. 1. He finds them very confident that they shall in some way or other escape judgment, and therefore he tells them, It is an evil from which they shall not remove their neck. They were children of Belial, that would not endure the easy yoke of God's righteous commands, but broke those bonds asunder, and therefore God will lay upon them the heavy yoke of his righteous judgments. 2. He finds them proud, and therefore tells them they shall not go haughtily, with stretched-forth necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go (Isa. iii. 16); for this time is evil, and the events of it are very humbling. 3. He finds them jovial, and tells them their laughter shall be turned into mourning and their joy into heaviness (v. 4): In that day, when God comes to punish you for your oppression, shall one take up a parable against you, and lament with a doleful lamentation, with a lamentation of lamentations (so the word is). Their enemies shall insult over them, and make a jest of their griefs, for they shall take up a parable against them. 4. He finds them rich in houses and lands, gained by oppression, and therefore tells them that they shall be stripped of all. They shall say, We are utterly spoiled; he has changed the portion of my people, so that it is now in the possession of their enemies: How has he removed it from me! Turning away from us in wrath, he has divided our fields, and given them into the hands of strangers. The margin reads it, "Instead of restoring, he has divided our fields." God shall ratify what they say (v. 5): Thou shalt have none to cast a cord by lot in the congregation of the Lord, none to divide inheritances, because there shall be no inheritances to divide. It was God's land, a holy land, and therefore it was the more grievous to them to be turned out of it.

Verses 6–11

Two sins charged upon the people of Israel, and judgments for each—persecuting God's prophets and oppressing God's poor.

I. Persecuting God's prophets, suppressing and silencing them, is a sin that provokes God, for his sending prophets to us is a sure token of his goodwill.

1. The opposition which this people gave to God's prophets: They said to those that prophesy, Prophesy ye not, as Isa. xxx. 10. They said to the seers, "See not; do not trouble us with accounts of what you have seen, nor bring us any such frightful messages." They must either not prophesy at all or prophesy only what is pleasing. Some read it, Prophesy not; let these prophesy. Let not those prophesy that tell us of our faults, and threaten us, but let those prophesy that will flatter us in our sins, and cry peace to us. If a prophet will but tell them that it is lawful for them to drink as much as they please of their wine and strong drink, that they shall have peace though they go on and add drunkenness to thirst, this is a man after their own heart. He shall even be the prophet of this people; such a man will not only associate with them in their rioting and revellings, but will pretend to consecrate their sensualities by his prophecies.

2. They are here reproved (v. 7): "O thou that art named the house of Jacob, wilt thou silence those that prophesy, and forbid them to speak in God's name? Is the Lord's Spirit straitened? In silencing the Lord's prophets you do what you can to silence his Spirit too. Can you make the Spirit of God your servant? Will you forbid him to say what is displeasing to you? If you silence the prophets, yet the Spirit of the Lord will find out other ways to reach your consciences? Can your unbelief frustrate the divine counsels?" As Jews: "You are named the house of Jacob, and this is your honour; but are these the doings of your father Jacob?" Consider how unreasonable the thing is in itself: Do not my words do good to those that walk uprightly? God owns the words of the prophets to be his words (they are my words) and by them aims and designs to do good to mankind (Ps. cxix. 68); and will you hinder the great benefactor from doing good? It is certainly for the common good of states and kingdoms that religion should be encouraged.

3. They are threatened with punishment for this sin. They shall be deprived of the benefit of a faithful ministry. Since they say, Prophesy not, God will take them at their word, and they shall not prophesy to them. Let the physician no longer attend the patient that will not be healed, for he will not be ruled. They shall be given up to the blind guidance of an unfaithful ministry. We may understand v. 11 as a threatening: If a man be found walking in the spirit of falsehood, he shall be the prophet of this people. Since they will not admit the truth in the love of it, God will send them strong delusions to believe a lie, 2 Thess. ii. 10, 11.

II. Oppressing God's poor is another sin they are charged with (v. 1, 2),

The sin is described, v. 8, 9. Those who formerly rose up against the enemies of the nation, now of late rose up as enemies of the nation, and, instead of defending it, destroyed it. They made a prey of men, that were travelling on the way, that pass by securely as men averse from war, about their lawful occasions. Those they set upon, and pulled off the robe with the garment from them, that is, they stripped them. Of women (v. 9): The women of my people have you cast out from their pleasant houses. They devoured widows' houses (Matt. xxiii. 14), turned them out of the possession of them. Of children, whose age entitles them to a tender usage: From their children have you taken away my glory for ever. It was the glory of the Israelites' children that they were free, but they enslaved them, sold them to strangers, sent them into idolatrous countries. The sentence is passed upon them for it (v. 10): "Arise ye, and depart; prepare to quit this land. You shall have neither contentment nor continuance in it, because it is polluted by your wickedness. You shall not only be obliged to depart out of this land, but it shall destroy you even with a sore destruction; you shall either be turned out of it or you shall be ruined in it."

Verses 12–13

The chapter concludes, as is usual in the prophets, with promises of mercy, which were in part fulfilled when the Jews returned out of Babylon, and had their full accomplishment in the kingdom of the Messiah. 1. Whereas they were dispersed, they shall be brought together again (v. 12): "I will surely assemble, O Jacob! all of thee, all that are named of the house of Jacob (v. 7) now expelled your country, v. 10. I will surely gather the remnant of Israel. I will put them together as the sheep of Bozrah." Sheep are sociable creatures; they shall be as the flock in the midst of their fold, their own fold, where they are safe under the shepherd's eye and care; and they shall make great noise (as numerous flocks and herds do, with their bleatings and lowing) by reason of the multitude of men, not by reason of their strifes and contentions, but by reason of their great numbers. This was accomplished when Christ by his gospel gathered together in one all the children of God that were scattered abroad, and united both Jews and Gentiles in one fold, and under one Shepherd. 2. Whereas God had seemed to desert them, and cast them off, now he will help them through all the difficulties in the way of their return and deliverance (v. 13): The breaker has come up before them, to break down all opposition, and clear the road for them; and under his guidance they have broken up, and have passed through the gate, the door of escape out of their captivity. Their king shall pass before them, to head them in the way, even Jehovah (he is their king) on the head of them, as he was on the head of the armies of Israel through the wilderness. Christ is the church's King; he is Jehovah; he passes before them, brings them out of the land of their captivity, into the land of their rest. Bishop Pearson applies it to the resurrection of Christ. The breaker has gone up before us out of the grave, and has carried away its gates, and by that breach we go out.

CHAP. III

Micah is very bold in reproving and threatening the great men that were the ringleaders in sin; and he gives the reason (ver. 8) why he was so bold, because he had commission from God to say what he said, by a higher spirit and power than his own. Magistracy and ministry are two great ordinances of God, but these were both corrupted and the intentions perverted; and upon those that abused them the prophet is very severe, and justly so.

I. He gives them their lesson severally, reproving and threatening princes (ver. 1–4) and false and flattering prophets, ver. 5–7. II. He gives them their lesson jointly as acting in conjunction for the ruin of the kingdom, ver. 9–12.

Verses 1–7

I. Let the princes hear their charge and their doom. The heads of Jacob, and the princes of the house of Israel, are called upon to hear what the prophet has to say to them, v. 1. The prophet faithfully discharged his trust: "And I said, Hear, O princes! Is it not your business to administer justice impartially, and not to know faces" (as the Hebrew phrase for partiality and respect of persons is), "but to know judgment, and the merits of every cause?" Therefore stand still, and hear your own judgment.

2. They had transgressed the rules of judgment, though they knew what they were. They hate the good and love the evil. This being their principle, their practice is according to it; they are cruel towards those that are under their power, and whoever lies at their mercy will find that they have none. They fleece the flock they should feed; instead of feeding it, they feed upon it, Ezek. xxxiv. 2. They eat the flesh of my people. It is fit that they should be clothed with the wool, but that will not serve: They flay the skin from them, v. 3. By imposing heavier taxes and exacting them with rigour, by fines, and corporal punishments, for pretended crimes, they ruined their subjects, took away from some their lives, from others their livelihoods, and were as beasts of prey, rather than shepherds. "They break their bones to come at the marrow, and chop the flesh in pieces as for the pot."

3. How they might expect that God should deal with them. The rule is fixed, Those shall have judgment without mercy that have shown no mercy (v. 4). With the froward God will show himself froward, and often gives us cruel and unmerciful men into the hands of those who are cruel and unmerciful themselves.

II. Let the prophets hear their charge too; they were such as prophesied falsely, and the princes bore rule by their means.

1. Their sin: They made it their business to flatter and deceive the people. "They make them to err by crying peace, by telling them that all shall be well with them; whereas they are in the paths of sin, and within a step of ruin. They cry peace, but they bite with their teeth," which perhaps is meant of their biting their own lips, as we are apt to do when we would suppress something. They bite with their teeth, and cry peace; that is, they flatter and compliment those that will feed them with good bits, but as for those that put not into their mouths, they look upon them as their enemies. They preach either comfort or terror to men, not according as they are to God, but as they are to them.

2. The sentence passed upon them for this sin, v. 6, 7. Night shall be upon them, a dark cold night of calamity, such as they, in their flattery, led the people to hope would never come. It shall be dark unto you; the sun shall go down over the prophets; All comfort shall depart and all hope. Their mind shall be full of confusion, their heads shall be clouded, and their own thoughts shall trouble them. They kept others in the dark, and now God will bring them into the dark. Thereby they shall be silenced, and all their pretensions to prophecy for ever shamed. They never had any true vision; it was all a sham, and they were cheats and impostors. They shall not have so much as a counterfeit vision to produce, they shall be ashamed, and confounded, and cover their lips.

Verses 8–12

I. The prophet experiences a divine power going along with him in his work. He could not but speak the word that God put into his mouth. The false prophets were sensual, not having the Spirit, but truly (says Micah) I am full of power by the Spirit of the Lord, v. 8. The qualifications with which this prophet was endued: He was full of power and of judgment, and of might; he had an ardent love to God and to the souls of men, a deep concern for his glory and their salvation, and a flaming zeal against sin. He had likewise courage to reprove it and witness against it. He was a man of wisdom as well as courage; in all his preaching there was light as well as heat, and a spirit of wisdom as well as of zeal. Those who act honestly may act boldly; and those who are sure that they have a commission from God need not be afraid of opposition from men. He declared to Jacob his transgression and to Israel his sin. Since few have meekness enough to receive reproof, those have need of a great deal of boldness, who are to give reproofs, and must pray for a spirit both of wisdom and might.

II. The prophet exerts this power in dealing with the heads of the house of Jacob. He repeats the summons (v. 9), the same that we had v. 1, to the princes of the house of Israel, yet he means those of Judah; for it appears (Jer. xxvi. 18, 19, where v. 12 is quoted) that this was spoken in Hezekiah's kingdom; but, the ten tribes being gone into captivity, Judah is all that is now left of Jacob and Israel. He gives them their titles of heads and princes. Ministers must be faithful to great men, but they must not be rude and uncivil to them.

1. The great wickedness of the princes, priests, and prophets; they were covetous, and prostituted their offices to their love of money. (1) The princes abhorred all judgment; they perverted all equity, when it could not be made pliable to their secular interests. It is laid to their charge (v. 10) that they build up Zion with blood. "They pretend, in justification of their extortion, that they add new streets and squares to the holy cities, and adorn them. But it is with blood and with iniquity, and therefore it cannot prosper; nor will their intentions of good to the city of God justify their contradictions to the law of God." They judge for reward (v. 11). The most righteous cause shall not be carried without a fee, and for a fee the most unrighteous cause shall be carried. The priests' work was to teach the people, but they teach for hire, and will be hired to teach anything, which they know will please. The prophets divine for money. A man might have what oracle he would from them if he would but pay them for it.

2. They lean upon the Lord, and because they are, in profession, his people, think there is neither harm nor danger in their wicked practices. Faith builds upon the Lord, rests in him, and relies upon him, as the soul's foundation; presumption only leans upon the Lord as a prop, makes use of him to serve a turn, while still the world is the foundation that is built upon. "Is not the Lord among us? Have we not the tokens of his presence with us, his temple, his ark, his lively oracles?" They are haughty because of the holy mountain (Zeph. iii. 11), as if their church privileges would palliate the worst of practices. They are confident of their own safety: No evil can come upon us. Many are rocked asleep in a fatal security by their church-privileges, as if those would protect them in sin.

3. The doom passed upon them for their wickedness, notwithstanding (v. 12): Therefore shall Zion for your sake be ploughed as a field. This passage is quoted as a bold word spoken by Micah (Jer. xxvi. 18), which yet Hezekiah and his princes took well; they repented and reformed, and so the execution of this threatening did not come in those days. It is Zion that shall be ploughed as a field, the building burnt to the ground and levelled with it. Some observe that this was literally fulfilled in the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, when the ground on which the city stood was ploughed up in token of its utter desolation. The wickedness of those who preside in them brings the ruin: "It is for your sake that Zion shall be ploughed as a field; you pretend to build up Zion, but doing it by blood and iniquity, you pull it down."

CHAP. IV

Zion was ploughed as a field, but the Christian church, was built upon the ruins of it. It is here promised, I. That it shall be enlarged by the accession of the nations to it, ver. 1, 2. II. That it shall be protected in tranquillity and peace, ver. 3, 4. III. That it shall be kept faithful to God, ver. 5. IV. That, under Christ's government, all its grievances shall be redressed, ver. 6, 7. V. That it shall have an ample and flourishing dominion, ver. 8. VI. That its troubles shall be brought to a happy issue, ver. 9, 10. VII. That its enemies shall be destroyed by their attempts against it, ver. 11–14.

Verses 1–7

It is a very comfortable but with which this chapter begins. When we sometimes see the corruptions of the church, Zion ploughed as a field, we are ready to fear that it will one day perish. But let not our faith fail; out of the ashes of the church another phoenix shall arise. The first words of this chapter bring in the mountain of the Lord's house as much dignified by being frequented as ever it had been disgraced by being deserted. Though Zion be ploughed as a field, yet God has not cast off his people, but by the fall of the Jews salvation has come to the Gentiles, Rom. xi. 11, 12. This is the mystery which God by the prophet here shows us, the same in the first three verses of this chapter which another prophet said (Isa. ii. 2–4).

I. There shall be a church for God set up in the world, after the defection and destruction of the Jewish church, in the days of the Messiah. The people of God shall be incorporated by a new charter, a new spiritual way of worship shall be enacted; better privileges shall be granted by this new charter, and better provision made for establishing the kingdom of God among men than had been made by the Old Testament constitution: The mountain of the house of the Lord shall again appear firm ground, v. 1. A church shall be set up in the world, to which the Lord will be daily adding such as shall be saved.

II. This church shall be firmly founded and well-built: It shall be established in the top of the mountains; Christ himself will build it upon a rock.

III. It shall become eminent and conspicuous: It shall be exalted above the hills, observed with wonder for its growing greatness from small beginnings. The glory of this latter house is greater than that of the former, Hag. ii. 9. See 2 Cor. iii. 7, 8, &c.

IV. There shall be a great accession of converts to it and succession of converts in it. People shall flow unto it as a constant stream of believers flowing in from all parts into the church. In gospel-times many nations shall flow into the church. Ministers shall be sent forth to disciple all nations, and they shall not labour in vain. "He will teach us of his ways, what is the way in which he would have us to walk with him and in which we may depend upon him to meet us graciously."

V. A new revelation shall be published to the world, on which the church shall be founded, and by which multitudes shall be brought into it: For the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. The gospel is here called the word of the Lord. It began to be spoken by the Lord Christ himself, Heb. ii. 3. And it is a law, a law of faith; we are under the law to Christ. This was to go forth from Jerusalem, from Zion. Thence the gospel must take rise, to show the connection between the Old Testament and the New, that the gospel is not set up in opposition to the law, but is an explication and illustration of it, and a branch growing out of its roots. It was in Jerusalem that Christ preached and wrought miracles; there he died, rose again, and ascended; there the Spirit was poured out; and those that were to preach repentance and remission of sins to all nations were ordered to begin at Jerusalem.

VI. A convincing power should go along with the gospel of Christ, in all places where it should be preached (v. 3): He shall judge among many people.

VII. A disposition to mutual peace and love shall be the happy effect of the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah, Tit. iii. 2, 3. Those who, before their conversion, did injuries, and would bear none, after their conversion can bear injuries, but will do none. As far as the gospel prevails it makes men peaceable, for such is the wisdom from above; it is gentle and easy to be entreated; and, if nations were but leavened by it, there would be universal peace. The art of war, instead of being improved (which some reckon the glory of a kingdom), shall be forgotten and laid aside as useless. The gospel men peaceable (v. 4): They shall sit safely, and none shall disturb them; they shall sit securely, and shall not disturb themselves, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree, enjoying the fruit of them, and needing no other shelter than the leaves of them. None shall make them afraid; they shall not be disposed to fear.

VIII. The churches shall be constant in their duty, v. 5. Peace is a blessing indeed when it strengthens our resolutions to cleave to the Lord. How constant God's people now resolve to be to him: "We will walk in the name of the Lord our God, will acknowledge him in all our ways."

IX. Notwithstanding the dispersions, distress, and infirmities of the church, it shall be formed and established, v. 6, 7. 1. The state of the church had been low, and very helpless, in the latter times of the Old Testament, partly through the corruptions of the Jewish nation, and partly through the oppressions under which they groaned. They were like a flock of sheep that were maimed, worried, and scattered, Ezek. xxxiv. 16; Jer. l. 6, 17. It is promised that these grievances shall be redressed. Christ will come himself (Matt. xv. 24), and send his apostles to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, Matt. x. 6. From among the Jews God gathered a remnant (v. 7). And from among the Gentiles he raised a strong nation. And such a strong nation the gospel-church is, that the gates of hell shall never be able to prevail against it.

X. The Messiah shall be the king of this kingdom to the end of time.

These verses relate to Zion and Jerusalem, here called the tower of the flock, or the tower of Edor; we read of such a place (Gen. xxxv. 21) near Bethlehem; and some conjecture it is the same place where the shepherds were keeping their flocks when the angels brought them tidings of the birth of Christ, and some think Bethlehem itself is here spoken of, as ch. v. 2. Some think it is a tower at that gate of Jerusalem which is called the sheep-gate (Neh. iii. 32), and conjecture that through that gate Christ rode in triumph into Jerusalem. However, it seems to be put for Jerusalem itself, or for Zion the tower of David.

I. A promise of the glories of the spiritual Jerusalem, the gospel-church, which is the tower of the flock, that one fold in which all the sheep of Christ are protected under one Shepherd: "Unto thee shall it come; even the first dominion, a dignity and power equal to that of David and Solomon, that kingdom shall again come to the daughter of Jerusalem, which it was deprived of at the captivity." Now this had by no means its accomplishment in Zerubbabel; and therefore it must refer to the kingdom of the Messiah and had its accomplishment when God gave to our Lord Jesus the throne of his father David (Luke i. 32).

II. This is illustrated by a prediction of the calamities of the literal Jerusalem, to which some favour and relief should be granted, as a type and figure of what God would do for the gospel-Jerusalem.

1. Jerusalem put in pain by the providences of God. "She cries out aloud, because there is no king in her, none of that honour she used to have. Instead of ruling the nations, she is ruled by them, and has become a captive. Her counsellors have perished. Pangs have taken her." She is carried captive to Babylon. "She goes forth out of the city, and is constrained to dwell in the field, exposed to all manner of inconveniences; she goes even to Babylon, and there wears out seventy tedious years in a miserable captivity, in pain, as a woman in travail, waiting to be delivered." When she is delivered out of Babylon, still she is in fear; for now also, when Jerusalem is in the rebuilding, many nations are gathered against her, v. 11. They were so in Ezra's and Nehemiah's time, and did all they could to obstruct the building of the temple and the wall. They were so in the time of the Maccabees; they said, Let her be defiled.

2. Jerusalem made easy by the promises of God: "Why dost thou cry out aloud?" Jerusalem's pangs are not dying agonies, but travailing throes, which after a while will be forgotten, for joy that a child is born into the world. Let the literal Jerusalem comfort herself with this, that, she shall continue until the coming of the Messiah, for there his kingdom must be first set up, and when at length she is ploughed as a field (as is threatened, ch. iii. 12), yet her privileges shall be resigned to the spiritual Jerusalem, and the promises made to her shall be fulfilled. Let Jerusalem be easy then, for, her captivity in Babylon shall have a happy end (v. 10). This was done by Cyrus, who acted therein as God's servant; and that deliverance was typical of our redemption by Jesus Christ. The designs of her enemies against her afterwards shall be baffled, v. 12, 13. Their coming together against Zion shall be the occasion of their ruin. Zion shall have the honour of being victorious over them, v. 13. "Arise, and thresh, O daughter of Zion! God will make thy horn iron, to push them down, and thy hoofs brass, to tread upon them when they are down; and thus thou shalt beat in pieces many people, that have long been beating thee in pieces." Thus, when God pleases, the daughter of Babylon is made a threshing floor, and the worm Jacob is made a threshing instrument, with which God will thresh the mountains, and make them as chaff, Isa. xli. 14, 15. How strangely are the tables turned, since Jacob was the threshing-floor and Babylon the threshing instrument! Isa. xxi. 10. The spoils gained by Zion's victory shall be brought into the sanctuary, and devoted to God, either in part, as those of Midian (Num. xxxi. 28), or in whole, as those of Jericho, Joshua vi. 17. Some make all this to point at the defeat of Sennacherib when he besieged Jerusalem, others to the destruction of Babylon, others to the successes of the Maccabees; but others think it had its full accomplishment in the Spiritual victories obtained by the gospel of Christ over the powers of darkness that fought against it. The nations thought to ruin Christianity in its infancy, but it was victorious over them.

CHAP. V

I. A prediction of the troubles and distresses of the Jewish nation, ver. 1. II. A promise of the Messiah, and of his kingdom, 1. Of the birth of the Messiah, ver. 2, 3. 2. Of his advancement, ver. 4. 3. Of his protection of his people, and his victory over his and their enemies, ver. 5, 6. 4. Of the great increase of the church, and the blessings that shall come to the world by it, ver. 7. 5. Of the destruction of the enemies of the church, both those without and those within, ver. 8–15.

Verses 1–6

I. The abasement and distress of Zion, v. 1. The Jewish nation, for many years before the captivity, dwindled: Now gather thyself in troops, O daughter of troops! It is a summons to Zion's enemies. Let them gather in troops, for, says the prophet, in the name of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, He has laid siege against us; the king of Assyria has, the king of Babylon has, and prevail so far as to smite the judge of Israel—the king, the chief justice, and the other inferior judges—with a rod upon the cheek, having made them prisoners. Complaint had been made of the judges of Israel (ch. iii. 11) that they were corrupt and took bribes, and this disgrace came justly upon them for abusing their power.

II. The advancement of Zion's King. Having shown how low the house of David should be brought to encourage the faith of God's people, he adds an illustrious prediction of the Messiah in whom that covenant should be established, and the honours of that house should be revived.

1. How the Messiah is here described. It is he that is to be ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting, from the days of eternity, as the word is. This description of Christ's eternal generation, or his going forth as the Son of God, begotten of his Father before all worlds, shows that this prophecy must belong only to him, and could never be verified of any other. The going forth is used (Deut. viii. 3) for a word which proceeds out of the mouth, and is therefore very fitly used to signify the eternal generation of him who is called the Word of God, that was in the beginning with God, John i. 1, 2. His office as Mediator; he was to be ruler in Israel, king of his church; he was to reign over the house of Jacob for ever, Luke i. 32, 33. It is a spiritual Israel that he reigns over. In the hearts of these he reigns by his Spirit and grace, and in the society of these by his word and ordinances.

2. What is here foretold concerning him.

(1) That Bethlehem should be the place of his nativity, v. 2. Beth-lehem signifies the house of bread, the fittest place for him to be born in who is the bread of life. And, because it was the city of David, by a special providence it was ordered that he should be born there. It is called Bethlehem-Ephratah, both names of the same city, as appears Gen. xxxv. 19. It was little among the thousands of Judah, not considerable either for the number of the inhabitants or the figure they made. Christ would give honour to the place of his birth, and not derive honour from it.

(2) That in the fulness of time he should be born of a woman (v. 3). Though the out-goings of the Messiah were from everlasting, yet the redemption in Jerusalem, the consolation of Israel, must be waited for (Luke ii. 25–38) until the time that she who should bring forth (so the virgin Mary is called, as Christ is himself called, He that shall come) shall bring forth; and in the meantime he will give them up. Divine salvations must be waited for until the time fixed for the bringing of them forth.

(3) That the remnant of his brethren shall then return to the children of Israel. The remnant of the Jewish nation shall return to the spirit of the true children of Israel, a people in covenant with God. Some understand it of all believers, Gentiles as well as Jews; they shall all be incorporated into the commonwealth of Israel; and, as they are all brethren to one another, so he is not ashamed to call them brethren, Heb. ii. 11.

(4) That he shall be a glorious prince, and his subjects shall be happy under his government (v. 4):

He shall stand and feed, that is, he shall both teach and rule. He shall do this, not as an ordinary man, but in the strength of the Lord, as one clothed with a divine power to go through his work. The prophets prefaced their messages with, Thus saith the Lord; but Christ spoke, not as a servant, but as a Son—Verily, verily, I say unto you. This was feeding in the majesty of the name of the Lord his God. Christ's government shall be happy for his subjects, for they shall abide. Now shall he be great to the ends of the earth. Now that he stands and feeds his flock, now shall he be great. For Christ reckons it his greatness to do good.

(5) That he shall secure the peace and welfare of his church and people against all the attempts of his and their enemies (v. 5, 6): This man, as king and ruler, shall be the peace when the Assyrians shall come into our land. This refers to the deliverance of Hezekiah and his kingdom from the power of Sennacherib, who invaded them, in the type; but, under the shadow of that, it is a promise of the safety of the gospel-church and of all believers from the designs and attempts of the powers of darkness, Satan and all his instruments, the dragon and his angels, that seek to devour the church of the first-born and all that belong to it. When the Assyrian comes with such a force into a land, can there be any other peace than a tame submission and an unresisted desolation? Yes, even then. Christ is our peace, as a priest, making atonement for sin, and reconciling us to God; and he is our peace as a king, conquering our enemies and commanding down disquieting fears and passions; he creates the fruit of the lips, peace. He will find out proper instruments to be employed for their protection and deliverance, and the defeat of their enemies: Then shall we raise against him seven shepherds and eight principal men, that is, a competent number of persons, men that shall have the care and tenderness of shepherds and the courage and authority of principal men, or princes of men. Seven and eight are a certain number for an uncertain. Magistrates and ministers are shepherds and principal men, raised in defence of religion's righteous cause against the powers of sin and Satan in the world. The opposition given to the church shall be got over, and the opposers brought down. This is represented by the laying of Assyria and Chaldea waste, which two nations were the most formidable enemies to the Israel of God of any, and the destruction of them signified the making of Christ's enemies his footstool: They shall waste the land of Assyria with the sword, and the land of Nimrod in the entrance thereof.

Glorious things are here spoken of the remnant of Jacob, that remnant which was raised of her that halted (ch. iv. 7), and it seems to be that remnant which the Lord our God shall call (Joel ii. 32), on whom the Spirit shall be poured out, the remnant that shall be saved, Rom. ix. 27.

I. They shall be as a dew in the midst of the nations, v. 7. God's church is dispersed all the world over; it is in the midst of many people, as gold in the ore, wheat in the heap. Israel according to the flesh dwelt alone, but the spiritual Israel lies scattered in the midst of many people, as the salt of the earth, or as seed sown in the ground, here a grain and there a grain, Hos. ii. 23. Now this remnant shall be as dew from the Lord, born from above, not of the earth, savouring the things of the earth. They shall be numerous as the drops of dew in a summer's morning, pure and clear. They shall be as the dew that distils insensibly, such is the way of the Spirit. They shall rely on divine grace, for they are no more than what the free grace of God makes them every day. They shall be great blessings to those among whom they live, as the dew and the showers are to the grass. They shall be mild and gentle in their behaviour, like their Master, who comes down like rain upon the new-mown grass, Ps. lxxii. 6.

II. That they shall be as a lion among the beasts of the forest, that treads down and tears in pieces, v. 8. As they shall be silent, and gentle, and communicative of all good, to those that receive the truth in the love of it, so they shall be bold as a lion in witnessing against the corruptions of the times and places they live in, and strong as a lion, in the strength of God, to resist and overcome their spiritual enemies.

III. That they shall be brought off from all carnal confidences, which they have relied on, by the providence of God they shall enjoy such a security that they shall not need them. They had trusted in chariots and horses, and multiplied them (Ps. xx. 7); but now God will cut off their horses, and destroy their chariots (v. 10). They depended upon their fortified cities for their security; but God will take care that they be demolished (v. 11). They shall have them for habitations, but not for garrisons. Many of them depended much upon the advice of their diviners and fortune-tellers; and those God will cut off (v. 12). Many of them had said to the work of their hands, You are our gods; but now idolatry shall be abolished and abandoned (v. 13). Among other monuments of idolatry, I will pluck up thy groves out of the midst of thee, v. 14. These were planted and preserved in honour of their idols, and used in the worship of them. And so will I destroy their cities, meaning the cities that were dedicated to the idols.

IV. That those who stand it out against the gospel of Christ, and continue in league with their idolatries and witchcrafts, shall fall under the wrath of God (v. 15).

CHAP. VI

I. God enters an action against his people for their base ingratitude, and the bad returns they had made him for his favours, ver. 1–5. II. He shows the wrong course they took when they were under conviction, and the frivolous proposals they made, in answer to his charge, ver. 6–8. III. He calls upon them to hear the voice of his judgments, and sets the sins in order before them (ver. 9), their injustice (ver. 10–15), and their idolatry (ver. 16), for both which ruin was coming upon them.

Verses 1–5

Here, I. The prefaces to the message are very solemn. Hear you now what the Lord says. Arise, contend thou before the mountains, or with the mountains, and let the hills hear thy voice. Contend with the mountains and hills of Judæa, that is, with the inhabitants of those mountains and hills; some think, reference is to those mountains on which they worshipped idols. It is to be taken more generally, as appears by his call, not only to the mountains, but to the strong foundations of the earth. He must speak as vehemently as if to make even the hills hear him. "Let the hills hear thy voice, for this senseless, careless people will not hear it. Let the rocks, the foundations of the earth, that have no ears, hear, since Israel, will not hear."

II. The message itself is to let all the world know that God has a quarrel with his people. God will plead with his people Israel, that they may be convinced and that he may be justified. In the close of the foregoing chapter he pleaded with the heathen in anger, but here he pleads with Israel in compassion and tenderness, to bring them to repentance, Come now, and let us reason together. They had revolted from God and rebelled against him; but had they any cause to do so? (v. 3): "O my people! what have I done unto thee?" Here is a challenge to all that ever were in God's service to testify against him if they have found him, in anything, a hard

Master, or if they have found his demands unreasonable. He brought them out of Egypt, the land of their bondage, v. 4. They were content with their slavery, and almost in love with their chains, for the sake of the garlic and onions they had plenty of; but God brought them up, inspired them with an ambition of liberty and animated them with a resolution to shake off their fetters. The Egyptians held them fast, but God redeemed them by force, out of the house of servants, the house of bondage. When he brought them out of Egypt into a howling wilderness, he sent before them Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, three prophets (says the Chaldee paraphrase). We must not forget the mercy of good teachers when we were young. It was God that sent them before us, to prepare the way. God no less glorified himself, and honoured them when he brought them into the land of their rest than when he brought them out of the land of their servitude. Let them remember now what God did for them in baffling and defeating the designs of Balak and Balaam; in bringing them from Shittim, their last lodgment out of Canaan, unto Gilgal, their first lodgment in Canaan. There it was, between Shittim and Gilgal, that, upon the death of Moses, Joshua, a type of Christ, was raised up to put Israel in possession of the land of promise.

Verses 6–8

The proposal for accommodation between God and Israel. Judgment is given against Israel, and therefore,

I. They express their desires to be at peace with God upon any terms (v. 6, 7). Knowing everyone the plague of his own heart, they ask not, What shall this man do? But, What shall I do? What will the Lord be pleased with? What shall I give for my transgressions?

II. They make proposals such as betray their ignorance, though they show their zeal.

1. They bid high. They offer thousands of rams. God required one ram for a sin-offering; they proffer their whole stock, so that they may but be at peace with God. They could be content to part with their first-born for their transgressions, if that would be accepted as an atonement, and the fruit of their body for the sin of their soul. To those that had become vain in their imaginations this seemed a probable expedient of making satisfaction for sin, because our children are pieces of ourselves.

2. Yet they do not bid right. It is true some of these things were instituted by the ceremonial law, but these alone would not recommend them to God. The legal sacrifices had their virtue from the reference they had to Christ the great propitiation; but otherwise, of themselves, it was impossible that the blood of bulls and goats should take away sin. All the proposals of peace but those that are according to the gospel are absurd. Some of them are wicked things, as to give our first-born and the fruit of our body to death. Do they not belong to God? Are they not his already, and born to him? How then can they be a ransom? They could not answer the demands of divine justice, nor would they serve in lieu of the sanctification of the heart and the reformation of the life.

III. God tells them plainly what he demands, v. 8. We need not trouble ourselves to make proposals, the terms are already settled and laid down. He whom we have offended has shown it, not only to thee, O Israel! but to thee, O man! Gentiles as well as Jews—to men, who are rational creatures. What is spoken to all men everywhere in general, must by faith be applied to ourselves in particular, as if it were spoken to thee, O man! by name, and to no other. The good which God requires of us is not the paying of a price for the pardon of sin. (1) We must do justly, must render to all their due, according as our relation and obligation to them are; we must do wrong to none, but do right to all, in their bodies, goods, and good name. (2) We must love mercy, not only be just to all we deal with, but kind to all that need us. Nor must we only show mercy, but we must love mercy. (3) We must walk humbly with our God. This includes all the duties of the first table, as the two former include all the duties of the second table. Enoch's walking with God is interpreted (Heb. xi. 5) his pleasing God. We must, in the whole course of our conversation, conform ourselves to the will of God, keep up our communion with God, and study to approve ourselves to him. We must humble ourselves to walk with God (so the margin reads it); every thought within us must be brought down, to be brought into obedience to God. This is that which God requires, and without which the most costly services are vain oblations; this is more than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices.

God, having shown them how necessary it was that they should do justly, here shows them how plain it was that they had done unjustly.

I. The action is entered against them, v. 9. God speaks to the city, to Jerusalem, to Samaria. When the sin of a city cries to God his voice cries against the city. He warns before he wounds, because he is not willing that any should perish. 1. How the voice of God is discerned by some: The man of wisdom will see thy name. 2. What this voice of God says to all: "Hear you the rod, and who hath appointed it. Hear the rod when it is coming; hear it at a distance, before you see it and feel it. Hear the rod when it has come, and you are sensible of the smart of it; hear what cautions it speaks to you." Every rod has a voice, and it is the voice of God that is to be heard in the rod of God. God in every affliction performs the thing that is appointed for us (Job xxiii. 14).

II. What is the ground of the action, and the things that are laid to their charge.

1. They are charged with injustice, a sin against the second table. After all the methods that God has taken to teach them to do justly, will they yet deal unjustly? It seems, they will, v. 10. And shall I count them pure? v. 11. Those that are dishonest in their dealings shall never be reckoned pure. Treasures of wickedness profit nothing. A scant measure, by which they sold to the poor, cheated them. They had wicked balances and a bag of false weights. Those that had wealth and power in their hands abused it. They are full of violence, that is, they have their houses full of that which is got by violence. The inhabitants thereof have spoken lies; if they are not able to use force and violence, they use fraud and deceit.

2. They are charged with idolatry (v. 6): The statutes of Omri are kept, and all the work of the house of Ahab. Both these kings were wicked, and the wickedness which they established by a law, was idolatry. The wickedness which they established by their laws and examples remained. Those that make corrupt laws, and bring in corrupt usages, are doing that which perhaps may prove the ruin of the child unborn.

III. The sentence which God had given them warning of (v. 9) shall be brought upon them (v. 13): Therefore also I will make thee sick, in smiting thee. As they had smitten the poor with the rod of their oppressions, so would God in like manner smite them, so as to make them sick of the gains they had unjustly gotten.

1. What they have shall do them no good. Their food shall not nourish them: Thou shalt eat, but not be satisfied. Men may be surfeited with the good things of this world and yet not satisfied, Eccles. v. 10;

Isa. lv. 2. Their country shall not harbour and protect them: "Thy casting down shall be in the midst of thee, that is, thou shalt be ruined by mischiefs at home, though thou shouldst not be invaded by a foreign force." They shall not be able to preserve what they have from a foreign force: "Thou shalt take hold of what is about to be taken from thee, but thou shalt not hold it fast, shalt not retrieve it." Their wives and children whom they resolved not to part with, must go into captivity. What they save for a time shall be reserved for a future stroke: That which thou deliverest out of the hand of one enemy will I give up to the sword of another enemy. What they have laboured for they shall not enjoy (v. 15): "Thou shalt sow, but thou shalt not reap; it shall be withered, or an enemy shall reap it for himself, or thou shalt be carried into captivity, and leave it to be reaped by thou knowest not whom. Thou shalt tread the olives, but thou shalt not anoint thyself with oil, having no heart when all is going to ruin. Thou shalt tread out the sweet wine, but shalt not drink wine, for many things may fall between the cup and the lip."

2. All they have shall at length be taken from them (v. 13): Thou shalt be made desolate because of thy sins; and v. 16, a desolation and a hissing. When a people that have been flourishing are made desolate it is the astonishment of some and the triumph of others. Thus you shall bear the reproach of my people. Now that their sins and God's judgments have made their land desolate, their having been once the people of God does but turn so much the more to their reproach; their enemies will say, These are the people of the Lord, Ezek. xxxvi. 20.

CHAP. VII

I. The prophet, in the name of the church, sadly laments the woeful decay of religion in the age wherein he lived, ver. 1–6 II. The prophet, for the sake of the church gives counsel what to do. 1. They must have an eye to God, ver. 7. 2. They must courageously bear up against the insolences of the enemy, ver. 8–10. 3. They must patiently lie down under the rebukes of their God, ver. 9. 4. They must expect that the trouble would continue long, ver. 11–13. 5. They must encourage themselves with God's promises, in answer to the prophet's prayers, ver. 14, 15. 6. They must foresee the fall of their enemies, ver. 16, 17. 7. They must themselves triumph in the mercy and grace of God, and his faithfulness to his covenant (ver. 18–20), and with that comfortable word the prophecy concludes.

Verses 2–6

This description of bad times some take as a prediction of what should be in the reign of Manasseh. But we rather suppose it to be in the reign of Ahaz, or in the beginning of Hezekiah's time, in the best of his days, when he had done his best to purge out corruptions, but still there was much amiss. The prophet bemoans himself that his lot was cast in such a degenerate age, among a people that were ripening apace for a ruin which many a good man would unavoidably be involved in. He laments, 1. That there were so few good people to be found, even among those that were God's people: The good man has perished out of the earth, or out of the land, v. 2. The good man is a godly man and a merciful man; the word signifies both. Those are completely good men that are devout towards God and compassionate and beneficent towards men, that love mercy and walk with God. There is no such thing as a good man to be met with. This is illustrated by a comparison (v. 1): They were as when they have gathered the summer fruits; it was as hard a thing to find a good man as to find any of the summer-fruits, the choicest and best, when the harvest is over. You can find no societies of them as bunches of grapes: There is no cluster to eat; and the best and fullest grapes are those that grow in large clusters. When we read of the devotion and charity, of the professors of religion in former ages, and see the reverse of this in the present age, we cannot but wish, with a sigh, O for primitive Christianity again! 2. That there were so many wicked people that did all the hurt they could: "They all lie in wait for blood, and hunt every man his brother. They act as if mankind were in a state of war, and force were the only right. They are as beasts of prey to their neighbours, for they all lie in wait for blood as lions for their prey." 3. That the magistrates, who by their office ought to have been the patrons and protectors of right, were the practisers and promoters of wrong: That they may do evil with both hands earnestly, the prince asketh, and the judge asketh for a reward, for a bribe, with which they will be hired for carrying on any wicked design with both hands. So they wrap it up; they make it intricate (so some understand it), that they may lose equity in a mist, and so make the cause turn which way they please. A sad character is given of them (v. 4), the best of them is as a brier, and the most upright is sharper than a thorn-hedge. And, when things have come to this pass, the day of thy watchmen comes, that is, the day of thy visitation, when God will reckon with thee for all this wickedness, which is called the day of the watchmen, because their prophets, whom God set as watchmen over them, had often warned them of that day. 4. That there was no faith in man; people had grown universally treacherous, v. 5. "Those that have any sense of honour remaining in them, have a firm regard to the laws of friendship; they would not discover what passed in private conversation, nor divulge secrets, to the prejudice of a friend. But those things are now made a jest of. Wise men take it for a rule, Trust you not in a friend, for you will find him false. As for him that undertakes to be your guide in any business which he professes to understand better than you, you cannot put a confidence in him, for he will mislead you if he can get anything by it." Some by a guide understand a husband, who is called the guide of thy youth; and that agrees with what follows, "Keep the doors of thy lips from her that lieth in thy bosom, from thy own wife; take heed what thou sayest before her, lest she betray thee. 5. That children were abusive to their parents, v. 6. It is sad when a man's betrayers and worst enemies are his own children and his best friends.

The prophet, having sadly complained of the wickedness of the times, fastens upon some considerations for comfort. The case is bad, but it is not desperate.

1. "Though God be now displeased he shall be reconciled to us, and then all will be well," v. 7, 9. At such a time, 1. We must have recourse to God under our troubles (v. 7): Therefore I will look unto the Lord. All may look bright above him when all looks dark about him. The prophet had been complaining that there was no confidence to be put in friends and relations, and this drives him to his God: Therefore I will look unto the Lord. 2. We must submit to the will of God in our troubles: "I will bear the indignation of the Lord patiently, without murmuring and repining, because I have sinned against him." When we complain to God of the badness of the times we ought to complain against ourselves for the badness of our own hearts. 3. We must depend upon God to work deliverance for us. When things are brought to the last extremity: My God will hear me; if the Lord be our God, he will hear our prayers, and grant an answer of peace to them. "When I sit in darkness, disconsolate and perplexed, then the Lord shall be a light to me, as a light to my eyes, a light to my feet, a light in a dark place." He will plead my cause, and execute judgment for me, v. 9. "He will bring me forth to the light. The morning of comfort shall shine forth out of the long and dark night of trouble. I shall behold his righteousness; the performance of his promises to me."

II. Though enemies triumph, they shall be put to shame, v. 8, 10. The enemies of God's people said, Where is the Lord their God? As if because they were afflicted God had forsaken them, and they knew not where to find him with their prayers, and he knew not how to help them with his favours. The people of God by faith bear up under these insults (v. 8): "Rejoice not against me, O my enemy! I am now down, but shall not be always so, and when my God appears for me then she that is my enemy shall see it, and be ashamed." The deliverance of the church will be the confusion of her enemies.

III. Though the land continue a great while desolate, yet it shall at length be replenished again. Its salvation shall not come till after it has been desolate; so the margin reads it, v. 13. It must lie long under his rebukes, because of those that dwell therein. For this they must expect to smart a great while. When it does come it shall be a complete salvation; and it seems to refer to their deliverance out of Babylon by Cyrus. The decree shall be far removed. God's decree concerning their captivity, and Nebuchadnezzar's decree, his resolution never to release them shall be set aside. Jerusalem and the cities of Judah shall be again reared: Then thy walls shall be built. All that belong to the land of Israel, whithersoever dispersed, far and wide, shall come flocking to it again (v. 12): He shall come even to thee. They shall come from all the remote parts, from sea to sea and from mountain to mountain, not turning back till they come to Zion.

I. The prophet's prayer to God to take care of his own people, v. 14. When we see God coming towards us in ways of mercy, we must go forth to meet him by prayer. It is a prophetic prayer, which amounts to a promise of the good prayed for; what God directed his prophet to ask no doubt he designed to give. The people of Israel are here called the flock of God's heritage. This flock dwells solitarily in the wood, or forest, in the midst of Carmel, a high mountain. Israel was a peculiar people, that dwelt alone, like a flock of sheep in a wood. They were now a desolate people (v. 13), in the land of their captivity as sheep in a forest, in danger from the beasts of the forest. He prays that God would feed them there with his rod, that is, that he would take care of them in their captivity, and do the part of a good shepherd to them. "Let them be governed by thy rod, not the rod of their enemies, for they are thy people." He prays that God would in due time bring them back to feed in the plains of Bashan and Gilead. Let them feed in their own country again, as in the days of old. Some apply this spiritually, and make it either the prophet's prayer to Christ or his Father's charge to him, to take care of his church, as the great Shepherd of the sheep.

II. God's promise, in answer to this prayer. God answers that he will show them marvellous things (v. 15), will out-do their hopes and expectations. He will do that which shall be the repetition of the wonders and miracles of former ages—according to the days of thy coming out of the land of Egypt. He will do that for them which shall be matter of amazement to the present age, v. 16, 17. The nations about shall take notice of it. They shall be confounded at all the might with which the captives shall now exert themselves, whom they thought for ever disabled. They shall now lay their hands upon their mouths, as being ashamed of what they have said. They shall stop their ears, not willing to hear any more of God's wonders wrought for people, whom they had so despised. Those that had impudently confronted God himself shall now be brought, in profession at least, to submit to him (v. 17): They shall lick the dust like a serpent, as if they were sentenced to the same curse the serpent was laid under (Gen. iii. 14).

III. The prophet's thankful acknowledgment of God's mercy, v. 18–20. Pardoning mercy was at the bottom of it. As it was their sin that brought them into bondage, so it was God's pardoning their sin that brought them out of it; Ps. lxxxv. 1, 2, and Isa. xxxiii. 24; xxxviii. 17; xl. 1, 2. This the prophet stands amazed at, while the surrounding nations stood amazed only at those deliverances which were but the fruits of this. The reasons why God pardons sin, and keeps not his anger for ever, are all taken from within himself; it is because he delights in mercy, and the salvation of sinners is what he has pleasure in, not their death and damnation. There is no God like unto him; no magistrate forgives as God does. In this his thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours; in this he is God, and not man. His mercy endures for ever, and therefore as he has shown mercy so he will, v. 19, 20. He will renew us, to prepare and qualify us for his favour: He will subdue our iniquities; when he takes away the guilt of sin, that it may not damn us, he will break the power of sin, that it may not have dominion over us. Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depth of the sea, as when he brought them out of Egypt he subdued Pharaoh and the Egyptians, and cast them into the depth of the sea. It intimates that when God forgives sin he remembers it no more. He casts them into the sea, not near the shore-side, where they may appear again next low water, but into the depth of the sea, never to rise again. All their sins shall be cast there without exception, for when God forgives sin he forgives all. He with this good work will do all that our case requires and which he has promised (v. 20).

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROPHECY OF NAHUM

The name of this prophet signifies a comforter; for it was a charge given to all the prophets, Comfort you, comfort you, my people; and even this prophet, though wholly taken up in foretelling the destruction of Nineveh, is, even in that, comforter to the ten tribes of Israel, who, it is probable, were lately carried captives into Assyria. It is uncertain, but probable that he lived in the time of Hezekiah, and prophesied against Nineveh, after the captivity of Israel by the king of Assyria, which was in the ninth year of Hezekiah, and before Sennacherib's invading Judah, which was in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, for to that attempt, and the defeat of it, it is supposed, the first chapter has reference. It is the conjecture of Huetius that the two other chapters of this book were delivered by Nahum some years after, perhaps in the reign of Manasseh, and in that reign the Jewish chronologies generally place him, some time before the captivity of Judah.

CHAP. I

I. The inscription of the book, ver. 1. II. A magnificent display of the glory of God, in wrath and justice against the wicked, and mercy and grace towards his people, and the discovery of his majesty and power in both, ver. 2–8. III. A particular application of this (as some interpreters think) to the destruction of Sennacherib and the Assyrian army, when they besieged Jerusalem, ver. 9–16.

Verse 1

Nineveh was the place concerned, and the Assyrian monarchy had the royal seat there. Jonah had, in God's name, foretold the speedy overthrow of this great city; but then the Ninevites repented and were spared. The Ninevites then saw clearly how to turn from their evil way; it was the saving of their city; and yet, soon after, they returned to it again; it became worse than ever. Then God sent them this prophecy, to read them their doom, which was now irreversible. It is the book of the vision of Nahum the Elkoshite. The burden of Nineveh was what the prophet plainly foresaw, for it was his vision. When he was gone, the event might be compared with the prediction. All the account we have of the prophet himself is that he was an Elkoshite, of the town called Elkes, which, Jerome says, was in Galilee.

Verses 2–8

Nineveh knows not God, and therefore is here told what a God he is. This glorious description of the Sovereign of the world, like the pillar of cloud and fire, has a bright side towards Israel and a dark side towards the Egyptians.

I. He is a God of inflexible justice; let Nineveh know this, and tremble before him. Their idols are insignificant things; there is nothing formidable in them. But the God of Israel is greatly to be feared. He resents the indignities done him by those that deny his being or any of his perfections, that set up other gods in competition with him, that destroy his laws, ridicule his word, or are abusive to his people. Let such know that Jehovah is jealous for his own honour in the matters of his worship, and will not endure a rival; he is jealous for the comfort of his worshippers, jealous for his land (Joel ii. 18), and will not have that injured. He has fury (so the word is) not as man has it, in whom it is an ungoverned passion, but he has it in such a way as becomes the righteous God. He is Lord of anger (so the Hebrew phrase is for that which we read, he is furious); he has anger, but he has it at command and under government. Our anger is often lord over us, as theirs that have no rule over their own spirits, but God is always Lord of his anger and weighs a path to it, Ps. lxxviii. 50. Whoever are his adversaries and enemies among men, he will make them feel his resentments in the day of wrath. He will not at all acquit the wicked that sin, and stand to it, and do not repent, v. 3. This revelation of the wrath of God against his enemies is applied to Nineveh (v. 8), and should be applied by all those who go on still in their trespasses: With an over-running flood he will make an utter end of the place thereof. Darkness shall pursue his enemies; terror and trouble shall follow them, whithersoever they go; if they think to flee from the darkness which pursues them they will but fall into that which is before them.

II. He is a God of irresistible power. If we look up into the regions of the air, there we shall find proofs of his power, for he has his ways in the whirlwind and the storm. He spoke to Job out of the whirlwind, and even stormy winds fulfil his word. If we cast our eye upon the great deeps, we find that the sea is his, for, when he pleases, he rebukes the sea and makes it dry, drying up all the rivers. If we look round on this earth, we find proofs of his power, when, either by the extreme heat and drought of summer or the cold and frost of winter, Bashan languishes, and Carmel, and the flower of Lebanon languishes. Earthquakes shake the mountains (v. 5), melt the hills, and level them with the plains. When he pleases the earth is burnt at his presence by the scorching heat of the sun. If God be an almighty God, we may thence infer (v. 6), Who can stand before his indignation? The Ninevites had once found God slow to anger (v. 3), and perhaps presumed upon the mercy they had then experienced. It is in vain for the stoutest and strongest of sinners to think to make their part good against the power of God's anger. God's anger is so fierce that it beats down all before it: The rocks are thrown down on him. The eruption of subterraneous fires is a faint resemblance of the fierceness of God's anger against sinners whose hearts are rocky. Sinners as stubble before the fire, the wrath of God. Who can abide in the fierceness of his anger? Some of the effects of God's displeasure in this world a man may bear up under, but the fierceness of his anger, when it fastens immediately upon the soul, who can bear? Let us fear before him; let us stand in awe, and not sin.

III. He is a God of infinite mercy. Let the sinners in Zion be afraid, that go on still in their transgressions, but let not those that trust in God tremble before him. He is slow to anger (v. 3), ready to show mercy.

When the tokens of his rage against the wicked are abroad he takes care of his own people (v. 7): The Lord is good to those that are good, and to them he will be a stronghold in the day of trouble.

Verses 9–15

These verses seem to point at the destruction of the army of the Assyrians under Sennacherib, which may well be reckoned a part of the burden of Nineveh, the head city of the Assyrian empire, and a pledge of the destruction of Nineveh itself about 100 years after.

I. The great provocation which the Assyrians gave to God, the just and jealous God, for which, though slow to anger, he would take vengeance (v. 11): There is one come out of thee, that imagines evil against the Lord—Sennacherib, and his spokesman Rabshakeh. They framed an evil letter and an evil speech, not only against Hezekiah and his people, but against God himself, as level with the gods of the heathen, and unable to protect his worshippers, urging his people to put themselves under the protection of the great king, the king of Assyria. To this evil counsel he says (v. 9): "What do you imagine against the Lord? What a foolish wicked thing it is for you to plot against God, as if you could outwit divine wisdom and overpower omnipotence itself!"

II. The great destruction which God would bring upon them for it, not immediately upon the whole monarchy (the ruin of that was deferred) but,

1. Upon the army; God will make an utter end of that; it shall be totally cut off and ruined at one blow. They have laid themselves open to divine wrath by their own act and deed, v. 10. They are as thorns that entangle one another, and are folded together. They make one another worse. God will do with them as the husbandmen does with a bush of thorns when he cannot part them: he puts them all into the fire together. They are as drunken men, intoxicated with pride and rage; and such as they shall be destroyed. They shall be devoured as stubble fully dry, which is irresistibly and irrecoverably consumed by the flame. This great army (v. 12), though they be quiet and likewise many, very secure, because they are numerous, yet shall they be cut down, as grass and corn when he shall pass through.

2. Upon the king. He imagined evil against the Lord, and shall he escape? (v. 14): "The Lord has given a commandment concerning thee; the decree has gone forth, that thy name be no more sown, that thy memory perish." The images he worshipped should be cut off from their temple, which, some think, was fulfilled when Sennacherib was slain by his two sons, as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god. The temple was looked upon as defiled, and was therefore disused, and the images were cut off. Sennacherib's grave shall be made there, some think in the house of his god; there he is slain, and there he shall be buried, for he is vile. Or it may be meant of the ignominious fall of the Assyrian monarchy itself, upon the ruins of which that of Babylon was raised.

III. The great deliverance which God would hereby work for his own people and the city that was called by his name. The siege shall be raised: "Now will I break his yoke from off thee, by which thou art kept in servitude, and will burst thy bonds asunder, by which thou seemest bound to the Assyrian's wrath." This was a figure of the great salvation, by which the Jerusalem that is above is made free. The enemy shall be so weakened and dispirited that they shall never make any such attempt again. The enemy shall not dare again to attack Jerusalem (v. 15): The wicked shall no more pass through thee as they have done, to lay all waste. His army is cut off, his spirit cut off, and at length he himself is cut off. The tidings of this great deliverance will be welcomed throughout the kingdom, v. 15. While Sennacherib prevailed, and carried all before him, every day brought bad news; but now, behold, upon the mountains, the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, the feet of the evangelist; he is seen coming at a distance upon the mountains, as fast as his feet will carry him; and how pleasant a sight is it once more to see a messenger of peace, after we have received so many of Job's messengers! These words are also quoted by the apostle, both from Isaiah and Nahum, and applied to the great redemption wrought for us by our Lord Jesus, and the publishing of it to the world by the everlasting gospel, Rom. x. 15. Christ's ministers are those messengers of good tidings, that preach peace by Jesus Christ. During the trouble ordinary feasts had been intermitted. While Jerusalem was encompassed with armies they could not go thither to worship; but now they must return to the observance of their feasts. Now that the deliverance is wrought they are called upon to perform their vows.

CHAP. II

Nineveh, that great city took not warning by the destruction of her armies and the fall of her king, and therefore may expect, since she persists in her enmity to God, that he will proceed in his controversy with her. Here is foretold, I. The approach of the enemy that should destroy Nineveh, ver. 1–5. II. The taking of the city, ver. 6. III. The captivity of the queen, the flight of the inhabitants, the seizing of all its wealth, ver. 7–10. IV. Its true causes—their sinning against God and God's appearing against them, ver. 11–13. This was fulfilled when Nebuchadnezzar, in the first year of his reign, in conjunction with Cyaxares, or Ahasuerus, king of the Medes, conquered Nineveh, and made himself master of the Assyrian monarchy.

Verses 1–10

I. An alarm of war went to Nineveh, v. 1. The prophet speaks of it as just at hand: "Look about thee, and see, he that dashes in pieces has come up before thy face. Nebuchadnezzar is noted for dashing nations in pieces, and will disperse thee." The attempt of Nebuchadnezzar upon Nineveh is bold, and daring: "He has come up before thy face, avowing his design to ruin thee; therefore stand to thy arms, O Nineveh! keep the munition; secure thy towers and magazines: watch the way; set guards upon all the avenues to the city; make thy loins strong; encourage thy soldiers; animate thyself and them; fortify thy power mightily" (this is spoken ironically); "do the utmost thou canst, yet there is no counsel or strength against the Lord."

II. The causes of the war (v. 2): The Lord has turned away the excellency of Jacob, as the excellency of Israel. The Assyrians have been abusive to Jacob, the two tribes as well as to Israel, the ten tribes, have emptied them, and marred their vine-branches. For this God will reckon with them; though done long since. Or, It may mean God is now by Nebuchadnezzar about to turn away the pride of Jacob by the captivity of the two tribes, as he did the pride of Israel by their captivity. The enemy that is to do it must begin with Nineveh. God is looking upon proud cities, and abasing them. Samaria is humbled, and Jerusalem is to be humbled, and shall not Nineveh, that proud city, he brought down too? Emptiers have emptied the cities, and marred the vine-branches in the country of Jacob and Israel.

III. A particular account given of the terrors wherein the invading enemy shall appear against Nineveh. 1. The shields of his mighty men are made red as if they were already tinctured with the blood they had shed. 2. The valiant men are in scarlet; rich clothes, to intimate the wealth of the army. 3. The chariots shall be with flaming torches in the day of his preparation; the wheels shall strike fire upon the stones. Or they carried flaming torches with them in the open chariots, when they made their approach in the night, to be both a guide to themselves to set all on fire wherever they went. 4. The fir-trees shall be terribly shaken; the great men of Nineveh, that overtop their neighbours, as the stately firs do the shrubs; or the standing trees shall be made to shake by the concussions which that great army shall cause. 5. The chariots of war shall be very terrible (v. 4): They shall rage in the streets, that is, those that drive them shall rage. Even in the broad ways, where, one would think, there should be room enough, they shall jostle one another; and these iron chariots shall be made so bright that in the beams of the sun shall they seem like torches in the night. Nebuchadnezzar's commanders are here called his worthies, his gallants (so the margin reads it). His worthies shall remember (so some read it); they shall be mindful of duty, and the charge they have received, and be so intent upon their business that they shall stumble in their walks, for they shall make haste to the wall thereof, and the defence, or the covered way, shall be prepared (something to shelter them from the darts of the besieged), and they shall carry on the siege, and with so much vigour, that the gates of the rivers shall be opened (v. 6); those gates of Nineveh which open upon the river Tigris (on which Nineveh was built) shall be first forced by the enemy, and by those gates they shall enter. And then the palace shall be dissolved, either the king's house or the house of Nisroch his god; the same word signifies both a palace and a temple.

IV. A prediction of the consequences of this. 1. The queen shall fall into the hands of the enemy (v. 7): Huzzub shall be led away captive; she that was established (so some read it), thought herself safe because she was concealed, shall be discovered (so the margin reads it) and shall be led away captive, in disgrace. She shall be brought up in a mock state, and her maids of honour shall lead her, because she is weak and faint. They shall be tabering upon their breasts, beating their own breasts in grief, as if they were drumming upon them, for so the word signifies. 2. The inhabitants, shall none of them be able to stand their ground (v. 8): Nineveh is of old like a pool of water, replenished with people as a pool with water. It was long ago a populous city; in Jonah's time there were 120,000 little children in it (Jonah iv. 11). Their commanders shall cry, "Stand, stand, have a good heart on it, and we shall do well enough." They shall not have the least spark of courage remaining. They shall not so much as look back to see who calls for them. 3. The wealth of the city shall become a prey, and all its rich furniture shall fall into the hands of the victorious enemy (v. 9). Thus this rich city is empty, and void, and waste, v. 10. 4. The soldiers and people shall have no heart to appear for the defence of the city. Much pain shall be in all loins, as is the case in extreme frights, so that they shall not be able to hold up their backs. And the faces of them all shall gather blackness, like that of a pot that is every day over the fire; so the word signifies.

Nineveh's ruin, 1. Its neighbours now remember against it all the oppressions it had been guilty of in its pomp and prosperity (v. 11, 12): Where is the dwelling of the lions? Where is the feeding place of the young lions, where they glutted themselves with prey? The princes of Nineveh had been as lions, beasts of prey. Though nobody loved them, everybody feared them, and that was all they desired. The king made it his business, by violence and extortion to enrich himself and raise his family; he did tear in pieces enough for his whelps and he strangled for his lionesses. 2. It is avowed by the righteous Judge (v. 13): Behold, I am against thee, saith the Lord of hosts. The oppressors in Nineveh thought they only set their neighbours against them, but they set God against them, who is the asserter of right and the avenger of wrong. These military preparations will stand them in no stead: I will burn their chariots in the smoke; he does not say in the fire, but, in contempt of them, the very smoke of God's indignation shall serve to burn their chariots. Their children the hopes of their families, shall be cut off: The sword shall devour the young lions. The wealth they have heaped up by fraud and violence shall not be enjoyed by them: thou shalt not be the better for it and no one else shall. The voice of thy messengers shall no more be heard, no more be heeded, which some think refers to Rabshakeh.

CHAP. III

1. The sins of that great city are charged upon it, murder (ver. 1), whoredom and witchcraft (ver. 4), and a general extent of wickedness, ver. 19. II. Judgments are here threatened against it, blood for blood (ver. 2, 3), and shame for shameful sins, ver. 5–7. III. Instances are given of like desolations brought upon other places for like sins, ver. 8–11. IV. The overthrow of all those things which they depended upon, is foretold, ver. 12–19.

Verses 1–7

I. Nineveh arraigned and indicted. 1. It is a city of blood. 2. It is all full of lies; truth is banished from among them; there is no such thing as honesty. 3. It is all full of robbery and rapine. 4. There is a multitude of whoredoms in it, that is, idolatries, spiritual whoredoms. 5. She is a mistress of witchcrafts, and by them she sells families, v. 4. That which Nineveh aimed at was a universal monarchy, to be the metropolis of the world, compelling some, deluding others, into subjection to her, and wheedling them as a harlot by her charms. These were her witchcrafts, with which she unaccountably gained dominion.

II. Nineveh condemned to ruin upon this indictment, v. 1.

1. Nineveh had with her cruelties been a terror and destruction to others, and therefore destruction and terror shall be brought upon her. Hear the alarm with which Nineveh shall be terrified, v. 2. It is a formidable army that advances against it; you may hear them at a distance, the noise of the whip, the rattling of the wheels, the prancing horses, and the jumping chariots; the very noise is frightful. Nineveh shall be laid waste (v. 3), the sword drawn, the bright sword lifted up and the glittering spear, the dazzling brightness of which is terrible. See what havoc these make when they are commissioned to slay! The destruction of Sennacherib's army, which, in the morning, were all dead corpses, is perhaps looked upon here as a figure of the like destruction that should afterwards be in Nineveh.

2. Nineveh had drawn others to shameful wickedness, and therefore God will load her with contempt (v. 5–7): The Lord of hosts is against her. When it shall be seen that while she courted her neighbours it was with design to ruin their liberty and property, then her shame is discovered to the nations. When her proud pretensions are baffled, then to see the nakedness of the land do they come, and it appears ridiculous. Then do they cast abominable filth upon her, as upon a carted strumpet, and make her vile. Those that formerly looked upon her in hopes of protection from her, now look upon her and flee from her, for fear of being ruined with her. When Nineveh is laid waste who will bemoan her? Those that showed no pity in the day of their power can expect to find no pity in the day of their fall.

I. Nineveh shall fall unpitied and uncomforted and she shall not be able to help herself: Art thou better than populous No? v. 8. He quotes precedents. The city mentioned is No, a great city in the land of Egypt (Jer. xlvi. 25), No-Ammon, so some read it. Some think it was Diospolis, others Alexandria. As God said to Jerusalem, Go, see what I did to Shiloh (Jer. vii. 12), so to Nineveh, Go, see what I did to populous No. Now, concerning No, 1. How firm her standing, v. 8. She was fortified both by nature and art, was situate among the rivers. Nile watered her fields, guarded her wall. Her rampart was the sea, the lake of Mareotis. It was also supported by alliances abroad, v. 9. Ethiopia, or Arabia, was her strength, either by trade or by forces furnished for military service. The whole country of Egypt contributed to this populous city; so that it was infinite, and there was no end of it (so it might be rendered); she set no bounds to her ambition and knew no end of her wealth and strength; but it is God's prerogative to be infinite. Put and Lubim were thy helpers, two neighbouring countries of Africa, Mauritania and Libya, that is, Libya Cyrenica. 2. How fatal her fall proved to be (v. 10): Yet was she carried away, and her strength failed her; even she that was so strong, so secure, yet went into captivity. Her young children were dashed in pieces at the top of all the streets by the merciless conquerors. They cast lots for her honourable men that were made prisoners of war, to be slaves. What a mortification was this to populous No. Hence he infers against Nineveh (v. 11), "Thou also shalt be intoxicated, drunk with the cup of the Lord's fury, that shall be put into thy hand" (see Jer. xxv. 17, 27). Thou shalt fall and rise no more.

II. He shows them that all those things in which they reposed confidence should fail them. 1. Did the men of Nineveh trust to their own bravery? Their hearts should sink and fail them. They shall be hid, shall abscond for shame. They shall seek strength, shall come sneaking to their neighbours to beg assistance. 2. Did they depend upon the garrisons and strongholds they had? Those shall prove but paper-walls, and like the first-ripe figs, which, if you give the tree but a little shake, will fall into the mouth of the eater that gapes for them, v. 12. They make their strongholds as strong as possible, and are challenged to do their utmost to make them tenable against the invader (v. 14): Draw thee water for the siege; it is put here for all manner of provision, with which Nineveh is ironically told to furnish herself, in expectation of a siege. "Go into clay, and tread the mortar, and make strong the brick-kiln; take all the pains thou canst in erecting new fortifications; but it shall be all in vain, for (v. 15) there shall the fire devour thee if the stronghold be burnt, or the sword cut thee off if it be taken by storm." 3. Did they put confidence in the multitude of their inhabitants? They shall but sink the sooner under the weight of their own numbers (v. 13): Thy people in the midst of thee are women; they shall be fickle, and fainthearted in danger and distress; adding to their fears by the power of their own imagination. Though they make themselves many (v. 15), as the cankerworm and as the locust, that come in vast swarms, though thou hast multiplied thy merchants above the stars of heaven, though thy exchange be thronged with wealthy traders, yet their hearts shall fail them too; though they be numerous as caterpillars, yet the fire and sword shall eat them up irresistibly as the canker-worm, v. 15. He adds (v. 16), The canker-worm spoils, or spreads herself, and flies away. Both the merchants and the enemies were compared to canker-worms. The enemies shall spoil Nineveh, and carry away the spoil without opposition. Or the rich merchants, who have come from abroad to settle in Nineveh, when they see the country invaded and the city likely to be besieged, will remove to some other place, will spread their wings and fly away where they may be safe. 4. Did they put a confidence in the strength of their gates and bars? (v. 13). The gates of thy land shall be set wide open unto thy enemies, the gates of thy rivers (ch. ii. 6), the flood-gates, or the passes. The fire shall devour thy bars, and they shall fly open. 5. Did they put a confidence in their king and princes? They should do them no service (v. 17): Thy crowned heads are as the locusts; those that had pomp and power, as crowned heads, were enfeebled. "Thy captains, that should lead thy forces look great, but they are as the great grasshoppers, they are but grasshoppers, worthless things, that can do no service. They encamp in the hedges, in the cold day, the cold weather, but, when the sun arises, they flee away, nobody knows whither. So these mercenary soldiers, when any trouble arises, flee away, and shift for their own safety. The hireling flees, because he is a hireling." The king of Assyria is told that his shepherds slumber; they have no spirit to appear for the flock. The nobles shall dwell in the dust, and be buried in silence. 6. Did they hope that they should yet rally? In this also they should be disappointed; for, when the shepherds are smitten, the sheep are scattered; the people are dispersed upon the mountains and no man gathers them. The judgment they are under is as a wound, and it is incurable; thy case is desperate (v. 19) and thy neighbours shall clap their hands over thee, and triumph in thy fall. Upon whom has not thy wickedness passed continually? Thou hast been always doing mischief to those about thee; and therefore they shall be far from pitying thee. The troublers shall be troubled will be the burden of many, as it is here the burden of Nineveh.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROPHECY OF HABAKKUK

It is a foolish fancy of some of the Jewish rabbin that this prophet was the son of the Shunamite woman that was miraculously raised to life, by Elisha (2 Kings iv), as they say also that the prophet Jonah was the son of the widow of Zaraphath. It is a more probable conjecture that he lived and prophesied in the reign of king Manasseh, when wickedness abounded, and destruction was hastening on, destruction by the Chaldeans, whom this prophet mentions as the instruments of God's judgments; and Manasseh was himself carried to Babylon, as an earnest of what should come afterwards. In the apocryphal story of Bel and the Dragon mention is made of Habakkuk the prophet in the land of Judah, who was carried thence by an angel to Babylon, to feed Daniel in the den; those who give credit to that story take pains to reconcile our prophet's living before the captivity, and foretelling it, with that. And some have imagined that Habakkuk's feeding Daniel in the den is to be understood mystically, that Daniel then lived by faith, as Habakkuk had said the just should do; he was fed by that word, Hab. ii. 4. The prophecy of this book is a mixture of the prophet's addresses to God in the people's name and to the people in God's name; for it is the office of the prophet to carry messages both ways. It is the intercourse and communion between a gracious God and a gracious soul. The whole refers particularly to the invasion of the land of Judah by the Chaldeans.

CHAP. I

I. The prophet complains to God of the violence done by the abuse of justice among his own people and the hardships thereby put upon many good people, ver. 1–4. II. God by him foretells the punishment of that abuse of power by the sword of war, and the desolations which the army of the Chaldeans should make, ver. 5–11. III. Then the prophet is grieved that the Chaldeans prevail so far (ver. 12–17), so that he scarcely knows which is more to be lamented, the sin or the punishment of it, for in both many good people are great sufferers. It is well that there is a day of judgment, and a future state, before us, so the present seeming disorders of Providence shall be set to rights.

Verses 1–4

The penman was a prophet, a man divinely inspired and commissioned, and the book itself is the burden which he saw; he was as sure of the truth of it as if he had seen it with his bodily eyes already accomplished. The prophet sadly laments the iniquity of the times. The land was full of violence, as the old world was, Gen. vi. 11. The prophet cries out of violence (v. 2), iniquity and grievance, spoil and violence. It does not appear that the prophet himself had any great wrong done him (in losing times it fared best with those that had nothing to lose), but it grieved him to see other people wronged. He complains (v. 4) that the wicked doth compass about the righteous. One honest man, one honest cause, shall have enemies besetting it on every side. The kingdom was broken into parties and factions that were continually biting and devouring one another. There are that raise up strife and contention (v. 3), that foment divisions, and sow discord among brethren. And, if blessed are the peace-makers, cursed are such peace-breakers. The torrent of violence and strife ran so strongly as to bid defiance to laws and the administration of justice, v. 4. Because God did not appear against them, nobody else would; therefore the law is slacked, is silent; its pulse beats not (so, it is said, the word signifies); and judgment does not go forth. He complained of this to God, but could not obtain a redress of those grievances: "Lord," says he, "why dost thou show me iniquity? Why hast thou cast my lot in a time and place when and where it is to be seen?" When God seems to connive at the wickedness of the wicked, and to countenance it, by suffering them to prosper in their wickedness, it shocks the faith of good men. God has reasons for the reprieves of bad men and the rebukes of good men; and therefore we must believe the day will come when the cry of sin will be heard against those that do wrong and the cry of prayer for those that suffer it.

Verses 5–11

An answer to the prophet's complaint. Though God bore long, he would not bear always with this provoking people.

I. The preamble to the sentence (v. 5): Behold, you among the heathen, and regard. Since they will not be brought to repentance by the long-suffering of God, he will inflict upon them, 1. A public punishment, at which the neighbouring nations shall stand amazed, see Deut. xxix. 24, 25. Israel will be made a spectacle to the world. 2. An amazing punishment, so strange that it shall not be credited even by those that were eye-witnesses of it when it comes: You will not believe it; though it be told you. The punishment of God's professing people cannot but be the astonishment of all about them. 3. A speedy punishment: "I will work a work in your days, now quickly; this generation shall not pass till the judgment threatened be accomplished." 4. It shall be a punishment in which the hand of God shall appear. This is the Lord's doing. 5. It shall be such a punishment as will typify the destruction to be brought upon the despisers of Christ and his gospel. The ruin of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans for their idolatry was a figure of their ruin by the Romans for rejecting Christ and his gospel.

II. The sentence itself is dreadful and particular (v. 6): Lo, I raise up the Chaldeans. When God's professing people quarrel among themselves, snarl, and devour one another, it is just with God to bring the common enemy upon them, that shall make peace by making a devastation. The contending parties in Jerusalem were divided one against another, when the Romans came and took away their place and nation.

1. The people that shall be raised up against Israel, to be a scourge to them, are a bitter and hasty nation, cruel and fierce. They show no mercy and they spare no pains. They are terrible and dreadful, famed for the troops they bring into the field (v. 8); their horses are swifter than leopards, more fierce than the evening wolves; and wolves are observed to be the most ravenous towards the evening, waiting for darkness under which all beasts of the forest creep forth, Ps. civ. 20. "Their horsemen shall spread themselves a great way, for they shall come from far, from all parts of their own country. Their own will is a law to them, and they will not be governed by any laws of humanity, equity, or honour: Their judgment and their dignity shall proceed of themselves," v. 7. Appetite and passion rule them, and not reason nor conscience.

2. A prophecy of the terrible execution that shall be made by this nation: They shall march through the breadth of the earth. The Chaldean forces subdued all the nations in those parts, so that they seemed to have conquered the world. Or, through the breadth of the land of Israel, which was wholly laid waste by them. Their faces shall sup up as the east wind; their very countenances shall be so fierce and frightful that a look will serve to make them masters of all they have a mind to; so that they shall swallow up all, as the east wind nips and blasts the buds and flowers. They shall take a vast number of prisoners, and send them into Babylon: They shall gather the captivity as the sand for multitude. They shall scoff (he shall, so it is in the original, meaning Nebuchadnezzar, who, being puffed up with his successes, shall scoff) at the kings and commanders, and the princes shall be a scorn to them. He shall deride every stronghold, for to him it shall be weak, and he shall heap dust, and take it; a little soil, thrown up for ramparts, shall serve to give him all the advantage that he can desire; he shall make a sport of taking them. By all this he shall be puffed up with an intolerable pride, which shall be his destruction (v. 11): Then shall his mind change for the worse. Bel and Nebo were the gods of the Chaldeans, and to them they gave the glory of their successes; they were hardened in their idolatry, and blasphemously argued that because they had conquered Israel their gods were too strong for the God of Israel.

Verses 12–17

The prophet now turns to God, and again addresses him for the ease of his own mind under the burden which he saw. If he look about him, he sees nothing but violence done by Israel; if he look before him, he sees nothing but violence done against Israel. The prospect of the prevalence of the Chaldeans drives the prophet to his knees to plead with God concerning it.

I. The truths which he resolves to abide by, to comfort himself and his friends, under the threatening of the Chaldeans.

1. God is the Lord our God, and our Holy One. He is Jehovah, the fountain of all being, power, and perfection. Our rock is not as theirs. "He is my God." He speaks in the people's name; every Israelite may say, "He is mine. Though all this has come upon us, yet have we not forgotten the name of our God. We will not entertain any hard thoughts of him, nor of his service, for all this."

2. Our God is from everlasting. If he is from everlasting, he will be to everlasting, and we must have recourse to this first principle, when things seen, which are temporal, are discouraging, that we have hope and help sufficient in a God that is eternal. "Art thou not from of old, a God in covenant with thy people?" (so some understand it). "Art thou not the same God still? Thou art God, and changest not."

3. While the world stands God will have a church in it. The prophet infers the perpetuity of the church from the eternity of God; for Christ has said, Because I live, and therefore as long as I live, you shall live also, John xiv. 19. We shall not die.

3. It was God that gave the Chaldeans their power. He gave them their commission to take the spoil and to take the prey, Isa. x. 6. Herein God appears a mighty God, that the power of mighty men is derived from him, and is under his check; Hitherto shall it come, and no further. Those whom God ordains shall do no more than what God has ordained. And he has ordained them for judgment, and for correction. God's people need correction, and deserve it; but it is for their correction, to drive out the foolishness that is found in their hearts.

5. Though the wicked may prosper for a while, yet God is a holy God, and does not approve of that wickedness (v. 13): Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil. The prophet, observing how vicious the Chaldeans were, and yet what great success they had against God's Israel, found a temptation to say it was vain to serve God. But he suppresses the thought, by having recourse to his first principle, That God is not the author or patron of sin; he is of purer eyes than to behold it with approbation. There is in the nature of God an antipathy to those practices that are contrary to his holy law; and, though an expedient is happily found out for his being reconciled to sinners, yet he never will, nor can, be reconciled to sin. The mischief done to God's people by their persecutors; though God sees cause to permit it, yet he does not approve of it.

II. The grievances he finds hard to reconcile with these truths: "Since we are sure that thou art a holy God, Wherefore lookest thou upon the Chaldeans that deal treacherously with thy people and givest them success? Why dost thou suffer thy sworn enemies, to deal thus cruelly with thy sworn subjects, who desire to fear thy name? What shall we say to this?" This was a temptation to Job (ch. xxi. 7; xxiv. 1), to David (Ps. lxxiii. 2, 3), to Jeremiah, ch. xii. 1, 2. 1. That God permitted sin, and was patient with the sinners. 2. That his patience was abused, and because sentence against these evil works and workers was not executed speedily, therefore their hearts were the more fully set in them to do evil. They were false and deceitful. They hated and persecuted men because they were better than themselves, as Cain hated Abel because his own works were evil and his brother's righteous. They made no more of killing men than of catching fish. The prophet complains that, Providence having delivered up the weaker to be a prey to the stronger, they were, in effect, made as the fishes of the sea v. 14. So they had been among themselves, preying upon one another as the greater fishes do upon the less (v. 3). They were as the creeping things, or swimming things (for the word is used for fish, Gen. i. 20), that have no ruler over them. They are given up to the Chaldeans as fish to the fishermen. Those proud oppressors make no conscience of killing them, any more than men do of pulling fish out of the water. They have various ways of spoiling and destroying, as men have of taking fish. Some they take up with the angle (v. 15), one by one; others they catch in shoals, wholesale, in their net, and gather them in their drag, their enclosing net. Their portion is fat, and their meat plenteous. They live merrily (v. 15): Therefore they rejoice and are glad, because their wealth is great, and their projects succeed. They are great admirers of their own ingenuity: They sacrifice to their own net, and burn incense to their own drag.

III. The prophet, in the close, humbly expresses his hope that God will not suffer these destroyers of mankind always to go on and prosper thus (v. 17): "Shall they therefore empty their net? Shall they empty their net of what they have caught, that they may cast it into the sea again, to catch more? Must the numbers and wealth of nations be sacrificed to their net? Is not God the king of nations, and will he not assert their rights? Is he not jealous for his own honour, and will he not maintain that?" The prophet lodges the matter in God's hand, and leaves it with him, as the psalmist does. Ps. lxxiv. 22, Arise, O God! plead thy own cause.

CHAP. II

An answer expected by the prophet (ver. 1), and returned by the Spirit of God, to the complaints made of the violences and victories of the Chaldeans. The answer is, I. That after God has served his own purposes by the Chaldeans, has tried the faith and patience of his people, and distinguished between the hypocrites and the sincere, he will humble and bring down, not only that proud monarch Nebuchadnezzar, but that proud monarchy, ver. 2–8. II. That not they only, but all other sinners like them, should perish. 1. Those that are covetous, greedy of wealth and honours, ver. 9, 11. 2. Those that are oppressive, and raise estates by rapine, ver. 12–14. 3. Those that promote drunkenness that they may expose their neighbours to shame, ver. 15–17. 4. Those that worship idols, ver. 18–20.

Verses 1–4

I. The prophet humbly gives his attendance upon God (v. 1): "I will stand upon my watch, as a sentinel on the walls of a besieged city. I will look up, will look round, will look within, and watch to see what he will say unto me. I will watch to see what he will say in me" (so it may be read), "what the Spirit of prophecy in me will dictate to me, by way of answer to my complaints." God not only speaks to us by his word, but speaks in us by our own consciences, whispering to us, This is the way, walk in it. Those that expect to hear from God must withdraw from the world, and get above it, must raise their attention, fix their thought, study the scriptures, consult experiences and the experienced, continue instant in prayer, and thus set themselves upon the tower. 1. When we are perplexed with doubts concerning the methods of Providence, are tempted to think that it is fate, and not a wise God, that governs the world, then we must set ourselves upon the tower, to see if we can discover that which will silence the temptation and solve the difficulties, must go into the sanctuary of God, and there labour to understand the end of these things. 2. When we have been at prayer, pouring out our complaints and requests before God, we must carefully observe what answers God gives by his word, his Spirit, and his providences.

II. The prophet had complained of the prevalence of the Chaldeans; now, to pacify him concerning it, he here gives him a prospect of their fall and ruin, as Isaiah, before this, when he had foretold the captivity in Babylon, foretold also the destruction of Babylon.

1. The prophet must write the vision, v. 2. We have reason to bless God for written visions, that God has written to us the great things of his prophets as well as of his law. He must write the vision, and make it plain upon tables, must write it legibly, in large characters, so that he who runs may read it. God himself has prefixed his imprimatur to them; he has said, Make them plain.

2. The people must wait for the accomplishment of the vision (v. 3): "The vision is yet for an appointed time to come. You shall now be told of your deliverance by the breaking of the Chaldeans' power, and that the time of it is fixed in the counsel and decree of God." God has an appointed time for his appointed work, and will be sure to do the work when the time comes; it is not for us to anticipate his appointments, but to wait his time.

3. This vision will be such an exercise of faith and patience as will try and discover men what they are, v. 4. There are some who will proudly disdain this vision; they think their own hands sufficient for them, and God's promise is to them an insignificant thing. Those who are truly good, and whose hearts are upright with God, will value the promise, and venture their all upon it; and will keep close to God and duty in the most difficult trying times, and live comfortably in communion with God, dependence on him, and expectation of him.

The prophet having had orders to write the vision, the vision itself reads the doom, some think, of Nebuchadnezzar, who was principally active in the destruction of Jerusalem, or of all such proud and oppressive powers as bear hard, especially upon God's people.

I. The charge laid down against this enemy, v. 5. The lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eye, and the pride of life, are snares; and we find him that led Israel captive, himself led captive by each of these. 1. He is sensual and voluptuous, and given to his pleasures: He transgresses by wine. Drunkenness is the cause of abundance of transgression. 2. He is haughty and imperious: He is a proud man, and his pride is a certain presage of his fall. When a man is drunk, though he makes himself as a beast, yet he thinks himself as great as a king, and prides himself in that by which he shames himself, Isa. xxviii. 1. 3. He is covetous and greedy of wealth, and this is the effect of his pride. The Chaldean monarchy aimed to be a universal one. He keeps not at home, is not content with his own, but thinks it too little. His ambition is his perpetual uneasiness. Though the home be a palace, yet to a discontented mind it is a prison. He enlarges his desire as hell, or the grave, which daily receives, and yet still cries, Give, give. And it is just with God that the desires which are insatiable should still be unsatisfied.

II. The sentence passed upon him (v. 6): Shall not all these take up a parable against him?

1. Since pride has been his sin, disgrace and dishonour shall be his punishment, and he shall be laughed at and despised by all about him.

2. Since he has been abusive to his neighbours, those very persons whom he has abused shall be the instruments of his disgrace: All those shall take up a taunting proverb against him. He shall say (he that draws up the insulting ditty shall say thus), Ho, he that increases that which is not his! Aha! what has become of him now? So it may be read in a taunting way. Woe against him for increasing his own possessions by invading his neighbour's rights, v. 6–8. He is lading himself with thick clay. Riches are but clay, thick clay; what are gold and silver but white and yellow earth? People cry to God, "How long wilt thou suffer this proud oppressor to trouble the nations?" Or they say to one another, "See how long it will last, how long he will be able to keep what he gets thus dishonestly?" What he has got by violence from others, others shall take by violence from him. The Medes and Persians shall make a prey of the Chaldeans, as they have done of other nations, v. 7, 8. "There shall be those that will bite thee and vex thee; those that seemed asleep, shall rise up and awake to be a plague to thee. They shall rise up suddenly when thou art most secure. According to the law of retaliation, as thou hast spoiled many nations so thou shalt thyself be spoiled (v. 8); all the remnant of the people shall spoil thee." Woe against him for coveting still more, and aiming to be still higher, v. 9–11. Woe to him that gains an evil gain; so the margin reads it. There is a lawful gain, which by the blessing of God may be a comfort to a house (a good man leaves an inheritance to his children's children), but what is got by fraud and injustice is ill-got, and will be poor gain, will bring poverty and ruin upon it. Thou hast consulted, not safety, but shame, to thy house, by cutting off many people, v. 10. An estate raised by iniquity is a scandal to a family. "Thou hast sinned against thy own soul, and endangered that." But if the sinner pleads, Not guilty, and thinks his frauds cannot be proved upon him, let him know that the stone shall cry out of the wall against him, and the beam out of the timber in the roof shall answer it, v. 11. Woe against him for building a town and a city by blood and extortion (v. 12). So Nebuchadnezzar did (Dan. iv. 30): Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom? But it is built with the blood of his own subjects, whom he has oppressed, and the blood of his neighbours, whom he has invaded; it is established by iniquity. The shame of the Chaldeans, who had taken so much pains, and were at such a vast expense, to fortify it (v. 13): Is it not of the Lord of hosts that the people who have laboured so hard to defend that city shall labour in the very fire, shall labour in vain to save it? There is not a greater drudge in the world than he that is under the power of reigning covetousness. They are but poorly paid for it; for, after all, they weary themselves for very vanity; it is worse than vanity, it is vexation of spirit.

The foregoing articles, upon which the woes here are grounded, are very near akin to each other.

But here are two articles more, of a different nature, which carry a woe to those in general to whom they belong, and particularly to the Babylonian monarchs, by whom the people of God were taken and held captives.

I. The promoters of drunkenness stand here condemned. Belshazzar was one of those; he was so, remarkably that very night that the prophecy of this chapter was fulfilled, when he drank wine before a thousand of his lords (Dan. v. 1), and forced them to pledge him. The succeeding monarchs of Persia (as we find, Esther i. 8) had seen in the kings of Babylon the mischievous consequences of forcing healths and making people drunk. But the woe here stands firm and fearful against all those, whoever they are, who are guilty of this sin at any time and in any place.

1. The sinner here articled against is he that makes his neighbour drunk, v. 15. To give a neighbour drink with design to intoxicate him, that he may expose himself, may make himself ridiculous, may disclose his own secret concerns—this is abominable wickedness; and those who are guilty of it are rebels against God in heaven, and his sacred laws, factors for the devil in hell, and enemies to men on earth.

2. Sentence is here passed upon him. There is a woe to him (v. 15), and a punishment (v. 16) that shall answer to the sin. (1) Does he put the cup of drunkenness into the hand of his neighbour? The cup of the Lord's right hand, shall be turned unto him; shall at length be put into the hand of the king of Babylon, as was foretold, Jer. xxv. 15, 16, 18, 26, 27. Does he take a pleasure in putting his neighbour to shame? He shall himself be loaded with contempt: "Thou art filled with shame for glory, with shame instead of glory. Thou also shalt drink of the cup of trembling, and shalt expose thyself by thy cowardice, which shall be as the uncovering of thy nakedness, to thy shame. For the violence of Lebanon shall cover thee, and the spoil of beasts (v. 17); thou shalt be hunted with as much violence as ever any wild beasts in Lebanon were."

II. The promoters of idolatry stand condemned. Belshazzar, in his revels, praised his idols. They are mad upon their idols; so the Chaldeans are said to be, Jer. l. 38. They have a great variety of idols, graven images and molten images. The maker of the work has performed his part admirably well, the fashioner of his fashion (so it is in the margin). They lay them over with gold and silver. The maker of the work trusts therein as his god. They pray to them: They say to the wood, Awake for our relief, and to the dumb stone, "Arise, and save us." They consult them as oracles, and expect to be directed by them. The folly of this is exposed. Their images are wholly void both of sense and reason, lifeless and speechless, so that the most minute animal, that has but breath and motion, is more excellent than they. It is not in their power to do their worshippers any good (v. 18): What profits the graven image? It is so far from profiting them that it keeps them under the power of a strong delusion; they say, It shall teach, but it is a teacher of lies; for it represents God as having a body, as being finite, visible, and dependent, whereas he is a Spirit, infinite, invisible, and independent. The people of God triumph in him when the idolaters thus shame themselves (v. 20): Our rock is not as their rock, Deut. xxxii. 31. Theirs are dumb idols; ours is Jehovah, a living god, who is what he is, and not, as theirs, what men please to make him. They have laid waste his temple at Jerusalem; but he has a temple above that is out of the reach of their rage and malice, but within the reach of his people's faith and prayers.

CHAP. III

The prophet's prayer, in this chapter, is in imitation of David's psalms, for it is directed "to the chief musician", and is set to musical instruments. The prayer is left upon record for the use of the church, and particularly of the Jews in their captivity, while they were waiting for their deliverance. I. He earnestly begs of God to succour his people in affliction, to hasten their deliverance, and to comfort them in the meantime, ver. 2. II. He calls to mind the experiences which the church formerly had of God's glorious and gracious appearances on her behalf, when he brought Israel out of Egypt through the wilderness to Canaan, and there wrought wonderful deliverances for them, ver. 3–15. III. He affects himself with a holy concern for the present troubles of the church, but encourages himself and others to hope that the issue will be glorious at last, though all visible means fail, ver. 16–19.

Verses 1–2

This chapter is entitled a prayer of Habakkuk. It is an intercession for the church. Prophets were praying men, and sometimes they prayed for even those whom they prophesied against. 1. The prophet owns the receipt of God's answer to his former representation, and the impression it made upon him (v. 2): "O Lord! I have heard thy speech, thy hearing" (so some read it). Those that would rightly order their speech to God must carefully observe his speech to them. The matter of this message made the prophet afraid, when he heard how low the people of God should be brought, under the Chaldeans, and he was afraid lest their spirits should fail, and lest the church should be utterly rooted out and lost at length. 2. He earnestly prays that these days of trouble might be shortened or moderated, or the people of God supported. He thinks it very long to wait till the end of the years; perhaps he refers to the seventy years of the captivity, and therefore, "Lord," says he, "do something on our behalf in the midst of the years, though we be not delivered, yet let us not be abandoned and cast off." Revive thy work, thy church even when it walks in the midst of trouble, Ps. cxxxviii. 7, 8. Revive the work of thy grace in us, by sanctifying the trouble to us and supporting us under it, though the time be not yet come for our deliverance out of it. In the midst of the years make known, make thyself known, make known thy power, thy pity, thy promise, thy providence, in the government of the world, for the safety and welfare of thy church. When in the midst of the years of the captivity God miraculously owned the three children in the fiery furnace, and humbled Nebuchadnezzar, this prayer was answered.

Verses 3–15

God's people, when in distress, help themselves by recollecting their experiences, considering the days of old. The prophet here looks as far back as the miracles in Egypt, and through the wilderness. He that thus brought them at first into Canaan can now bring them out of Babylon.

I. God appeared in his glory (v. 3, 4): He came from Teman, even the Holy One from Mount Paran. This refers to the visible display of the glory of God when he gave the law upon Mount Sinai, Deut. xxxiii. 2. Then his glory covered the heavens. The earth also was full of his praise, or of his splendour, as some read it. Or the earth was full of those works of God which were to be praised. Some by the horns, the two horns (for the word is dual), coming out of his hand, understand the two tables of the law. It is added, And there was the hiding of his power. The operations of his power, compared with what he could have done, were rather the hiding of it than the discovery of it.

II. God sent plagues on Egypt, for the humbling of proud Pharaoh (v. 5): Before him went the pestilence, which slew all the first-born of Egypt in one night; and burning coals went forth at his feet, when, in the plague of hail, there was fire mingled with hail—burning diseases (so the margin reads it). These were at his feet, that is, at his coming, for they are at his command; he says to them, Go, and they go, Come, and they come, Do this, and they do it.

III. He divided the land of Canaan to his people Israel, and expelled the heathen (v. 6): He stood, and measured the earth, measured that land, to assign it for an inheritance to Israel his people, Deut. xxxii. 8, 9. He beheld, and drove asunder the nations, though they combined together against Israel. Then the everlasting mountains were scattered, and the perpetual hills did bow; the mighty princes of Canaan, that seemed as high and as firmly fixed, as the mountains, were broken to pieces. When he drove asunder the nations of Canaan one might have seen the tents of Cushan in affliction, the curtains of the land of Midian trembling, and all the inhabitants of the neighbouring countries, v. 7.

IV. He divided the Red Sea and Jordan, and yet fetched a river out of a rock when Israel wanted it, v. 8. God rode upon his horses and chariots of salvation, as a general at the head of his forces, mighty to save. This seems to be referred to again (v. 15). Thou didst walk through the heap, or mud, of great waters, slowly as the children and cattle walked. When they came to enter Canaan, the overflowing of the water passed by, that is, Jordan, which at that time overflowed all his banks, was divided, Joshua iii. 15. Then the deep uttered his voice, when, the Red Sea and Jordan being divided, the waters roared. They lifted up their hands, or sides, on high (for the waters stood up on a heap, Joshua iii. 16). Thou didst cleave the earth with rivers; channels in the wilderness, for the waters out of the rock, to supply the camp of Israel.

V. He arrested the motion of the sun and moon, to befriend Israel's victories (v. 11). At the light, at the direction, of thy arrows, they went, and at the shining of thy glittering spear; his spear pointed (the glittering light of which they acknowledged to outshine theirs) that way they directed their march, as when the stars in their courses fought against Sisera.

VI. He completed Israel's victories over the nations of Canaan and their kings. This is a plea with God that he would restore them again to that land.

1. Many expressions are here used to set forth the conquest of Canaan. God's bow was made quite naked, taken out of the case, to be employed for Israel; we should say, his sword was quite unsheathed. He marched through the land from end to end, in indignation, as scorning to let that wicked generation of Canaanites any longer possess so good a land. He threshed the heathen in anger, trod them out, as corn in the floor. He wounded the heads out of the house of the wicked; he destroyed their princes, cut off the heads, and so discovered the foundations of them, even to the neck. Some apply this to Christ's victories over Satan and the powers of darkness, in which he wounded the heads over many countries, Ps. cx. 6. He struck through with his staves the head of the villages (v. 14). Staves shall do the same execution as swords. Pharaoh, when he pursued Israel to the Red Sea, came out as a whirlwind; so did the kings of Canaan against Israel. Their rejoicing was as to devour the poor secretly; they were as confident of success in their enterprise as ever any great man was of devouring a poor man. But God disappointed them, and their pride did but make their fall more shameful and God's care of his poor more illustrious. He walked to the sea with his horses (so some read it, v. 15), that is, he carried Israel's victories to the Great Sea, which was opposite to that side of Canaan at which they entered.

2. God would hereby make good his promise to the fathers; it was according to the oaths of the tribes, even his word, v. 9. He had sworn to give this land to the tribes of Israel. He would hereby show his kindness to his people, because of their relation to him, and his interest in them: Thou wentest forth for the salvation of thy people, v. 13. He would hereby give a type and figure of the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ. It is for salvation with thy anointed, with Joshua, who was a figure of him whose name he bore, even Jesus our Joshua.

Verses 16–19

I. The prophet had foreseen the prevalence of the church's enemies and the sight made him tremble, v. 16. Here he goes on with what he had said v. 2, "I have heard thy speech and was afraid. When I heard what sad times were coming my belly trembled, my lips quivered at the voice." It was no reproach to his courage. I tremble in myself, that I might rest in the day of trouble. He that has joy in store for those that sow in tears has rest in store for those that tremble before him. Good hope through grace is founded in a holy fear.

II. He had looked back upon the church in former ages, and had observed what great things God had done for them, and so fell into a transport of holy joy.

1. He supposes the ruin not only of the delights of this life, but even of the necessary supports of it, v. 17. Famine is one of the ordinary effects of war. He supposes the fruit-tree to be withered and barren; the fig-tree (which used to furnish them with much of their food); he supposes the labour of the olive to fail, their oil, which was to them as butter is to us; the fields shall yield no meat. The flock is cut off from the fold, and there is no herd in the stall.

2. He resolves to delight and triumph in God notwithstanding; when all is gone his God is not gone (v. 18): "Yet will I rejoice in the Lord." Those who, when they were full, enjoyed God in all, when they are emptied can enjoy all in God, and can sit down upon a melancholy heap of the ruins and even then sing to the praise and glory of God. This is the principal ground of our joy in God, that he is the God of our eternal salvation, the salvation of the soul; and, if he be so, we may rejoice in him in our greatest distresses, since by them our salvation cannot be hindered, but may be furthered. Joy in God is never out of season, nay, it is in a special manner seasonable when we meet with losses and crosses in the world, that it may then appear that our hearts are not set upon these things, nor our happiness bound up in them. He that is the God of salvation in another world will be our strength in this world, to carry us on in our journey thither, and help us over the difficulties and oppositions we meet with in our way. Thus the prophet, who began his prayer with fear and trembling, concludes it with joy and triumph, for prayer is heart's ease to a gracious soul. He set his song upon Shigionoth (v. 1), wandering tunes, according to the variable songs, and upon Neginoth (v. 19), the stringed instruments. He that is afflicted, and has prayed aright, may then be so easy, may then be so merry, as to sing psalms.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROPHECY OF ZEPHANIAH

This prophet is placed last, of all the minor prophets before the captivity, and not long before Jeremiah, who lived at the time of the captivity. He foretells the general destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, and sets their sins before them, calls them to repentance, threatens the neighbouring nations with the like destructions, and gives encouraging promises of their joyful return out of captivity in due time.

CHAP. I

After the title of the book (ver. 1), here is, I. A threatening of the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, ver. 2–4. II. A charge against them for their gross sin (ver. 5, 6); and so he goes on in the rest of the chapter, setting both the judgments before them, that they might prevent them or prepare for them, and the sins that destroy them, that they might judge themselves, and justify God in what was brought upon them. 1. They must hold their peace because they had greatly sinned, ver. 7–9. But, 2. They shall howl because the trouble will be great, ver. 10–18. Such fair and timely warning as this did God give to the Jews of the approaching captivity.

Verses 1–6

I. The title-page of this book (v. 1); it is from heaven, and not of men: It is the word of the Lord. Zephaniah signifies the servant of the Lord, for God revealed his secrets to his servants the prophets. The pedigree of Zephaniah goes back four generations, and the highest mentioned is Hizkiah; it is the same name in the original with that of Hezekiah king of Judah (2 Kings xviii. 1). This prophet prophesied in the days of Josiah king of Judah, who in the twelfth year of his reign carried on a work of reformation, in which he destroyed idols. Now it does not appear whether Zephaniah prophesied in the beginning of his reign; if so, we may suppose his prophesying had a great influence on that reformation.

II. The summary of this book. The general proposition contained in it is, That utter destruction is coming apace upon Judah and Jerusalem for sin. He begins abruptly (v. 2): By taking away I will make an end of all things from off the face of the land, saith the Lord. I will consume the beasts, the fowls of the heaven, and the fishes of the sea (v. 3). The expressions are figurative, denoting universal desolation. Those that fly ever so high, those that hide ever so close, shall yet become a prey to them, and be utterly consumed. "I will consume man; I will cut off man from the land. The land shall be dispeopled and left uninhabited; I will destroy, not only Israel, but man. Though they shall not be cut off from the Lord, yet they shall be cut off from the land." Even Judah, where God is known, and Jerusalem, where his dwelling-place is, if they revolt from him and rebel against him, shall have his hand stretched out against them. "I will consume the stumbling-blocks with the wicked, the idols with the idolaters, the offences with the offenders." The Chaldeans would spare none of the images of Baal, or the worshippers of those images. The Chemarim shall be cut off; we read of them in the history of Josiah's reformation. 2 Kings xxiii. 5, He put down the idolatrous priests: the word is the Chemarim. The word signifies black men, some think because they wore black clothes, others because their faces were black with attending the altars, the fires in which they burnt their children to Moloch. They seem to have been immediate attendants upon the service of Baal. And, among other idolaters, the worshippers of the host of heaven upon the house-tops shall be cut off (v. 5). It will appear as great an offence to God to give divine honours to a star as to give them to a stone or a stock. Those also shall be consumed that halt between God and Baal, and worship between Jehovah and Moloch, and swear by both; or, as it might better be read, swear to the Lord and to Malcham. Those also shall be consumed that have apostatized from God, together with those that never gave up their names to him, v. 6.

Notice is given to Judah and Jerusalem that God is coming against them; his day, the day of his judgment is not far off, v. 7. Men have their day now, when they do what they please; but God's day is at hand; it is here called his sacrifice, reparation to his injured honour.

I. Those that shall be punished in this day of reckoning: The royal family for their pride and affectation (v. 8). They shall be punished, and all such as, like them, are clothed with strange apparel. The princes and the king's children send abroad to strange countries for their clothes, which would not please unless they were far-fetched and dear-bought. Pride in apparel is displeasing to God, and a symptom of the degeneracy of a people. In the same day will I punish those that leap on the threshold, a phrase which probably signified the invading of their neighbour's rights. They leap on the threshold, as much as to say that the house is their own, and, accordingly, they make all in it their own, and so fill their masters' houses with goods gotten by violence and deceit. Iniquity is found among the inhabitants of Maktesh, a low part of Jerusalem, deep like a mortar (for so the word signifies); the goldsmiths lived there (Neh. iii. 32) and the merchants; and they are now cut down, have shut up their shops, and become bankrupts. All those that bear silver are cut off by the invaders. All the careless people that live a loose idle life are next reckoned with (v. 12). God will find them out, and punish them: At that time I will search Jerusalem with candles, to discover them. God will punish not only the secret idolaters, but the secret epicures and profane. Their dispositions are sensual: They are settled on their lees, intoxicated with their pleasures. Their notions are atheistical. They could not live such loose lives but that they say in their heart, The Lord will not do good, neither will he do evil; that is, He will do nothing. They deny his providential government of the world. If they were not drowned in sense, they could not be thus senseless.

II. God will punish these sinners. He will silence them (v. 7): Hold thy peace at the presence of the Lord. He will sacrifice them, for it is the day of the Lord's sacrifice (v. 8); he will give them into the hands of their enemies. In that day there shall be a noise of a cry from the fish-gate, so called because near to the fish-market. And a howling from the second, which was next to that fish-gate. The alarm shall go round the walls of Jerusalem from gate to gate; and there shall be a great crashing from the hills, from the mountains round about Jerusalem, from the acclamations of the invaders, and the lamentations of the invaded. The inhabitants of the city, even of the closest safest part of the city, shall howl (v. 11), so clamorous shall the grief be. They shall be stripped of all they have; it shall be a prey to the enemy (v. 13): Their household goods, and shop-goods, shall become a booty, and a rich booty they shall be; their houses shall be levelled with the ground and be a desolation; those of them that have built new houses shall not inherit them, but the invaders shall get and keep possession of them. And the vineyards they have planted they shall not drink the wine of, but, instead of having it for the relief of their friends that faint among them, they shall part with it for the animating of their foes that fight against them, Deut. xxviii. 30.

Verses 14–18

The warning given to Judah and Jerusalem of the approaching destruction by the Chaldeans. It is the great day of the Lord, a kind of doom's-day, as the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans is represented to be in our Saviour's prediction concerning it, Matt. xxiv. 27.

I. This day of the Lord is here spoken of as very near. The prophet gives the alarm like one that awakens a family with the cry of Fire! fire! when it is at the next door.

II. It is spoken of as a very dreadful day. The very voice of this day of the Lord, shall make the mighty men cry there bitterly. It will be a day of trouble and distress to the sinners; they shall see no ways of easing or helping themselves. It is a day of clouds and thick darkness; the thick clouds are big with storms and tempests.

III. It is spoken of as a destroying day, v. 16, 17. What forts, what fences, can hold out against the wrath of God? "I will bring distress upon men, the strongest and stoutest of men; they shall walk like blind men, wandering endlessly, because they have sinned against the Lord." Those that walk as bad men will justly be left to walk as blind men, always in doubt and danger.

IV. The destruction of that day will be unavoidable and universal, v. 18. There shall be no escaping it by ransom: Neither their silver nor their gold shall be able to deliver them in the day of the Lord's wrath. There shall be no escaping it by flight or concealment; for the whole land shall be devoured by the fire of his jealousy, and where then can a hiding-place be found?

CHAP. II

I. An earnest exhortation to the nation to repent and make their peace with God (ver. 1–3). II. The judgments of God against several of the neighbouring nations that had assisted, or rejoiced in, the calamity of Israel. 1. The Philistines, ver. 4–7. 2. The Moabites and Ammonites, ver. 8–11. 3. The Ethiopians and Assyrians, ver. 12–15.

Verses 1–3

The prophet meant in that terrible description of approaching judgments not to drive the people to despair, but to drive them to God and to their duty —not to frighten them out of their wits, but to frighten them out of their sins.

I. The summons to a national assembly (v. 1): Gather yourselves together. The summons is given to a nation not desired. The word signifies either, 1. Not desiring, that has not any desire towards God. "Yet come together, and see if you can stir up desires in one another." Or, 2. Not desirable, nor having anything which might recommend them to God. God says, "Gather together, that you may in a body humble yourselves." Some read it, "Enquire into yourselves; examine your consciences; look into your hearts; search and try your ways; enquire into yourselves, that you may find out the sin by which God has been provoked."

II. Arguments urged to press them to expedition herein (v. 2): "Do it in earnest; do it with all speed before it is too late, before the decree bring forth, before the day pass."

III. Directions prescribed. They are not to gather together in a consternation, but seriously and calmly (v. 3): Seek you the Lord. If the land be saved, it must be by the intercession of the pious few, the meek of the earth, or of the land. They must seek the Lord, seek his favour and grace. Seek God for the performance of his promises to you, and see to it that you abound yet more in duty to him.

IV. Encouragements given to take these directions: It may be, you shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger. "Verily it shall be well with thy remnant, Jer. xv. 11. It may be, you shall be hid: if any be hid, you shall." They shall be hid (as Luther says) aut in cœlo, aut sub cœlo—either in heaven or under heaven, either in the possession of heaven or under the protection of heaven.

Verses 4–7

The prophet foretells what share the neighbouring nations should have in the destruction made by Nebuchadnezzar. The day of the Lord might appear the more dreadful, but though God had seemed to be their enemy, and to fight against them, yet he was still so far their friend, and an enemy to their enemies, that he resented, and would revenge, the indignities done them.

In these verses we have the doom of the Philistines, neighbours, and old enemies, to the people of Israel. They were the inhabitants of the sea-coasts (v. 5), for their country lay upon the Great Sea. The nation of the Cherethites is here joined with them, which bordered upon them (1 Sam. xxx. 14) and fell with them. The Philistines' land is here called Canaan, for it belonged to that country which God gave to his people Israel, Joshua xiii. 3. This land is yet to be possessed for so that they wrongfully kept Israel out of the possession of it (Judges iii. 3).

I. It is here foretold that the Philistines, the usurpers, shall be dispossessed and quite extirpated. Gaza shall be forsaken, though now a populous city. It was foretold (Jer. xlvii. 5) that baldness should come upon Gaza; Alexander the Great razed that city, and we find (Acts viii. 26) that Gaza was a desert. Ashkelon shall be a desolation. Ashdod shall be driven out at noon-day; in the extremity of the scorching heat. They shall be forced away into captivity. Ekron likewise shall be rooted up, that had been long taking root. The land of the Philistines shall be dispeopled, v. 5. The sea-coast, which used to be a harbour for ships and a habitation for merchants, shall now be deserted, and be only cottages for shepherds and folds for flocks (v. 6).

II. It is here foretold that the house of Judah, the rightful owners, shall recover the possession of it, v. 7. The remnant of those that shall return out of captivity shall lie down in safety in the houses of Ashkelon.

Verses 8–11

The Moabites and Ammonites were both of the posterity of Lot; their countries joined.

I. They are both charged with reviling the people of God and triumphing in their calamities (v. 8). They have spoken big (so some read it, magna locuti sunt—they have spoken great things) against their border (v. 8), against those of them that bordered upon their country; they spoke big against the people of the Lord of hosts as a deserted abandoned people. "But I have heard them" (says God).

II. They are both laid under the same doom. Sentence is pronounced upon them, v. 9. The Moabites and Ammonites shall be as Sodom and Gomorrah, the marks of whose ruins in the Dead Sea lay near adjoining to the countries of Moab and Ammon; they shall be laid waste; not again to be inhabited, or not of a long time. The country shall produce nettles, instead of corn; and there shall be brine-pits, instead of fountains of water. Israel shall spoil them of their goods and possess their country. And this shall they have for their pride.

III. Other nations shall in like manner be humbled. Heathen gods must be abolished. Their worshippers have gloried in them. But the Lord will famish all the gods of the earth, will starve them out of their strongholds. When the gospel gets ground, by it men shall be brought to worship him who lives for ever, everyone from his place; they shall not need to go up to Jerusalem to worship the God of Israel, but, wherever they are, they may have access to him.

Verses 12–15

The Ethiopians, or Arabians, that had sometimes been a terror to Israel (as in Asa's time, 2 Chron. xiv. 9), shall be slain by my sword, v. 12. Nebuchadnezzar was God's sword, the instrument with which these enemies were punished, Ps. xvii. 14. The Assyrians, and Nineveh the head city of their monarchy, are next to receive their doom: He that is God's sword will stretch out his hand against the north and destroy Assyria. Assyria had been the rod of God's anger against Israel, and now Babylon is the rod of God's anger against Assyria, Isa. x. 5. Nineveh was so strong that she feared no evil. She shall be made a desolation, v. 13. The melancholy birds, as the cormorant and bittern, shall make their nests in what remains of the houses. The lintels, or chapiters of the pillars, the windows and thresholds, and all the fine cedar-work, shall lie exposed; and on them these rueful ominous birds shall perch, and their voice shall sing. Everyone that passes by shall hiss at her, and wag his hand—"There is an end of proud Nineveh."

CHAP. III

I. Reproof and threatening, for the wickedness that was found in her, ver. 1–7. II. Mercy and grace, which God had yet in reserve for them. Two general promises: 1. That God would bring in a glorious work of reformation among them, cleanse them from their sins, and bring them home to himself, ver. 8–13. 2. That he would bring about a glorious work of salvation for them, when he had thus prepared them for it, ver. 14–20. These promises were to have their full accomplishment in gospel-times and gospel-graces.

Verses 1–7

I. A very bad character given of Jerusalem in general. She shames herself; she is filthy and polluted (v. 1), has made herself infamous (so some read it), the gluttonous city (so the margin), always making provision for the flesh. She wrongs her neighbours and inhabitants; she is the oppressing city. She is provoking to her God, v. 2. He had given his law, but she obeyed not his voice. Her confidence was placed in her alliances with the nations more than in her covenant with God. She drew not near to her God. She stood at a distance, and said to the Almighty, Depart.

II. The leading men in it are the great patrons of wickedness, and those that should be her physicians are really her worst disease. Her princes are barbarous as roaring lions, and are universally hated. Her judges are evening wolves, rapacious, their cruelty and covetousness insatiable: They gnaw not the bones till the morrow; they take delight in oppression that when they have devoured a good man they reserve the bones, as it were, for a sweet morsel, Job xxxi. 31. Her prophets, who pretend to be special messengers from heaven to them, are light and treacherous persons, men of no consistency, in whom one can put no confidence. Her priests are false to their trust and betray it. They were to preserve the purity of the sanctuary, but they themselves pollute it. They did violence to the law; they corrupted the sense of it. By forced constructions, they made the law to speak what they pleased, and so, in effect, made void the law.

III. General corruption in Jerusalem. They had the tokens of God's presence yet they persisted in their disobedience, v. 5. "The just Lord is in the midst of thee as a holy God, and therefore thy pollutions are the more offensive," Deut. xxiii. 14. "A just God will punish the affronts you put upon him, and the wrongs you do to one another." He sent to them his prophets, rising up early and sending them: Every morning he brings his judgment to light. He wakens his prophets with the rising sun, to bring to light the things which belong to their peace. God had set before their eyes monuments of his justice, designed for warning (v. 6): I have cut off the nations, the seven nations of Canaan, Lev. xviii. 28. Or it may refer to some of the neighbouring nations made desolate for their wickedness. Their towers were desolate, their streets were wasted, their cities were destroyed and laid in ruins; no man was to be found in them. The enemies did it, but God avows it: I cut them off, says he. And God designed this for an admonition to Jerusalem. He had assured them of the continuance of their prosperity if they would fear him and receive instruction, for so their dwelling would not be cut off as their neighbour's was. He had made them feel the smart of the rod, though he reprieved them from the sword. They were more resolute and eager in their wicked courses than ever. God rose up early, to send them his prophets, but they were up before him, to shut and bolt the door against them.

Things looked bad. Jerusalem has got a very bad name, and seems to be incorrigible, incurable, mercy-proof and judgment-proof. But behold the riches of divine grace. They still grew worse and worse, therefore wait you upon me, saith the Lord, v. 8. "Since the law, it seems, will make nothing perfect, the bringing in of a better hope shall. Let those that lament the corruptions of the church wait upon God, till he send his Son into the world, to save his people from their sins, and to purify to himself a peculiar people both of Jews and Gentiles." And there were those who waited for redemption in Jerusalem; and long-looked-for, it came at last, Luke ii. 38.

I. By the gospel of Christ preached to every creature all nations are summoned, as it were, to appear in a body before the Lord Jesus, who is about to set up his kingdom in the world. But, since the greatest part of mankind will not obey the summons, he will pour upon them his indignation, for he that believes not is condemned already. Then all the earth shall be devoured with the fire of his jealousy; both Jews and Gentiles shall be reckoned with for their enmity to the gospel.

II. When God intends the restoration of Israel he makes way for their reformation and the revival of their virtue and piety; for this is God's method, first to make them holy and then to make them happy. These promises were in part accomplished after the return of the Jews out of Babylon. It is promised that there shall be a reformation in men's discourse, which had been generally corrupt, but should now be with grace seasoned with salt (v. 9): "Then will I turn to the people a pure language." Converting grace refines the language, not by making the phrases witty, but the substance wise. The Jews, after the captivity, had mingled the language of Canaan with that of Ashdod (Neh. xiii. 24). But that is not all: their language shall be purified from all profaneness, filthiness, and falsehood. I will turn them to a choice language (so some read it). Instead of sacrifice and incense, they shall call upon the name of the Lord. Prayer is the spiritual offering with which God must be honoured. They shall serve God with one consent, with one shoulder (so the word is), alluding to oxen in the yoke, that draw even. When Christians are unanimous in the service of God the work goes on cheerfully. Purity is the way to unity; the reformation of manners is the way to a comprehension. Those that were driven from God shall return to him and be accepted of him (v. 10). From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, or from some other remote country, they shall be put in mind of him, as the prodigal son was of his father's house, in the far country. The daughter of his dispersed, that is afar off, will be found among those whom the Lord our God shall call. Wherever they are, though beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, a great way from his house of prayer, they still are his suppliants. They shall bring my offering, shall bring themselves as spiritual sacrifices to God (Rom. xii. 1). In that day shalt thou not be ashamed for all thy doings. They shall be ashamed as penitents (see Ezek. xvi. 63), but they shall not be ashamed as sinners that return to folly again. "I will take away out of the midst of thee, not only the profane, but the hypocrites, who appear beautiful outwardly, and rejoice in thy pride, in the holy city, the holy house." These were haughty because of the holy mountain, were conceited, scornful and set even the judgments of God at defiance. That haughtiness is the most offensive to God which is fed by the pretensions of holiness. God will have a remnant of holy, humble, serious people (v. 12): I will leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people. This select remnant shall be blessed with purity and peace, v. 13, both in words and actions: They shall neither do iniquity nor speak lies.

After the promises of the taking away of sin, here follow promises of the taking away of trouble; for when the cause is removed the effect will cease. Rejoice and sing (v. 14): Sing, O daughter of Zion! sing for joy; shout, O Israel! Those that love God with all their heart have occasion with all their heart to rejoice in him. In that day it shall be said to Jerusalem (God will say it by his prophets, by his providences, their neighbours shall say it, they shall say it to one another), "Fear thou not. Lift up thy hands in prayer to God; lift up thy hands to help thyself."

I. An end shall be put to all their troubles and distresses (v. 15): "The Lord has taken away thy judgments, has removed all the calamities which were the punishments of thy sin; the noise of war shall be silenced, the reproach of famine done away, and the captivity brought back. He has cast out thy enemy, that has thrust himself into thy land. He has swept out thy enemy" (so some read it). The way to get clear of the evil of trouble is to keep clear from the evil of sin; and to those that do so trouble has no real evil in it.

II. God will give them the tokens of his presence with them. "The Lord is in the midst of thee, O Zion! of thee, O Jerusalem! as the sun in the centre of the universe, to diffuse his light and influence upon every part. He (v. 15) is in the midst of thee as a king in the midst of his people. He is the Lord thy God, thine in covenant, in the midst of thee as thy God, whose thou art. He will save. He will be Jesus, will answer the name, for he will save his people from their sins."

III. God will take delight in doing them good. He will rejoice over thee with joy. The conversion of sinners and the consolation of saints are the joy of angels, for they are the joy of God himself. He will rest in his love, will be silent in his love, so the word is.

IV. God will comfort Zion's mourners and will wipe away their tears (v. 18): I will gather those who are sorrowful for the solemn assemblies, to whom the reproach of it was a burden. Zion is in mourning. Many are her calamities. The city is ruined, and the palaces are demolished; trade is at an end, but all these are nothing to them in comparison with the destruction of the temple and the altar, to attend on which, in solemn feasts, all Israel used to come together three times a year. It is for those sacred solemn assemblies that they are sorrowful. The restraining of public assemblies for religious worship, the scattering of them by their enemies, or the forsaking of them by their friends, is a sorrowful thing to all good people. The reproach of the solemn assemblies is a burden to them.

V. God will recover the captives and bring home the banished that seemed to be expelled, v. 19, 20. "At that time I will undo all that afflict thee, will break their power, and blast their counsels, so that they shall be forced to surrender the prey they have taken." One act of mercy and grace shall serve both to collect them out of their dispersions and to conduct them to their own land. When the people's hearts are prepared, the work will be done suddenly.

VI. God will by all this gain them respect from all about them. When God returns, in mercy, to his church, it is here promised that she shall regain her credit. "I will get them praise and fame in every land, where they have been put to shame." Those that said, "This is Zion whom no man looks after," shall say, "This is Zion whom the great God looks after." So the Jewish church was when the fear of the Jews fell upon their neighbours (Esther viii. 17). So the Christian church was when it was made to flourish in the world, for there is that in it which may justly recommend it to the esteem of all people.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROPHECY OF HAGGAI

The captivity in Babylon gave a very remarkable turn to the affairs of the Jewish church both in history and prophecy. Nine of the twelve minor prophets lived and preached before that captivity. But the last three lived and preached after the return out of captivity. Haggai and Zechariah appeared eighteen years after the return, when the building of the temple was both retarded by its enemies, and neglected by its friends. Then the prophets, Haggai the prophet and Zechariah the son of Iddo, prophesied unto the Jews that were in Jerusalem, in the name of the God of Israel, even unto them (so we read Ezra v. 1), to encourage them to revive that good work when it had stood still for some time. Haggai began two months before Zechariah. But Zechariah continued longer at the work; for all Haggai's prophecies that are recorded were delivered within four months, in the second year of Darius. But we have Zechariah's prophecies dated above two years after, Zech. vii. 1. The Jews ascribe to these two prophets the honour of being members of the great synagogue, which was formed after the return out of captivity; we think it more certain, and a much greater honour, that they prophesied of Christ. Haggai spoke of him as the glory of the latter house, and Zechariah as the man, the branch. In them the light of that morning star shone more brightly as they now began to see his day approaching. The LXX make Haggai and Zechariah to be the penmen of Ps. cxxxviii and of Ps. cxlvi, cxlvii and cxlviii.

CHAP. I

I. A reproof of the people of the Jews for their dilatoriness in building the temple, with an exhortation to them to resume that good work, in good earnest, ver. 1–11. II. The good success of this sermon, appearing in the people's return and close application to that work, wherein the prophet encouraged them, assuring them that God was with them, ver. 12–15.

Verses 1–11

It was the complaint of the Jews in Babylon that they saw not their signs, and there was no more any prophet (Ps. lxxiv. 9), which was a judgment for mocking the prophets. We read of no prophets they had in their return. But the lamp of Old Testament prophecy shall yet make some glorious efforts before it expire; and Haggai is the first that appears under the character of a special messenger from heaven. In the reign of Darius Hystaspes, the third of the Persian kings, in the second year of his reign, this prophet was sent; and the word of the Lord came to him, and by him to the leading men among the Jews, v. 1. The chief governor was Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel, of the house of David, who was commander-in-chief of the Jews, in their return out of captivity. In the church was Joshua the son of Josedech, who was now high priest. They were great men and good men. The prophets, who were extraordinary messengers, did not set aside the institutions of magistracy and ministry, but endeavoured to render both more effectual.

I. The sin of the Jews at this time, v. 2. As soon as they came up out of captivity they set up an altar for sacrifice, and within a year after laid the foundations of a temple, Ezra iii. 10. They then seemed very forward in it, but, being served with a prohibition from the Persian court, and charged not to go on with it, they not only yielded to the force, when they were actually under it, but afterwards, when the violence of the opposition had abated, they had no spirit to set about it again, but let it stand still. These Jews continued loitering until they were reminded of their duty. They suggested one to another, "The time has not come, the time that the Lord's house should be built. Our losses are not repaired. It is too great an undertaking for beginners as we are; let us first get our own houses up, before we talk of building churches, and in the mean time let a bare altar serve us, as it did our father Abraham." They did not say that they would not build a temple at all, but, "Not yet; it is all in good time."

II. The judgments of God by which they were punished for this neglect, v. 6, 9–11. That the punishment might answer to the sin, God by his providence kept them still behind-hand, and that poverty which they thought to prevent by not building the temple God brought upon them for not building it. We need the help of God's prophets and ministers to expound, not only the judgments of God's mouth, but the judgments of his hands, that we may understand his mind and meaning in his rod as well as in his word.

1. God did not send them into captivity again, nor bring a foreign enemy upon them, as they deserved, but denied his blessing upon the seed sown, and then it never prospered. They sowed much (v. 6), kept a great deal of ground in tillage, because their land had long lain fallow and had enjoyed its sabbaths. Having sown much, they looked for much from it, but they were disappointed: They bring in little, very little (v. 6); when they have made the utmost of it, it comes to little (v. 9). We are here told how they came to be disappointed (v. 10): The heaven over you is stayed from dew; he that has the key of the clouds in his hands shut them up, and withheld the rain, and then of course the earth is stayed from her fruit; for, if the heaven be as brass, the earth is as iron. God will make us sensible of our necessary and constant dependence upon him, throughout all the links in the chain of second causes, so that we can at no time say, "Now we have no further occasion for God and his providence." See Hos. ii. 21. I called for a drought upon the land, ordered the weather to be extremely hot, and then the fruits of the earth were burnt up. The heat of the sun puts life into the plants and renews the face of the earth at spring. And yet, if that go into an extreme, it undoes all again. This drought was upon the mountains, which, lying high, were first affected with it. The mountains were their pasture-grounds, and used to be covered over with flocks, but now there was no grass for them. It was upon the corn, the new wine, and the oil; all failed through the extremity of the hot weather. It inflamed men and put them into fevers. It brought diseases upon cattle too. The bread they ate did not nourish them. When they had the corn in the barn they were not sure of it: I did blow upon it, saith the Lord of hosts (v. 9), and it withered. When they had it upon the board it was not that to them that they expected: "You eat, but you have not enough. You clothe yourselves, but there is none warm. He that earns wages by hard labour, and has it paid him in ready current money, puts it into a bag with holes; it drops through, and wastes away insensibly. Everything is so scarce and dear that they spend their money as fast as they get it."

2. God thus stopped the current of the favours promised them at their return (Joel ii. 24); they provoked him to do it: It is because of my house that is waste. The foundation of the temple is laid, but the building does not go on. "Every man runs to his own house, to finish that, and no care is taken about the Lord's house." If God cross us in our temporal affairs, and we meet with trouble and disappointment, we shall find this is the cause of it, the work we have to do for God is left undone, and we seek our own things more than the things of Jesus Christ, Phil. ii. 21.

III. The reproof which the prophet gives them for their neglect of the temple-work (v. 4): "Is it time for you, O you! to dwell in your ceiled houses, to have them beautified and adorned, and your families settled in them?" They were not content with walls and roofs for necessity. "It is high time," says one, "that my house were wainscoted." "It is high time," says another, "that mine were painted." And God's house, all this time, lies waste, and nothing is done at it.

IV. The good counsel which the prophet gives to those who thus despised God. Now therefore consider your ways, v. 5 and again v. 7. Think what you have done that has provoked God and think what you will do to testify your repentance. He would have them reform (v. 8): "Go up to the mountain, to Lebanon, and bring wood, and other materials, and build the house with all speed." He assures them: Build the house, and I will take pleasure in it; and that was encouragement enough for them to go through with it, whatever it cost them. Those who have long deferred their return to God, if at length they return with all their heart, must not despair of his favour.

The foregoing sermon met with the desired success among the people, and their obedience met with due encouragement from God.

I. All those to whom that sermon was preached were wrought upon by it. Zerubbabel, the chief governor, was a man that had been eminently useful in his day, and did not plead his former merits in answer to this reproof for his present remissness. Joshua also, as high priest, willingly received admonition and instruction. The remnant of the people all obeyed the voice of the Lord their God, and bowed to the yoke of his commands, v. 12. They looked upon the prophet to be the Lord's messenger, and the word he delivered to be the Lord's message; and therefore received it not as the word of man, but as the word of Almighty God, v. 12. Prophecy was a new thing with them; they had had no special messenger from heaven for a great while, and now that they had one, they paid extraordinary regard to him. It is sometimes so; when good preaching is most scarce it does most good, whereas the manna that is rained in plenty is loathed as light bread. And, because they so readily received this prophet, God, within a month or two after, raised them up another, Zech. i. 1. When they saw their own sin to be the cause of those judgments, then they feared. The Lord stirred up their spirits, v. 14. He encouraged them, and with those encouragements enlarged their hearts, Ps. cxix. 32. Lest they should sink under the weight of fear, God stirred them up, and made them cheerful and bold. They applied to their work with all possible vigour. Everyone, according to his capacity or ability, lent a hand, to further that good work. The consideration of God's covenant-relation to his people by his grace should stir up our spirits to act for him, and for the advancement of the interest of his kingdom among men. It was but on the first day of the sixth month that Haggai preached this sermon, and little more than three weeks after, they were all busy working in the house of the Lord their God, v. 15. Those that have lost time have need to redeem time.

II. How God met them in mercy. The same prophet that brought them the reproof brought them a comforting encouraging word (v. 13): Then spoke Haggai, the Lord's messenger, in the Lord's message, saying, I am with you, saith the Lord. That is all he has to say, and that is enough. I am with you, that is, I will forgive your neglects hitherto. I am with you to protect you against your enemies, and to prosper you, to strengthen your hands, and bless the work.

CHAP. II

Three sermons preached by the prophet Haggai for the encouragement of those that build the temple. In the first he assures the builders that the glory of the house they were now building should, in spiritual respects, though not in outward, exceed that of Solomon's temple, ver. 1–9. In the second he assures them that though their sin, in delaying to build the temple, had retarded the progress of other affairs, yet now that they had set about it in good earnest he would bless them, and give them success ver. 10–19. In the third he assures Zerubbabel that, as a reward of his pious zeal and activity herein, he should be a favourite of Heaven, and one of the ancestors of Messiah the Prince, whose kingdom should be set up on the ruins of all opposing powers, ver. 20–23.

Verses 1–9

I. The date of this message, v. 1. It was sent on the twenty-first day of the seventh month, when the builders had been about a month at work. Those that are hearty in the service of God shall receive fresh encouragements from him to proceed in it. Set the wheels going, and God will oil them.

II. The direction of this message, v. 2. Speak to Zerubbabel, and Joshua, and the residue of the people, the very same that obeyed the voice of the Lord (ch. i. 12) and whose spirits God stirred up to do so (ch. i. 14); to them are sent these words of comfort.

III. The message itself. That which was such a damp upon them, when the foundation of the temple was laid, was still a clog upon them—that they could not build such a temple now as Solomon built, v. 3. This fetched tears from the eyes of many, when the dimensions of it were first laid (Ezra iii. 12). It was now about seventy years since Solomon's temple was destroyed, so that there might be some yet alive who could remember to have seen it. One could remember the gold with which it was overlaid, another the precious stones, the porch, the pillars—and where are these now? It is sometimes the fault of old people to discourage the services of the present age by crying up too much the performances and attainments of the former age. Say not thou that the former days were better than these (Eccles. vii. 10), but thank God that there is any good in these, bad as they are. The encouragement that is given them to go on in the work, notwithstanding (v. 4): Yet now, though this house is likely to be inferior to the former, be strong, O Zerubbabel! and be strong, O Joshua! Let leading men do as well as they can, when they cannot do so well as they would. The grounds of these encouragements. God himself says to them, Fear you not (v. 5). The presence of God with us, as the Lord of hosts, is enough to silence all our fears. The Jews had hosts against them, but they had the Lord of hosts with them. Though he chastens them for their transgressions with the rod, yet he will not make his faithfulness to fail. It was the Spirit of God that stirred up their spirits to come out of Babylon (Ezra i. 5), and now to build the temple, Hag. i. 14. They shall have the Messiah among them shortly—him that should come, v. 6, 7. Let the Son of man, when he comes, find faith on the earth. Concerning his coming it is here foretold it shall be introduced by a general shaking (v. 6): I will shake the heavens, and the earth, and the sea, and the dry land. This is applied to the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world. God will once again do for his church as he did when he brought them out of Egypt; he shook the heavens and earth at Mount Sinai. This shall be done again when at the birth of Christ, Herod and all Jerusalem are troubled (Matt. ii. 3), and he is set for the fall and rising again of many. When his kingdom was set up it was with a shock to the nations. The shaking of the nations is often in order to the settling of the church and the establishing of the things that cannot be shaken. The house they are now building shall be filled with glory to such a degree that its glory shall exceed that of Solomon's temple. It is God's prerogative to fill with glory; the glory that comes from him is satisfying, and not vain glory. Moses's tabernacle and Solomon's temple were filled with glory when God in a cloud took possession of them; but this house shall be filled with glory of another nature. Let them not be concerned because this house will not have so much silver and gold about it as Solomon's temple had, v. 8. Let them be comforted with this, that, though this temple have less gold in it, it shall have more glory than Solomon's (v. 9): The glory of this latter house shall be greater than of the former. The presence of the Messiah will be in it, the Son of God presented there, attending there at twelve years old, and afterwards his preaching and working miracles there, and his driving the buyers and sellers out of it. It was necessary, then, that the Messiah should come while the second temple stood; but, that being long since destroyed, we must conclude that our Lord Jesus is the Christ, is he that should come, and we are to look for no other. It was the glory of this latter house, that before the coming of Christ, it was always kept free from idols and idolatries. The purity of the church, and the strict adherence to divine institutions, are much more its glory than external pomp and splendour. After Christ, the gospel was preached in it by the apostles, even all the words of this life, Acts v. 20. In the temple Jesus Christ was daily preached, Acts v. 42. Where Christ is, behold a greater than Solomon is there, so the heart in which he dwells, and makes a living temple, is more glorious than Solomon's temple, and will be so to eternity. In this place will I give peace, saith the Lord of hosts. But the Jews under the latter temple had so much trouble that we must conclude this promise to have its accomplishment in that spiritual peace which Jesus Christ bequeathed to all believers (John xiv. 27). God will give peace in this place; he will give his Son to be the peace, Eph. ii. 14.

This sermon was preached two months after that in the former part of the chapter. The people were now going on vigorously with the building of the temple.

I. God sees there are many among them that spoil this good work, by going about it with unsanctified hearts and hands. All are warned thereby to purify the hands they employ in this work. A spiritual use is to be made of the ceremonial law; it was intended, not only as a divine ritual to the Jews, but for instruction in righteousness to all. The prophet is ordered to enquire of the priests concerning it (v. 11). Haggai himself, though a prophet, must ask the priests concerning the law. It was their duty to expound the ordinances of God, and to give the general rules for the observance of them. The rules of the law, in the cases propounded, are that he that has holy flesh in his clothes cannot by the touch of his clothes communicate holiness (v. 12), but he that is ceremonially unclean by the touch of a dead body does by his touch communicate that uncleanness. The law is express (Num. xix. 22). The sum of these two rules is that pollution is more easily communicated than sanctification. The law is here applied (v. 14): So is this people, and so is this nation, before me. They thought their offering sacrifices on the altar would sanctify them, and excuse their neglect to build the temple. "No," says God, "your holy flesh and your altar will be so far from sanctifying your meat and drink, your wine and oil, to you, that your contempt of God's temple will bring a pollution, not only on your common enjoyments, but even on your sacrifices too." If they be sensual, and morally impure, though they work hard at the temple while it is building, and though they offer many and costly sacrifices there when it is built, yet that shall not serve to sanctify their meat and drink to them; the impurity of their hearts and lives shall make even that work of their hands, and all their offerings, unclean, and an abomination to God.

II. Comfort and encouragement. If their hearts be right with God, and their eye single, God will take away the judgment of famine, and will restore them great plenty. On the twenty-fourth day of the sixth month they began to prepare materials (ch. i. 15), and now on the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month they began to lay a stone upon a stone in the temple of the Lord. They had gone behind-hand before this day. Let them remember the time when there was waste and decay in all they had, v. 16. A man went to his garner, expecting to find a heap of twenty measures of corn, but he found it unaccountably diminished, and, when he came to measure it, there were but ten measures; it had dried away in the keeping, or vermin had eaten it, or it was stolen. In like manner he went to the wine-press, expecting to draw fifty vessels of wine; they did not yield as usual, for he could get but twenty. I smote you with blastings, winds and frosts, which made every green thing to wither, and with mildew, which choked the corn when it was knitting, and with hail, which battered it down when it had grown to some maturity; thus they were disappointed in all the labour of their hands, while they neglected to lay their hands to the work of God. As long as they continued in neglect of the temple work all their affairs went backward. But they should find that from this day forward God would bless them (v. 18, 19): "Consider now whether when you begin to change your way towards God you do not find God changing his way towards you." He does not say what they shall be, but, in general, I will bless you; they can desire no more to make them happy.

Verses 20–23

After Haggai's sermon to the people, here follows one, the same day, to the magistrates, particularly to Zerubbabel (v. 21): Speak to Zerubbabel, governor of Judah, speak to him by himself. Zerubbabel is concerned about the community, about the neighbouring nations, and their governments, and what will become of the few and feeble Jews, and how such a poor prince as he should be able to keep his ground and serve his country. "Go to him," says God, "and tell him it shall be well with him and his remnant."

I. Let him expect to hear of great commotions in the nations (v. 21, 22): I will shake the heavens and the earth. The world is like the sea, like the wheel, always in motion, but sometimes in a special manner turbulent. But, blessed be God, if the earth be shaken, it is to shake the wicked out of it, Job xxxviii. 13. In the apocalyptic visions earthquakes bode no ill to the church. The Chaldean monarchy, which had been the throne of kingdoms was already overthrown; and the powers that are yet to come, shall in like manner be overthrown; their day will come to fall. They trust in chariots and horses (Ps. xx. 7), but their chariots shall be overthrown, and those that ride in them. This reads the doom of all the enemies of God's church, and seems likewise designed as a promise of Christ's victory over the powers of darkness; his overthrow of Satan's throne, that throne of kingdoms. All opposing rule, principality, and power, shall be put down, that the kingdom may be delivered up to God, even the Father.

II. He shall be safe under the divine protection in the midst of all these commotions, v. 23. Zerubbabel was active to build God a house, and therefore God makes the same promise to him as he did to David—that he would build him a house, and establish it, even in that day when heaven and earth are shaken. His successors likewise in the government of Judah might take encouragement from it. But this promise has special reference to Christ, who lineally descended from Zerubbabel, and is the sole builder of the gospel-temple. Zerubbabel is here owned as God's servant. I have chosen thee to this office. It is promised that, being chosen, God will make him as a signet. Jeconiah had been as the signet on God's right hand, but was plucked thence (Jer. xxii. 24). He shall be near and dear to God, and his family shall continue till the Messiah spring out of it, who is the signet on God's right hand. Princes sign their edicts, grants, and commissions, with their signet-rings, Esther iii. 10. Our Lord Jesus is the signet on God's right hand, for all power is given to him and derived from him. By him the great charter of the gospel is signed and ratified, and it is in him that all the promises of God are yea and amen.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE PROPHECY OF ZECHARIAH

This prophet was colleague with the prophet Haggai, and a worker together with him in forwarding the building of the second temple (Ezra v. 1). Zechariah began to prophesy some time after Haggai. But he continued longer, soared higher in visions and revelations, and prophesied more particularly concerning Christ, than Haggai had done. He begins with a sermon, expressive of that which was the scope of his prophesying, in the first five verses; but afterwards, to the end of ch. vi, he relates the visions he saw, and the instructions he received from heaven by them. At ch. vii, from an enquiry made by the Jews concerning fasting, he takes occasion to show them the duty of their present day, and to encourage them to hope for God's favour, after which there are two sermons, both called burdens of the word of the Lord (one begins with ch. ix, the other with ch. xii). The scope of them is to reprove for sin, and threaten God's judgments against the impenitent, and to encourage those that feared God with assurances of the mercy God had in store for his church, and especially of the coming of the Messiah and the setting up of his kingdom in the world.

CHAP. I

In this chapter, after the introduction (ver. 1), we have, I. An awakening call to a sinful people to repent and return to God, ver. 2–6. II. Great encouragement given to hope for mercy. 1. By the vision of the horses, ver. 7–11. 2. By the prayer of the angel for Jerusalem, and the answer, ver. 12–17. 3. By the vision of the four carpenters, ver. 18–21.

Verses 1–6

I. The foundation of Zechariah's ministry: The word of the Lord came to him. He received a divine commission to be God's mouth to the people. It came in the evidence and demonstration of the Spirit, as a real thing, and not a fancy. The word of the Lord came first to him in the second year of Darius. Before the captivity the prophets dated their writings by the reigns of the kings of Judah and Israel; but now by the reigns of the kings of Persia, to whom they were subjects. Zechariah preached his first sermon in the eighth month of this second year of Darius; Haggai preached his in the sixth month of the same year, Hag. i. 1. Zechariah was the son of Barachiah, the son of Iddo, and he was the prophet, as Haggai is called the prophet, Hag. i. 1.

II. The first-fruits of Zechariah's ministry. Before he published the promises of mercy, he published calls to repentance, for thus the way of the Lord must be prepared. Law must be first preached, and then gospel. The prophet puts them in mind of the controversy God had had with their fathers (v. 2): "The Lord has been sorely displeased with your fathers. You have seen with your eyes the woeful remains of it." The judgments of God, which those that went before us were under, should be taken as calls to repentance, that we may cut off the curse and get it turned into a blessing. He calls them, in God's name, to return and make their peace with him, v. 3. Let the rebels return to their allegiance, and they shall enjoy all the privileges of good subjects. But that which is most observable here is that God is called here the Lord of hosts three times: Thus saith the Lord of hosts. Turn you to me, saith the Lord of hosts (this intimates the authority and obligation of the command), and I will turn to you, saith the Lord of hosts—this intimates the validity and value of the promise; so that it is no vain repetition. He warns them not to persist in their impenitence, as their fathers had done (v. 4): Be you not as your fathers. We are apt to be governed very much by precedent. Some argued, "Shall we be wiser than our fathers? They never minded the prophets, and why then should we mind them? They made laws against them, and why should we tolerate them?" But they are here taught how they should argue: "Our fathers slighted the prophets, and God was sorely displeased with them for it; therefore let us regard what God says to us by his prophets." "The former prophets cried to your fathers as men in earnest, in the name of the Lord of hosts; and this was the substance of what they said—Turn you now from your evil ways, and from your evil doings; the very same that we now preach to you. A speedy reformation is the only way to prevent an approaching ruin." "What has become both of your fathers and of the prophets that preached to them? They are all dead and gone," v. 5. In another world both we and our prophets shall live for ever; and to prepare for that world ought to be our great care and business in this. "The preachers died, and the hearers died, but the word of God died not; that took effect, and not one iota or tittle of it fell to the ground." Though God's prophets could not fasten convictions upon them, the calamities threatened overtook them, and they could not escape them. The unbelief of man cannot make the threatenings of God's word of no effect. but, sooner or later, they will take place, if the prescribed course be not taken to prevent them. They returned, and said (they changed their mind, and when it was too late to prevent the ruin of their nation they acknowledged), Like as the Lord of hosts thought to do unto us according to our ways and doings, so has he dealt with us, and we must acknowledge both his truth and his justice.

Verses 7–17

Visions and revelations of the Lord; for in that way God chose to speak by Zechariah, to awaken the people's attention. Most of the following visions seem designed for the comfort of the Jews, newly returned out of captivity, and their encouragement to go on with the building of the temple. The scope of this vision (which is an introduction to the rest) is to assure the Jews of the care God took of them, now they seem deserted, and their case deplorable. The vision is dated (v. 7) the twenty-fourth day of the eleventh month, three months after he preached that sermon (v. 1), in which he calls them to repentance. Finding it had a good effect, and that they returned to God in a way of duty, the assurances are confirmed, that God would return to them in a way of mercy.

I. The prophet saw a grove of myrtle-trees, a dark shady grove, down in a bottom, hidden by the adjacent hills. This represented the low, dark, solitary, melancholy condition of the Jewish church at this time. He saw a man mounted upon a red horse, standing in the midst of this shady myrtle-grove. This man is no other than the man Christ Jesus, the same that appeared to Joshua with his sword drawn in his hand as captain of the host of the Lord (Joshua v. 13, 14). Though the church was in a low condition, yet Christ was present in the midst of it. He was riding, as a man of war, as a man in haste, riding on the heavens for the help of his people, Deut. xxxiii. 26. He rode on a red horse, as this same victorious prince appeared red in his apparel, Isa. lxiii. 1, 2. Red is a fiery colour, denoting that he is jealous for Jerusalem (v. 14), and angry at her enemies. Christ, under the law, appeared on a red horse, denoting that he had yet his conflict before him, when he was to resist unto blood. But, under the gospel, he appears on a white horse (Rev. vi. 2, and again ch. xix. 11), denoting that he has now gained the victory. Behind him there were some red horses, and some speckled, and some white, angels attending the Lord Jesus, ready to be employed by him for the service of his church, some in acts of judgment, others of mercy, others in varied events. He had an angel talking with him, as his instructor. Zechariah asked him (v. 9), O my Lord! what are these? The account given him was, These are those whom the Lord has sent; they are his messengers.

II. What the prophet heard, and what instructions were thereby given him. He heard the report which the angels made, v. 11. They had been out abroad, as flying posts, and, having returned, they give this account to the Angel that stood among the myrtle-trees: We have walked to and fro through the earth, and, behold, all the earth sits still and is at rest. We find the world of mankind here very careless: All the earth sits still, and is at rest, while all the church is made uneasy, tossed with tempests and not comforted. Those that are strangers to the church are secure; those that are enemies to it are successful. The Chaldeans and Persians dwell at ease, while the poor Jews are continually alarmed. He heard Christ's intercession with the Father for his afflicted Church, v. 12. The angels related the posture of affairs in this world, but we read not of any prayers they made for the redress of the grievances. It is the Angel among the myrtle-trees who is the great intercessor. Upon the report of the angels he immediately turned heavenward, and said, Lord, wilt thou not have mercy on thy church? How long wilt thou not have mercy! The objects of compassion are Jerusalem, the holy city, and the other cities of Judah that were now in ruins; for God had had indignation against them now threescore and ten years. So long the indignation lasted, and though now for a little space grace had been shown them from the Lord their God, to give them some reviving (Ezra ix. 8), yet the scars of those seventy years' captivity still remained deep. The captivity went off, as it came on, gradually. "Lord, we are still under the burden of the seventy years' wrath, and wilt thou be angry with us for ever?" He heard a gracious reply given to this intercession (v. 13): The Lord answered the angel, this angel of the covenant, with good words and comfortable words, with promises of mercy and deliverance, and the perfecting of what he had begun. He heard that reply which was given to the angel repeated to himself, with a commission to publish it to the children of his people, for their comfort. Now that God would speak comfortably to Jerusalem, Zechariah is the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare you the way of the Lord. The voice said, Cry. The prophets must now cry as loudly to show God's people their comforts as ever they did formerly to show them their transgressions, Isa. xl. 2, 3, 6. He must proclaim the wrath God has in store for the enemies of Jerusalem, v. 14. The earth sat still and was at rest (v. 11), not relenting at all for all the mischief they had done to Jerusalem (v. 15). God is displeased with those who help forward the affliction even of such as suffer justly; for true humanity, in such a case, is good divinity. He must cry, "Thus saith the Lord, I have returned to Jerusalem with mercies (v. 16). I was going away in wrath, but I am now returning in love" (v. 17). The Lord, even the Lord of hosts, assures them, the temple, though it meet with much discouragement, shall be perfected, and they shall have the tokens of God's presence. Jerusalem shall again be built as a city compact together. A line shall be stretched forth upon Jerusalem, in order to the rebuilding of it with exactness and uniformity. The nation shall again become populous and rich. Not only Jerusalem, but other cities that are reduced, shall yet spread abroad. The cities that should thus increase God calls his cities; they are blessed by him, and they are fruitful and multiply, and replenish the land. God has comforts in reserve for Zion and all her mourners. As he first built them up into a people when he brought them out of Egypt, so he will now rebuild them, when he brings them out of Babylon.

In this vision (the second which this prophet had), we have an illustration of God's Spirit making a stand, and making head, against the formidable power of the church's adversaries.

I. We have here the enemies of the church threatening to be its death: I looked and behold four horns (v. 18), which are explained v. 19. They are the horns which have scattered Judah, Israel, and Jerusalem, that is, the Jews both in the country and in the city. They have tossed them (so some read it), as furious bulls with their horns toss. They have scattered them, so that no man did lift up his head, v. 21. They are four horns, for the Jews are surrounded with them on every side. The men of Judah and of Jerusalem, and many of Israel that joined themselves to them, set about building the temple; but enemies from all sides drove them from it. Rehum, and Shimshai, and the other Samaritans that opposed the building of the temple, were these horns, Ezra iv. 8. So were Sanballat and Tobiah, and the Ammonites and Arabians, that opposed the building of the wall, Neh. iv. 7.

II. The friends of the church active and prevailing. The prophet did himself see the four horns, but the Lord then showed him four carpenters, or smiths, who were empowered to cut off these horns, v. 20, 21. With an eye of sense we see the power of the enemies of the church; but it is with an eye of faith that we see it safe, notwithstanding. Carpenters or smiths (for they are supposed by some to have been horns of iron) were the men who had skill and ability to break the horns. Some by these four carpenters understand Zerubbabel and Joshua, Ezra and Nehemiah, who carried on the work of God in spite of the opposition.

CHAP. II

I. Another vision which the prophet saw for the edification of those to whom he was sent, ver. 1, 2. II. A sermon upon it, in the rest of the chapter, 1. By way of explication of the vision, showing it to be a prediction of the replenishing of Jerusalem, ver. 3–5. 2. By way of application. (1) An exhortation to the Jews that were yet in Babylon, pressing them to hasten their return to their own land, ver. 6–9. (2) A consolation to those that were returned, in reference to the many difficulties they had ver. 10–12. (3) A caution to all not to prescribe to God, or limit him, but patiently to wait for him, ver. 13.

Verses 1–5

This prophet was to assure the people (ch. i. 16) that a line should be stretched forth upon Jerusalem.

I. He sees, in a vision, a man going to measure Jerusalem (v. 1, 2): He lifted up his eyes again, and looked. In the close of the foregoing chapter he had seen Jerusalem's enemies baffled and broken, so now he begins to hope she shall not be ruined. The man Christ Jesus, whom the prophet sees with a measuring line in his hand, is the master builder of his church (Heb. iii. 3), and he builds exactly by line and level. Zechariah asked him whither he was going with that measuring line. And he readily told him that he was going to measure Jerusalem, to take account of the dimensions of it each way, that it might be computed what was necessary for the making of a wall about it, and by comparing its dimensions with the vast numbers that should inhabit it, what additions were necessary to be made. When multitudes flock to Jerusalem (Isa. lx. 4) it is time for her to enlarge the place of her tent, Isa. liv. 2.

II. He is informed that this vision means well to Jerusalem. The angel that talked with the prophet went forth, but another angel went out to meet him, to desire that he would first explain this vision to the prophet for his encouragement (v. 4): Jerusalem shall be inhabited as towns without walls; it shall extend itself far beyond the present dimensions. It shall be extended as freely as if it had no walls at all, and yet shall be as safe as if it had the strongest walls, such a multitude of men (which are the best walls of a city) shall there be therein. It shall be safe, for God himself will be a wall of fire round about it. Jerusalem had no walls about it at this time, but now God will be unto her a wall of fire. Some think it alludes to shepherds that made fires about their flocks, or travellers that made fires about their tents in desert places, to frighten wild beasts from them. He will himself be such a wall; a wall of fire round about on every side. God himself will be the glory in the midst of it. Now all this was fulfilled in part in Jerusalem, which in process of time became a very flourishing city, beyond what could have been expected, considering how low it was brought and how long it was ere it recovered itself.

Verses 6–9

One would have thought that Cyrus's proclamation, which gave liberty to the captive Jews to return to their own land, would suffice to bring them all back, but it had not that effect. There were about 40,000 whose spirits God stirred up to go, and they went; but many stayed behind. The land of their captivity was to most of them the land of their nativity; they had taken root there. They had no great affection to their own land, and apprehended the difficulties insuperable. This proceeded from a distrust of the power and promise of God, a love of ease and worldly wealth, and an indifference to the religion of their country and to the God of Israel himself; and it was a tacit censure of those that did return. Here is therefore another proclamation by the God of Israel, commanding all his free-born subjects, wherever dispersed, speedily to return into their own land. They are loudly summoned (v. 6): Ho! ho! come forth, and flee from the land of the north, saith the Lord. This fitly follows upon the promise of the rebuilding of Jerusalem. If God will build it for them they must come and inhabit it for him and his glory, and not continue sneaking in Babylon. They are now dispersed, but should unite for their mutual common defence (v. 6): "I have spread you abroad as the four winds of heaven, some into one corner of the world and some into another, and you should now think of coming together again, to help one another." They are now to assert their liberty: "Deliver thyself, O Zion!" When Christ has proclaimed that deliverance to the captives which he has himself wrought, it concerns each of us to deliver ourselves, and, since we are under grace, to resolve that sin shall not have dominion over us. Deliver thyself, O Zion! by a speedy return to thy own land, and do not destroy thyself by continuing in that polluted land. God now espouses their cause and will plead it with jealousy, v. 8, 9. The angel that talked with the prophet (that is, Jesus Christ) tells him what he had commission to do for their protection and the perfecting of their salvation. Christ, who is the Lord of hosts, says, He (that is, the Father) has sent me. He is sent after the glory. Christ is sent, in the first place, to the nation and people of the Jews, to whom pertained the glory, Rom. ix. 4. But after the glory, after his care of them, he is sent to the nations, to be a light to lighten the Gentiles, by the power of his gospel to captivate them, and bring them into obedience to himself. He is sent to the nations that spoiled them, to take vengeance on them for the wrongs done to Zion. They shall be a spoil to their servants, shall be enslaved to those whom they had enslaved. The promise is fulfilled in Christ's victory over our spiritual enemies, his spoiling principalities and powers and making a show of them openly, Col. ii. 15. What he will do for his church shall be proof of God's affection for it: He that touches you touches the apple of his eye. He takes what is done against her as done against the very apple of his eye, the tenderest part, which nature has put a double guard upon. See (Ps. xvii. 8), Keep me as the apple of the eye, and (Prov. vii. 2), Keep his law as the apple of thy eye.

Verses 10–13

Joy proclaimed to the church of God, to the daughter of Zion, that had separated herself from the daughter of Babylon. The Jews that had returned were in distress, their enemies in the neighbourhood were spiteful, their friends that remained in Babylon were cool and declined coming in to their assistance; and yet they are directed to sing, and to rejoice even in tribulation.

I. God will have a people among them. If their brethren in Babylon will not come to them, those of other nations shall: Many nations shall be joined to the Lord in that day. The Jewish nation, after the captivity, multiplied very much, by the accession of proselytes to it, that were naturalized, and entitled to the privileges of native Israelites. It was strange that that should be so great an offence to the Jews in the apostles' times, which was promised as a blessing in the prophets' times.

II. They shall have his presence among them: Sing and rejoice, for I come. 1. In the dedication of the temple, in their regularly observing all God's institutions there. Those have God dwelling in the midst of them. 2. In the incarnation of Christ. He that promises to dwell among them is that Lord whom the Lord of hosts has sent (v. 11), and therefore must be the Lord Jesus, the eternal Word, that was made flesh, and dwelt among us.

III. They shall have all their ancient dignities and privileges restored to them again, v. 12. Canaan shall be a holy land again. Judah shall be in this holy land, and no longer be scattered in Babylon. Judah shall be God's portion in which he will be glorified. God will protect his people and govern them as a man does his inheritance. He will choose Jerusalem again, will continue it a chosen place, till it must resign its honours to the Jerusalem that is from above.

IV. Here is silence proclaimed to all the world besides, v. 13. The daughter of Zion must sing, but all flesh must be silent. God is about to do something unexpected and to plead his people's cause, which had long seemed neglected. Leave it to God to take his own way, and neither prescribe to him what he should do nor quarrel with him whatever he does. Be still, and know that he is God. Stand still, and see his salvation.

CHAP. III

The vision in the foregoing chapter gave assurances of the re-establishing of the civil interests of the Jewish nation. Now the vision in this chapter concerns their church-state, and their ecclesiastical interests. I. A vision relating to Joshua, as the representative of the church in his time, representing the disadvantages he laboured under, and the people in him, with the redress of the grievances of both. 1. He is accused by Satan, but is brought off by Christ, ver. 1, 2. 2. He appears in filthy garments, but has them changed, ver. 3–5. 3. He is assured of being established in his office if he conduct himself well, ver. 6, 7. II. A sermon relating to Christ, who is here called "The branch", by whom we should have pardon and peace, ver. 8–10.

Verses 1–7

There was a Joshua that was a principal agent in the first settling of Israel in Canaan; here is another of the same name very active in their second settlement there after the captivity; Jesus is the same name, and it signifies Saviour; they were both figures of him that was to come, our chief captain and our chief priest. The angel that talked with Zechariah showed him Joshua the high priest; it is probable that the prophet saw him frequently, and that there was a great intimacy between them; but then he only saw how he appeared before men; how he stands before the Lord must be shown him in vision. He stood before the angel of the Lord, to execute his office. He stood to consult the oracle on behalf of Israel. Guilt and corruption are our two great discouragements when we stand before God obnoxious to his justice and odious to his holiness.

I. Joshua is accused as a criminal, but is justified. 1. A violent opposition is made to him. Satan stands at his right hand to resist him as the prosecutor or witness. When God is about to re-establish the priesthood Satan objects the sins that were found among the priests. It is by our own folly that we give Satan advantage against us. We must expect to meet with all the resistance that Satan's subtlety and malice can give us. Let us then resist him and he shall flee from us. 2. A victorious defence is made (v. 2): The Lord (that is, the Lord Christ) said unto Satan, The Lord rebuke thee. It is the happiness of the saints that the Judge is their friend. Satan is here checked by one that has authority. The Lord said (that is, the Lord our Redeemer), The Lord rebuke thee, that is, the Lord the Creator. The power of God is engaged for the making of the grace of Christ effectual. Satan resists the priest, but his resistance will be to no purpose against Jerusalem, for the Lord has chosen. He knew the worst when he chose them. Is not this a brand plucked out of the fire? Joshua is so, and the priesthood, and the people, whose representative he is. Christ has that to say for them for which they are to be pitied. One can expect no other than that those who but the other day were captives in Babylon should appear mean and despicable. They have been wonderfully delivered out of the fire, that God might be glorified in them; will he then abandon them?

II. Joshua appears as one polluted, but is purified; for he represents the Israel of God, who are all as an unclean thing. He was clothed, not only in coarse, but in filthy garments, such as did very ill become the dignity of his office, and the sanctity of his work, Exod. xxviii. 2. Joshua's garments were a shame and reproach; yet in them he stood before the angel of the Lord; he had no clean linen wherein to minister. This intimates, not only that the priesthood was poor and despised, and loaded with contempt, but that there was iniquity cleaving to the holy things. The returned Jews, because they were free from idolatry, thought themselves chargeable with no iniquity. But God showed them there were many things amiss in them. There were spiritual enemies warring against them, Ezra x. 18. Yet Joshua was permitted to stand before the angel of the Lord. Provision was made for his cleansing. Two things are done for Joshua, representing a double work of divine grace wrought in and for believers: (1) His filthy garments are taken from him, v. 4. The meaning of this is given us in what Christ said, and he said it as one having authority, Behold, I have caused thy iniquity to pass from thee. When God forgives our sins he causes our iniquity to pass from us, he sanctifies the nature and enables us to put off the old man, to cast away from us the filthy rags of our corrupt affections and lusts. (2) He is clothed anew, has not only the shame of his filthiness removed, but the shame of his nakedness covered: I will clothe thee with change of raiment. Joshua had no clean linen of his own, but he shall appear as lovely as ever he appeared loathsome. Thus those whom Christ makes spiritual priests are clothed with the spotless robe of his righteousness and appear before God in that, and with the graces of his Spirit, which are ornaments to them.

III. Joshua is re-installed and established in his office. 1. The crown of the priesthood is put upon him, v. 5. This was done at the request of the prophet. When God designs the restoring or reviving of religion he stirs up his prophets and people to pray for it, and does it in answer to their prayers. Zechariah prayed that the angels might be ordered to set the mitre on Joshua's head, and they did it immediately, and clothed him with the priestly garments. 2. The covenant of the priesthood is renewed with him, which is called God's covenant of peace, Num. xxv. 12. It is the patent of his office, which is here declared and delivered to him before witnesses, v. 6, 7. Joshua must walk in God's ways, must go before the people in the paths of God's commandments, and walk circumspectly. He must also keep God's charge, and must see to it that the inferior priests performed the duties of their place. Let him be sure to do his part, and God will own him. The high priest might not make any new laws for God's house, nor ordain any other rites of worship; but he must judge God's house, that is, he must see to it that God's laws and ordinances were observed. "Thou shalt also keep my courts; thou shalt have oversight of all the courts of the temple, and keep them in good order for worship to be performed in them." I will give thee places to walk among those that stand by. Those that walk in God's ways may be said to walk among the angels themselves, for they do the will of God as the angels do it that are in heaven, and are their fellow-servants, Rev. xix. 10.

Verses 8–10

As the promises made to David often slide insensibly into promises of the Messiah, whose kingdom David's was a type of, so the promises here made to Joshua rise as far upward, and look as far forward, as to Christ, of whose priesthood Joshua's was now a shadow. Christ is a high priest, as Joshua was, for sinners and sufferers.

I. The promise of Christ (v. 8): "Hear now, O Joshua! Thou hast heard what belongs to thyself; but, behold, a greater than Joshua is at hand. Hear now concerning him, thou and the rest of the priests, thy fellows, who sit before thee as learners." They are set for signs, for types and figures of Christ's priesthood. They are men of wonder; they are amazed to think how happily their condition is altered.

II. The promise itself consists of several parts designed for the encouragement of Joshua and his friends in that great work of building the temple. 1. The Messiah shall come: Behold, I will bring forth my servant the branch. He is the branch; so he was called; Isa. iv. 2, The branch of the Lord. Isa. xi. 1, A branch out of the roots of Jesse. His beginning was small, as a tender branch, but in time he should become a great tree, Isa. liii. 2, the branch from which all our fruit must be gathered. He is the stone laid before Joshua, alluding to the foundation, or chief corner-stone, of the temple, which probably was laid, with great solemnity, in the presence of Joshua. Christ is not only the branch, which is the beginning of a tree, but the foundation, which is the beginning of a building. Seven eyes shall be upon him. The eye of his Father was upon him, to protect him, especially in his sufferings. The eyes of all the prophets and Old Testament saints were upon this one stone. The eyes of all believers are upon him; they look unto him and are saved. I will engrave the graving thereof, saith the Lord of hosts. This stone the builders refused, as rough and unsightly; but God undertakes to smooth and polish it and to carve it so that it shall be the head stone of the corner. This stone is a precious stone, though laid for a foundation; and the graving of it seems to allude to the precious stones in the breastplate of the high priest, Exod. xxviii. 21, 22. By him sin shall be taken away, both the guilt and the dominion of it: I will remove the iniquity of that land in one day. When the high priest had the names of Israel engraven on the precious stones he was adorned with he is said to bear the iniquity of the holy things (Exod. xxviii. 38). He bore the iniquity of the land, as a type of Christ; but he could not remove it; the doing of that was reserved for Christ, that blessed Lamb of God, that takes away the sin of the world. Some make the engravings wherewith God engraved him to signify the wounds and stripes which were given to his blessed body, which he underwent for our transgression, and by which we are healed. The effect of all this shall be (v. 10): In that day you shall call every man his neighbour under the vine and fig tree. When iniquity is taken away we repose in tranquillity and are quiet from the fear of evil. We sit down under Christ's shadow with delight, and by it are sheltered from the scorching heat of the curse of the law.

CHAP. IV

Another vision, which, as it was explained to the prophet, had much in it for the encouragement of the people of God in their present straits. The scope of the vision is to show that God would, by his own power, perfect the work. I. The awakening of the prophet to observe the vision, ver. 1. II. The vision itself, of a candlestick with seven lamps, which were supplied with oil, and kept burning, from two olive-trees that grew by it, one on either side, ver. 2, 3. III. The general encouragement hereby to be given to the builders of the temple to go on in that good work, ver. 4–10. IV. The particular explication of the vision, ver. 11–14.

Verses 1–10

I. The prophet prepared to receive the discovery: The angel that talked with him came and waked him, v. 1.

II. The discovery was made to him when he was prepared. He saw a golden candlestick. The church is a candlestick for the enlightening of this dark world and the holding of the light of divine revelation to it. The candle is God's; the church is but the candlestick. This golden candlestick had seven lamps branching out from it, so many sockets, in each of which was a burning and shining light. The Jewish church was but one, but now, under the gospel, Christ is the centre of unity, and not Jerusalem, or any place. This candlestick had one bowl, on the top, into which oil was continually dropping, and from it, by seven pipes, it was diffused to the seven lamps, so that, without any further care, they received oil as fast as they wasted it. They never wanted, nor were ever glutted, and so kept always burning clear. And the bowl too was continually supplied: without any man; for (v. 3) he saw two olive-trees, one on each side the candlestick, that of their own accord poured oil continually into the bowl, which by two larger pipes (v. 12) dispersed the oil to smaller ones and so to the lamps; so that nobody needed to attend this candlestick, which is to show that God easily can, and often does, accomplish his gracious purposes concerning his church, without the aid of man.

III. The enquiry which the prophet made concerning the meaning of this (v. 4): I answered and spoke to the angel, saying, What are these, my lord? He saw what these were, but asked what they signified. The angel answered him with a question, Knowest thou not what these be? He knew there was a golden candlestick in the tabernacle, which it was the priests' constant business to supply with oil. When therefore he saw such a candlestick, with lamps always kept burning, and yet no priests to attend it, he might discern the meaning of this to be that though God had set up the priesthood again, yet he could carry on his work for his people without them.

IV. The general intention of this vision is to assure the prophet that this work of building the temple should, by Providence, and divine grace, be brought to a happy issue, though the enemies of it were many and the friends few. This vision was to illustrate a word to Zerubbabel, to encourage him to go on with the building of the temple. Let him know that he is a worker together with God, and that it is a work which God will own and crown.

1. God will carry on this work, not by external force, but by internal influences upon the minds of men. He will do it, not by human might or power, but by his own Spirit. It was by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts that the people were excited and animated to build the temple; and therefore they are said to be helped by the prophets of God, because they, as the Spirit's mouth, spoke to their hearts, Ezra v. 2. It was by the same Spirit that the heart of Darius was inclined to favour that good work and that the enemies of it were infatuated so that they could not hinder it. When instruments fail, let us therefore leave it to God to do his work himself by his own Spirit.

2. All the difficulties and oppositions that lie in the way shall be removed, even those that seem insuperable (v. 7): Who art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain. The enemies of the Jews are proud and hard as great mountains; but, when God has work to do, the mountains dwindle into mole-hills. Faith will remove mountains and make them plains. Christ is our Zerubbabel; nothing is too hard for his grace to do.

3. The same hand that has begun this good work will perform it: He shall bring forth the head-stone (v. 7); and again (v. 9), The hands of Zerubbabel have laid the foundation of this house, and his hands shall also finish it; herein he is a type of Christ, who is both the author and the finisher of our faith. When the work is finished it must be thankfully acknowledged that it was not by any power of our own, but that it was grace that did it—God's goodwill towards us and his good work in us and for us.

4. This shall be a full ratification of the prophecies which went before concerning the Jews' return. When the temple is finished then thou shalt know that the Lord of hosts has sent me unto you.

5. This shall effectually silence those that looked with contempt upon the beginning of this work, v. 10. In God's work the day of small things is not to be despised. A grain of mustard-seed may become a great tree.

6. Those that despaired of the finishing of the work shall rejoice when they see the plummet in the hand of Zerubbabel.

7. This shall magnify God's providence, which is always employed for the good of his church. Zerubbabel does his part, but it is with those seven, those seven eyes of the Lord which we read of ch. iii. 9. He could do nothing if the gracious providence of God did not go before him and go along with him in it. Those seven eyes that run through the earth are all upon the stone that Zerubbabel is laying straight with his plummet. And those that have the plummet in their hand must have a constant regard to divine Providence, and act in dependence upon its guidance.

Verses 11–14

Enough is said to Zechariah to encourage him, and to enable him to encourage others, and that was the principal intention of the vision he saw; but still he is inquisitive about the particulars.

I. His enquiry. He understood the meaning of the candlestick with its lamps: It is Jerusalem, it is the temple, and their salvation that is to go forth as a lamp that burns; but he wants to know what are these two olive-trees (v. 11), these two olive-branches? v. 12. He took notice not only that the two olive-trees grew, one on the right side and the other on the left side of the candlestick (so nigh, so ready, is divine grace to the church), but that the two olive-branches, from which in particular the candlestick did receive of the root and fatness of the olive, did empty the golden oil out of themselves through the two golden pipes, into the golden bowl on the head of the candlestick. Our Lord Jesus emptied himself, to fill us; his precious blood is the golden oil in which we are supplied with all we need.

II. Now again the angel obliged him to his own ignorance, before he informed him (v. 13): "Knowest thou not what these are? If thou knowest the church to be the candlestick, canst thou think the olive-trees, that supply it with oil, to be any other than the grace of God?" 1. If by the candlestick we understand the visible church, particularly that of the Jews at that time, for whose comfort it was primarily intended, these sons of oil, that stand before the Lord of the whole earth, are the two great ordinances and offices of the magistracy and ministry, at that time lodged in the hands of those two great and good men Zerubbabel and Joshua. Kings and priests were anointed with oil. Their wisdom, courage, and zeal, were continually emptying themselves into the golden bowl, to keep the lamps burning. 2. If by the candlestick we understand the church of the first-born, of true believers, these sons of oil may be meant of Christ and the Spirit, the Redeemer and the Comforter. From Christ, the olive tree, by the Spirit, the olive branch, all the golden oil of grace is communicated to believers, which keeps their lamps burning.

CHAP. V

God's prophets are not only his ambassadors, to treat of peace with the sons of peace, but heralds, to proclaim war against those that delight in war, and persist in their rebellion. In this chapter we have two visions, by which "the wrath of God is revealed against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men". God will do great and kind things for his people; but "let the sinners in Zion be afraid"; for, I. God will reckon severely with those particular persons that are wicked and profane, and that hated to be reformed in these times of reformation; while God is showing kindness to the body of the nation, they and their families shall lie under the curse, which the prophet sees in a flying roll, ver. 1–4. II. If the body of the nation hereafter degenerate, it shall be carried off with a swift destruction, represented by a talent of lead upon the mouth of an ephah, carried upon the wing I know not where, ver. 5–11.

Verses 1–4

We do not find that the prophet now needed to be awakened, as he did ch. iv. 1.

I. He looked up into the air, and behold a flying roll. The angel asks him what he sees? And he gives him this account of it: I see a flying roll, and as near as he can guess by his eye it is twenty cubits long (that is ten yards) and ten cubits broad, that is five yards. The scriptures of the Old Testament and the New are rolls, in which God has written to us the great things of his law and gospel. Christ is the Master of the rolls. They are flying rolls. God's word runs very swiftly, Ps. cxlvii. 15.

II. This flying roll is a curse; it contains a declaration of the righteous wrath of God against those who by swearing affront God's majesty or by stealing invade their neighbours' property. This curse goes forth over the face of the whole earth, not only of the land of Israel. All mankind are liable to the judgment of God. How welcome then the tidings of a Saviour who came to redeem us from the curse of the law by being himself made a curse for us, and, like the prophet, eating this roll! The world is full of sin: so was the Jewish church at this time. But two sorts of sinners are here specified: (1) Thieves; it is for everyone that steals, especially that converts to his own use what was devoted to God, Mal. iii. 8; Neh. xiii. 10. Sacrilege is, without doubt, the worst kind of thievery. (2) Swearers. Sinners of the former class offend against the second table, these against the first. He that swears profanely shall not be held guiltless, much less he that swears falsely (v. 4). He that pronounces the sentence will take care to see it executed. Who can put by or resist the curse which a God of almighty power brings forth? The effect is very dreadful: Everyone that steals shall be cut off, not corrected, but cut off. He shall be cut off as on this side (cut off from this place, that is, from Jerusalem). God will not spare the sinners he finds among his own people, nor shall the holy city be a protection to the unholy. It shall enter into the house of the thief and of him that swears. God's curse cannot be kept out by bars or locks. Unless he repent and reform, there is no way to throw it out. It shall consume it with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof. Sin is the ruin of houses and families, especially the sins of injury and perjury.

Verses 5–11

The foregoing vision was very plain, but in this are things dark and hard to be understood. Some think that it is to foretell the final destruction of the Jewish nation and the dispersion of the Jews, when, by crucifying Christ and persecuting his gospel, they should have filled up the measure of their iniquities.

The prophet was told to turn and he should see greater desolations, v. 5. What is this that goeth forth? The prophet now, through either the distance or the dimness of his sight, could not well tell what it was, v. 6. And the angel tells him both what it is and what it means.

I. He sees an ephah, a measure wherewith they measured corn. And this is their resemblance, the resemblance of the Jewish nation over all the earth, wherever they are now dispersed. And some think that the mentioning of an ephah, which is used in buying and selling, intimates that fraud, and extortion in commerce, were sins abounding among them.

II. He sees a woman sitting in the midst of the ephah, representing the sinful church and nation of the Jews in their latter and degenerate age. He that weighs the hills in a balance measures nations and churches as in an ephah; so exact is he in his judicial dealings with them. God's people are called the corn of his floor, Isa. xxi. 10. And here he puts this corn into the bushel. The angel says of the woman in the ephah, This is wickedness; it is a wicked nation, else God would not have rejected it thus; it is as wicked as wickedness itself.

III. He sees the woman thrust down into the ephah, and a talent, or large weight, of lead, cast upon the mouth of it, by which she is made a prisoner in the ephah. This is designed to show that the wrath of God against impenitent sinners is what they cannot escape. It is insupportable. Guilt is upon the sinner as a talent of lead.

IV. He sees the ephah, with the woman in it, carried away into some far country. The instruments employed to do it were two women, who had wings like those of a stork, and, to make them fly the more swiftly, they had the wind in their wings, denoting the expedition with which the Romans destroyed the Jewish nation. They lifted it up between the earth and the heaven, as unworthy of either and abandoned by both. When the prophet enquired whither they carried their prisoner (v. 10) he was told that they designed to build it a house in the land of Shinar. This intimates that the punishment of the Jews should be a final dispersion; they should be forced to dwell in far countries. There the ephah shall be established, and set upon her own base. Their calamity shall continue from generation to generation. Their iniquity shall continue too, and their hearts shall be hardened in it.

CHAP. VI

The two kingdoms of providence and grace are what we are all interested in All our temporal affairs being in a necessary subjection to divine Providence, and all our spiritual and eternal concerns in a necessary dependence upon divine grace, and these two are represented to us in this chapter— the former by a vision, the latter by a type Here is, I God, as King of nations, in the vision of the four chariots, ver 1-8. II God, as King of saints, ruling the church by the mediation of Christ, in the figure of Joshua the high priest, ver 9 15.

Verses 1–8

The prophet turned and lifted up his eyes and looked. This was the seventh vision he had had. The sight that the prophet had of four chariots drawn by horses of divers colours, v. 1–5. Some by the four chariots understand the four monarchies; and then they read (v. 5), These are the four winds of the heavens, and suppose that therein reference is had to Dan. vii. 2. The Babylonian monarchy, they think, is here represented by the red horses. The second chariot with the black horses is the Persian monarchy, which went forth northward against the Babylonians, and quieted God's Spirit in the north country, by executing his judgments on Babylon and freeing the Jews from their captivity. The white, the Grecians, go forth after them in the north, for they overthrow the Persians. The grizzled, the Romans, who conquered the Grecian empire, are said to go forth towards the south country, because Egypt, which lay southward was subdued by the Romans. The bay horses had been with the grizzled, but afterwards went forth by themselves; and by these they understand the Goths and Vandals.

But I incline rather to understand this vision more generally to represent the administration of the kingdom of Providence in the government of this lower world. The angels are often called the chariots of God, as Ps. lxviii. 17. The various providences of God concerning nations and churches are represented by the different colours of horses, Rev. vi. 2, 4, 5, 8. And so here the counsels and decrees of God are the spring of all events, immovable, as mountains of brass. The chariots came from between the two mountains; for God performs the thing that is appointed for us. We could as soon grasp the mountains in our arms as comprehend the divine counsels in our finite understandings, and as soon remove mountains of brass as alter any of God's purposes. The works of Providence are as chariots, in which he rides as a prince. His providences move swiftly as chariots, directed by his infinite wisdom as chariots by their drivers. The holy angels are the ministers of God's providence, and are employed by him, as the armies of heaven. They are the chariots or the horses that draw the chariots, great in power and might, to carry one prophet to heaven and guard another on earth. The horses in the first chariot were red, signifying war and bloodshed. Those in the second chariot were black, signifying the dismal melancholy consequences of war. Those in the third chariot were white, signifying the return of comfort, and peace, and prosperity, after these dark and dismal times. Those in the fourth chariot were of a mixed colour, grizzled and bay; signifying events interwoven, a day of prosperity and a day of adversity set the one over against the other. These are the four spirits of heaven, the four winds (so some), which seem to blow as they list, from the various points of the compass. Or, rather, These are the angels that go forth from standing before the Lord of all the earth, to behold his glory in the upper world, which is their blessedness, and to serve his glory in this lower world, which is their business. There is an admirable beauty in Providence, and one event serves for a balance to another (v. 6): The black horses went forth, carrying with them very dark and melancholy events, but presently the white went forth after them, carrying joy to those that mourned. Such are God's dealings with his church and people: if the black horses go forth, the white ones presently go after them; for as affliction abounds consolation much more abounds. The grizzled and bay horses were both in the fourth chariot (v. 3), and though they went forth, at first, towards the south country, yet afterwards they sought to walk to and fro through the earth, v. 7. If we go to and fro through the earth, we shall find the events of Providence neither all black nor all white, but ash-coloured, or grey, mixed of black and white. Such is the world we live in. God is well-pleased with all the operations of his providence (v. 8): These have quieted my spirit, these black horses which denote extraordinary judgments, and the white ones which denote extraordinary deliverances, both which went towards the north country. These have quieted my spirit in the north-country, which had of late been the most remarkable scene of action with reference to the church.

God did not only at sundry times, but in divers manners, speak in time past by the prophets to his church. In the former part of this chapter he spoke by a vision, which only the prophet himself saw; here, in this latter part, he speaks by a sign, or type, which many saw, and which was a prediction of the Messiah as the priest and king of his church.

I. The coronation of Joshua the high priest, v. 10, 11. There are two types of Christ in the Old Testament—Joshua the chief captain, a type of Christ the captain of our salvation, and Joshua the chief priest, a type of Christ the high priest of our profession, and both in their day saviours and leaders into Canaan. Joshua was far from being ambitious of a crown, and the people of having a crowned head over them; but the prophet is ordered to crown Joshua as if he had been a king. And Zerubbabel's prudence and piety kept this from being any affront to him. Jews from Babylon brought an offering to the house of God, some of the captivity that came from Babylon on a visit to Jerusalem. Perhaps they came hearing that the building of the temple went on slowly for want of money, with an offering of gold and silver for the service of the house of God. They thought to bring their present to the priest, but God has a prophet ready to receive them and it, which would be an encouragement to them, who, in their captivity, had so often complained, We see not our signs, there is no more any prophet. He was to meet them in the house of Josiah, the son of Zephaniah, who probably kept the treasures of the temple. Crowns are to be made, and put upon the head of Joshua, v. 11. It is supposed that there were two crowns provided, one of silver and the other of gold; the former (as some think) denoting his priestly dignity, the latter his kingly dignity. The sun shines as gold, when he goes forth in his strength; and the beams of the moon, when she walks in brightness, we call silver beams. Those that worshipped the sun and moon shall now fall down before the golden and silver crowns of the Redeemer, before whom the sun shall be ashamed and the moon confounded.

II. "What is the meaning of Joshua's being crowned thus?" The prophet is ready to tell them.

1. God will, in the fulness of time, raise up a great high priest, like Joshua. Joshua is but the figure of one that is to come, a faint shadow of him (v. 12): Speak unto him in the name of the Lord of hosts, that the man whose name is The BRANCH shall grow up out of his place, out of the city of David. Though the family be a root in a dry ground, yet this branch shall spring out of it, as when the sun returns, the flowers spring out of the roots, in which they lay buried out of sight and out of mind.

2. Joshua was active in building the temple, so the man, the branch, shall be the sole builder of the spiritual temple, the gospel-church. He shall build the temple of the Lord.

3. Christ shall bear the glory. Glory is a burden, but not too heavy for him to bear who upholds all things. The cross was his glory, and he bore that; so was the crown an exceeding weight of glory, and he bears that. That which he shall undertake, shall be indeed the glory of Israel. He shall lift up the glory (so it may be read); he shall raise it out of the dust.

4. He shall have a throne, and be both priest and king upon his throne. A throne denotes both dignity and dominion, an exalted honour with an extensive power. Christ, as a priest, ever lives to make intercession for us; but he does it sitting at his Father's right hand, as one having authority, Heb. viii. 1. Christ, who is ordained to offer sacrifices for us, is authorized to give law to us. He will not save us unless we be willing that he should govern us. God has prepared him a throne in the heavens; and, if we would have any benefit by that, we must prepare him a throne in our hearts. This king shall be a priest upon his throne. With the majesty and power of a king, he shall have the tenderness and simplicity of a priest.

5. The counsel of peace shall be between them both. That is, Between Jehovah and the man the branch, between the Father and the Son; concerning the peace to be made between God and man, by the mediation of Christ. Some think it alludes to the former government of the Jews' state, wherein the king and priest, separate officers, did take counsel one with another, for the maintenance of peace and prosperity in church and state, as did Zerubbabel and Joshua now.

6. There shall be a happy coalition between Jews and Gentiles in the gospel-church, and they shall both meet in Christ, the priest upon his throne, as the centre of their unity (v. 15): Those that are far off shall come and build in the temple of the Lord.

7. This will be confirmation of the truth of God's word: You shall know that the Lord of hosts has sent me unto you. That promise, that those that were afar off should assist them in building the temple of the Lord, was a sign. This should be fulfilled now very speedily; see Ezra vi. 13, 14. "For this shall come to pass if you will diligently obey the voice of the Lord your God. You shall have the help of foreigners in building the temple, if you will but set about it in good earnest yourselves."

III. The crowns that were used were not given to Joshua, but must be kept for a memorial in the temple of the Lord, v. 14. Either they were laid up in the temple treasury or (as the Jews' tradition is) they were hung up in the windows of the temple, in the view of all for evidence of the promise of the Messiah.

CHAP. VII

The prophet sees no more such signs as he had seen, but still "the word of the Lord came to him". I. A case of conscience proposed to the prophet by the children of the captivity concerning fasting, ver. 1–3. II. The answer was given by piece-meal, and, it should seem, at several times, for here are four distinct discourses which have all of them reference to this case, ver. 4–8, and ch. viii. 1, 18. In this chapter, 1. The prophet sharply reproves them for the mismanagements of their fasts, ver. 4–7. 2. He exhorts them to reform their lives, which would be the best way of fasting, ver. 8–14. And then in the next chapter, having searched the wound, he binds it up, and heals it, with gracious assurances of mercy which would turn their fasts into feasts.

Verses 1–7

I. Some persons were sent to enquire of the priests and prophets whether they should continue to observe their yearly fasts, particularly that in the fifth month, as they had done. It is uncertain whether the case was put by those that yet remained in Babylon, or by those that had returned, called the people of the land, v. 5. They were Sherezer and Regem-melech, persons of some rank and figure, for they came with their men. They were sent perhaps not with gold and silver (as those, ch. vi. 10, 11), but upon the two great errands which should bring us all to the house of God, (1) To intercede with God for his mercy. They were sent to pray before the Lord, and to offer sacrifice. The Jews, in captivity, prayed towards the temple (as appears Dan. vi. 10); but now that it was to be rebuilt they sent their representatives to pray in it. (2) To enquire of God concerning his mind. They spoke to the priests that were in the house of the Lord and to the prophets. The priests and the prophets were not jealous one of another, nor had any difference among themselves; let not the people then make differences between them, but thank God they had both. They asked (v. 3): Should I weep in the fifth month, separating myself, as I have done these so many years. They kept up solemn stated fasts for humiliation and prayer. They mention only one, that of the fifth month; but it appears, ch. viii. 19, that they observed four anniversary fasts, one in the fourth month (June 17), in remembrance of the breaking up of the wall of Jerusalem (Jer. lii. 6), another in the fifth month (July 4), in remembrance of the burning of the temple (Jer. lii. 12, 13), another in the seventh month (September 3), in remembrance of the killing of Gedaliah, and another in the tenth month (December 10), in remembrance of the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxv. 1. Their present doubt was whether they should continue these fasts or no. The case is put as by a single person: Should I weep? A religious fast must be solemnized, not only by abstinence but by a godly sorrow for sin, here expressed by weeping. "Should I still keep such days to afflict the soul as I have done these so many years?" It is said (v. 5) to be seventy years. Something is to be said for the continuance of these fasts. They were still under the tokens of God's displeasure; and it is unwise for the patient to break off his course of physic while he is sensible of remains of his distemper. But there is something to be said for the letting fall of these fasts. God had returned in mercy to them. Now that the bridegroom has returned, why should the children of the bride-chamber fast? And as to the fast of the fifth month, that, being kept in remembrance of the burning of the temple, might seem to be superseded because the temple was now in a fair way to be rebuilt.

II. Though the question looked plausible enough, those who proposed it were not conscientious in it, for they were more concerned about the ceremony than about the substance. And therefore the first answer to their enquiry is a very sharp reproof of their hypocrisy. Did you at all fast unto me, even to me? He appeals to their own consciences. Was it to me, even to me? The repetition intimates what a great deal of stress is laid upon this as the main matter. To fast, and not fast to God, was to mock him and provoke him. If the solemnities of our fasting, though frequent, long, and severe, do not serve to quicken prayer, and to alter the temper of our minds and the course of our lives for the better, God will not accept them as performed to him. They had the same eye to themselves in their fasting that they had in their eating and drinking (v. 6). The thing they should have done was left undone (v. 7): "Should you not hear the words which the Lord has cried by the former prophets? You must do that which you have not yet done; you must repent of your sins and reform your lives. This is what we now call you to, and it is the same that the former prophets called your fathers to." He puts them in mind of the former flourishing state of their country: Jerusalem was then inhabited and in prosperity, that is now desolate and in distress. But then God by the prophets cried to them to amend their ways or else their prosperity would soon be at an end. "Now," says the prophet, "you should have taken notice of that, and, if you do not, all your fasting and weeping signify nothing."

Verses 8–14

Warning to these hypocritical enquirers, who continued their sins when they asked with great preciseness whether they should continue their fasts.

I. This prophet here repeats what former prophets preached to their fathers (v. 9, 10). The duties required are not keeping fasts and offering sacrifices, but doing justly and loving mercy. Magistrates must administer justice impartially. Neighbours must have a tender concern for one another. The infirmities of others, as well as their calamities, are to be looked upon with compassion. Let none of you imagine evil against his brother in your heart.

II. He describes the wilfulness and disobedience of their fathers (v. 11, 12). If they did hear what was said to them, and seemed inclined at first to comply with it, yet like a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke, they pulled away the shoulder, and would not submit to the easy yoke and light burden of God's commandments. They gave a withdrawing shoulder (so the word is); they seemed to lay their shoulder to the work, but they presently withdrew it again, as those Jer. xxxiv. 10, 11. They made their hearts as an adamant-stone, as a diamond, the hardest of stones to be wrought upon, or as a flint. Nothing is so hard, so unmalleable as the heart of a presumptuous sinner. The reason why men are not good is because they will not be so; they will not consider, will not comply; and therefore God says, if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it.

III. He shows the fatal consequences to their fathers: Therefore came great wrath from the Lord of hosts. As they had turned a deaf ear to God's word, so God turned a deaf ear to their prayers, v. 13. As they flew from their allegiance to God, so God dissipated them and threw them about as chaff before a whirlwind: He scattered them among all the nations whom they knew not, v. 14. As they violated all the laws of their land, so God took away all the glories of it: Their land was desolate after them, and no man passed through or returned. It was not so much the Chaldeans that did it. No; they did it themselves.

CHAP. VIII

The prophet here is ordered to change his voice, and to speak by way of encouragement to the willing and obedient. In these messages (ver. 1) God promises that Jerusalem shall be restored, reformed (ver. 2–8), that the country shall be rich, their reputation retrieved, and their state the reverse of what it had been for many years past (ver. 9–15); he then exhorts them to reform what was amiss, that they might be ready for these favours designed, ver. 16, 17. In ver. 18 he promises that their fasts should be superseded by the return of mercy (ver. 19), and that they should be strengthened, by the accession of foreigners to them, ver. 20–23.

Verses 1–8

The prophet designed to bring them to repentance not to drive them to despair, so here sets before them the great things God had in store for them.

I. God will appear for Jerusalem, and will be revenged on Zion's enemies (v. 2). The great wrath that was against her (ch. vii. 12) now turns against her adversaries. "I have returned to Zion, after I had seemed so long to stand at a distance, and I will again dwell in the midst of Jerusalem as formerly." This secures to them the tokens of his presence in his ordinances and in his providences.

II. There shall be a wonderful reformation in Jerusalem, and religion shall flourish there. Jerusalem, that has dealt treacherously both with God and man, shall become so famous for fidelity and honesty that it shall be called and known by the name of a city of truth, and the inhabitants of it shall be called children that will not lie.

III. There shall be in Jerusalem a great increase of people, and all the marks of a profound tranquillity. In the streets of Jerusalem, that had been filled with the bodies of the slain, shall now dwell old men and old women, who have not been cut off by untimely deaths, but have the even thread of their days spun out to a full length; they shall go to their grave in a full age, as a shock of corn in his season. The hoary head, as it is a crown of glory to those that wear it, so it is to the places where they live. It is a graceful thing to a city to see abundance of old people in it; it is a sign, not only of the healthfulness of the air, but of the prevalence of virtue and the banishment of vices, a sign, not only that the climate is temperate, but that the people are so. You may look with as much pleasure upon the generation that is rising up in their room (v. 5): The streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets. Their children shall be healthful, and strong, shall be hearty and cheerful. It is their pleasant playing age; let us not grudge it to them; much good may it do them and no harm. They shall not be terrified with the alarms of war, but enjoy a perfect security.

IV. The scattered Israelites shall be brought together again from all parts whither they were dispersed (v. 7): "I will save my people from the east country, and from the west; I will save them from being lost, or losing themselves, in Babylon, or in Egypt, or in any other country whither they were driven."

V. God would renew his covenant with them: They shall be my people and I will be their God. That is the foundation and crown of all these promises, and is inclusive of all happiness. God will never leave nor forsake them in a way of mercy, as he has promised them; and they shall never leave nor forsake him in a way of duty, as they have promised him. These promises were fulfilled in the flourishing state of the Jewish church, between the captivity and Christ's time; they were to have a further and a fuller accomplishment in the gospel-church, but the fullest accomplishment of all will be in the future state.

All doubts of God's people are silenced with that question (v. 6): "If it be marvellous in the eyes of this people, should it be marvellous in my eyes? If it seem unlikely to you that ever Jerusalem should be thus repaired, should be thus replenished, is it therefore impossible with God?"

Verses 9–17

God, by the prophet, here gives further assurances of the mercy he had in store for Judah and Jerusalem. These verses contain strong encouragements.

I. These encouragements belong—to those who, in obedience to the call of God by his prophets, applied in good earnest to the building of the temple (v. 9). Those, and those only, that are employed for God, may expect to be encouraged by him; those who lay their hands to the plough of duty shall have them strengthened with the promises of mercy.

II. The discouragements they had hitherto laboured under, v. 10, are mentioned as a foil to the blessings God was now about to bestow upon them. Before these days of reformation began there was no hire for man, nor any hire for beasts. The fruits of the earth were thin and poor. Merchants had no goods to export, so that they needed not to hire either men or beasts. There was no such thing as friendship or good neighbourship among them: I set all men everyone against his neighbour. In this there was a great deal of sin, for these wars and fightings came from men's lust.

III. "Thus and thus you have been harassed and afflicted, but now God will change his way towards you, v. 11. Now that you return to your duty the ebbing tide shall flow again." They shall have great plenty and abundance of all good things (v. 12). The heavens shall give their dew, without which the earth would not yield her increase, which is a constant intimation to us of the beneficence of the God of heaven to men on earth and of their dependence on him. They shall recover their credit among their neighbours (v. 13). The blessed of the Lord are the blessing of the land, and should be so accounted. God himself will determine to do them good, v. 14, 15.

IV. Let them take comfort in these promises: Fear you not (v. 15); let your hands be strong (v. 9 and v. 13). Let them do the duty which those promises call for from them, v. 16, 17. "Leave it to God to perform for you what he has promised, in his own way and time, but upon condition that you make conscience of your duty. These are the things then that you shall do. You must never tell a lie, but Speak you every man the truth to his neighbour. Execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates. Let the judges that sit in the gates have regard both to truth and to peace. No man must bear malice against his neighbour. Great reverence must be had for an oath, and conscience made of it." The things there forbidden are all of them found among the seven things which the Lord hates, Prov. vi. 16–19.

Verses 18–23

These verses contain two precious promises, for the further encouragement of those Jews that were building the temple.

I. Their fasts should be converted into thanksgiving days, v. 19. Joyous times will come to the church after troublous times; if weeping endure for more than a night, and joy come not next morning, yet the morning will come that will introduce it at length. Let the truths of God rule in your heads, and let the peace of God rule in your hearts.

II. A great accession should be made to the church by the conversion of many foreigners, v. 20–23. This was fulfilled in part when, in the latter times of the Jewish church, there were many proselytes from countries nearby or remote, who came yearly to worship at Jerusalem, which added to the grandeur and wealth of that city, making it considerable before our Saviour's time, though now it was but just peeping out of its ruins. But it would be accomplished much more fully in the conversion of the Gentiles to the faith of Christ, and incorporating them with the believing Jews in one body, under Christ the head (Rom. xvi. 26). The inhabitants of many cities shall embrace the gospel of Christ; yea, many people and strong nations (v. 22), some of all languages, v. 23. They shall come to pray before the Lord and to seek the Lord of hosts (v. 21). Converts to God and members of the church are such as seek the Lord of hosts, such as enquire for God their Maker, and are sincerely devoted to his honour and glory. They are such as pray before the Lord. They shall be zealous in exciting one another to it (v. 21): The inhabitants of one city shall go to another, and they shall say, Let us go speedily to pray before the Lord; I will go also. Those who are brought into an acquaintance with Christ themselves should do all they can to bring others; thus Andrew invited Peter to Christ and Philip invited Nathanael. True grace hates monopolies. As iron sharpens iron, so may good men sharpen the countenances and spirits one of another in that which is good. They shall join themselves to the church, not for the church's sake, but for his sake who dwells in it (v. 23). This intimates the great honour they have for a Jew, as one of the chosen people of God. We will go with you, for we have heard that God is with you.

CHAP. IX

"The burden of the word of the Lord." I. A prophecy against the Jews' unrighteous neighbours—the Syrians, Tyrians, Philistines, and others (ver. 1–6), with an intimation of mercy to some of them, in their conversion (ver. 7), and a promise of mercy to God's people, in their protection, ver. 8. II. A prophecy of their righteous King, the Messiah, and his coming (ver. 9), and of his kingdom, ver. 10. III. An account of the obligation the Jews lay under to Christ for their deliverance out of captivity, ver. 11, 12. IV. A prophecy of the victories God would grant to the Jews over their enemies, as typical of our great deliverance by Christ, ver. 13–15. V. A promise of great plenty and joy, and honour, which God had for his people (ver. 16, 17).

Verses 1–8

I. The Syrians had been bad neighbours to Israel. The word of the Lord shall be a burden in the land of Hadrach, that is, of Syria. Damascus is the metropolis of that kingdom, and the judgments here threatened shall lie upon it. And the reason of this burden's resting on Damascus is because the eyes of man, as of all the tribes of Israel (or rather, even of all the tribes of Israel), are towards the Lord, because the people of God by faith and prayer look up to him for succour and relief against their enemies. When St. Paul was converted at Damascus, and preached there, and disputed with the Jews, then the word of the Lord might be said to rest there, and then the eyes of men, of other men besides the tribes of Israel, began to be towards the Lord; see Acts ix. 22.

II. Tyre and Zidon come next to be called to account as in other prophecies, v. 2–4. Tyrus flourishing, thinking herself very safe, is ready to set God's judgments at defiance. She is very wise. It is spoken ironically; she thinks herself very wise! But there is no wisdom nor counsel against the Lord; nay, it is his honour to take the wise in their own craftiness. Tyrus did build herself a stronghold, which she thought could never be brought down nor got over. By her vast trade she has heaped up silver as the dust, as common as heaps of sand. Tyre made fine gold to be as the mire of the streets. Her wisdom, and wealth, and strength, shall not be able to secure her (v. 4): The Lord will cast her out of that stronghold wherein she has fortified herself, will make her poor. God will smite her power in the sea; her being surrounded by the water shall not secure her, but she shall be devoured with fire, and burnt down to the ground.

III. God next contends with the Philistines, with their great cities that bordered southward upon Israel. Now Ashkelon shall see the ruin of her friends and allies, and shall fear; Gaza also shall see it, and be very sorrowful, and Ekron. What will become of their house when their neighbour's is on fire? They shall themselves be ruined and wasted. The king shall perish from Gaza. Ashkelon shall not be inhabited. Foreigners shall take possession of their land (v. 6): A bastard shall dwell in Ashdod. And thus God will cut off the pride of the Philistines. This prophecy of the destruction of the Philistines, and of Damascus, and Tyre, was accomplished, not long after this, by Alexander the Great, who ravaged all these countries, took the cities, and planted colonies in them. Some understand v. 7 as a promise that God would take away the sins of these nations—their blood and their abominations, their cruelties and their idolatries. He would preserve a remnant even of these nations, that should be monuments of his mercy and grace. Their birth shall be no bar to their acceptance with God, but a Philistine shall be as acceptable to God, upon gospel-terms, as one of Judah, and a man of Ekron shall be as a Jebusite, or a man of Jerusalem.

IV. In all this God intends mercy for Israel, and it is in kindness to them that God will deal thus with the neighbouring nations. Thus some understand the seventh verse. God would deliver his people from their bloody adversaries, when they were just ready to devour them and make a prey of them: I will take away his blood (that is, the blood of Israel) out of the mouth of the Philistines and from between their teeth (Amos iii. 12). And he that remains (that is, the remnant of Israel) shall be for our God, shall be taken into his favour, shall own him and be owned by him, and he shall be as a governor in Judah. However it is plainly the sense of v. 8 that God will take his people under his special protection, and therefore will weaken their neighbours, that it may not be in their power to do them a mischief: I will encamp about my house because of the army. When the times are perilous, when armies are marching, and all bearing ill-will to Zion, then Providence will as it were double its guards upon the church of God, because of him that passes by and because of him that returns, that whether he return a conqueror or conquered he may do it no harm. This was fulfilled when, for some time after the struggles of the Maccabees, Judæa was a free and flourishing state, or perhaps when Alexander the Great, struck with an awe of Jaddus the high priest, favoured the Jews, and took them under his protection, when he wasted the neighbouring countries.

Verses 9–11

Here begins a prophecy of the Messiah and his kingdom with express application to Christ's riding in triumph into Jerusalem, Matt. xxi. 6; John xii. 15.

I. The approach of the Messiah promised, as matter of great joy to the Old Testament church: Behold, thy king cometh unto thee. Christ is a king, a sovereign prince, having all power both in heaven and on earth. In the gospel-church his spiritual kingdom is administered. "This King has been long in coming, but now, behold, he cometh; he is at the door. There are but a few ages more to run out, and he that shall come will come."

II. Here is such a description of him as renders his coming to them very acceptable. 1. He is a righteous ruler; he is just. 2. He is a powerful protector to all those that bear faith and true allegiance to him, for he has salvation; he has it in his power to bestow upon all his subjects. He is a meek, humble, tender Father to all his subjects as his children; he is lowly; he is poor and afflicted (so the word signifies); having emptied himself, he was despised and rejected of men. He is meek, not taking state upon him, nor resenting injuries, but humbling himself from first to last. (Matt. xi. 29, Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart.) When he made his public entry into his own city (and it was the only passage of his life that had anything in it magnificent in the eye of the world), he chose to ride, not upon a stately horse, or in a chariot, as great men used to ride, but upon an ass, nor was it an ass fitted for use, but an ass's colt, a little foolish unmanageable thing, likely to disgrace his rider. He had no saddle, no trappings, no equipage, but his disciples' clothes thrown upon the colt; for he made himself of no reputation when he visited us in great humility.

III. His kingdom is here set forth in the glory of it. This king has a kingdom, not of this world, but a spiritual kingdom, a kingdom of heaven. It shall not be set up by carnal weapons of warfare. No; he will cut off the chariot from Ephraim and the horses from Jerusalem (v. 10), in kindness to his people, that they may not cut themselves off from God by putting confidence in them which they should put in the power of God only. He will establish his kingdom by proclaiming peace on earth goodwill towards men. As far as it prevails in the minds of men and has the ascendant over them, it will make them peaceable, and slay all enmities; it will cut off the battle-bow, and beat swords into plough-shares. The preachers of the gospel shall carry it from one country to another till the remotest corners of the world are enlightened by it.

IV. The great benefit procured for mankind by the Messiah, is redemption from extreme misery, typified by the deliverance of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon (v. 11). I have sent forth thy prisoners, thy captives out of Babylon, which was to them as a pit in which was no water. It was part of the covenant that, if in the land of their captivity, they sought the Lord, he would be found of them, Lev. xxvi. 42, 44, 45; Deut. xxx. 4. It was by the blood of that covenant, typifying the blood of Christ, in whom all God's covenants with man are yea and amen, that they were released out of captivity; and this was but a shadow of the great salvation wrought out by thy King, O daughter of Zion!

The prophet, having taught those that had returned out of captivity to attribute their deliverance to the blood of the covenant and to the promise of the Messiah, now cheers them with the prospect of a joyful and happy settlement; but these promises have their full accomplishment in the spiritual blessings of the gospel which we enjoy by Jesus Christ.

I. They are invited to look unto Christ, and flee unto him as their city of refuge (v. 12): Turn you to the stronghold, you prisoners of hope. The Jews that had returned out of captivity into their own land were prisoners of hope, or expectation, for God had given them a little reviving in their bondage, Ezra ix. 8, 9. Those that continued in Babylon yet lived in hope some time or other to see their own land again. Now both these are directed to turn their eyes upon the Messiah. The promise of the Messiah was the stronghold of the faithful long before his coming; they saw his day at a distance and were glad, Luke ii. 25, 28. This invitation to the stronghold speaks the language of the gospel-call, v. 12. Sinners are prisoners, but they are prisoners of hope; Christ is a stronghold for them.

II. They are assured of God's favour to them: "I will render double unto thee, to everyone of you prisoners of hope." As a pledge of this, in the fulness of time God here promises to the Jews victory, plenty, and joy, in their own land, which should be but a type of more glorious victories, riches, and joys, in the kingdom of Christ.

1. They shall triumph over their enemies. The Jews, after their return, were surrounded with enemies on all sides. But it is here promised that the Lord would deliver them. They shall be instruments in God's hand for the defeating and baffling of their persecutors: "I have bent Judah for me, as my bow of steel; that bow I have filled with Ephraim as my arrows, have drawn it up to its full bent, till the arrow be at the head." But let them not think that they gain their successes by their own bow, for they themselves are no more than God's bow and his arrows, tools in his hands, which he manages as he pleases. The following words explain this: I have raised up and animated thy sons, O Zion! against thy sons, O Greece! This was fulfilled when against Antiochus, one of the kings of the Grecian monarchy, the people that knew their God were strong and did exploits, Dan. xi. 32. God will be commander-in-chief in every engagement (v. 14): The Lord shall be seen over them. Is their army to be mustered, and brought into the field? The Lord shall blow the trumpet, to gather the forces together, and to give directions. Whatever enterprise the campaign is opened with, God shall go forth at the head with whirlwinds of the south, which were of incredible swiftness and before these whirlwinds thy sons, O Greece! shall be as chaff. Is the army actually engaged? God's arrows shall go forth as lightning. He sent out his arrows and scattered them. This alludes to that which God had done for Israel of old when he brought them out of Egypt, and into Canaan, and had its accomplishment partly in the wonderful successes which the Jews had in the time of the Maccabees, but perfectly in the glorious victories gained by the cross of Christ over Satan and all the powers of darkness. Did their enemies hope to swallow them up? It shall be turned upon them, and they shall devour their enemies, and shall subdue with sling-stones. The stones of the brook, when God pleases, shall do as great execution as the best train of artillery.

2. They shall triumph in their God. They shall take the comfort and give God the glory of their successes. So some read v. 15. They shall eat (that is, they shall quietly enjoy) what they have got. And, in the fulness of their joy, they shall offer abundance of sacrifices to the honour of God, so that they shall fill both the bowls and the corners of the altar with the fat and blood of their sacrifices. They shall triumph in the relation wherein they stand to him, that they are the flock of his people and he is their Shepherd, and that they are to him as the stones of a crown, very precious and of great value, and kept under a strong guard. And they shall be lifted up as an ensign upon his land, as the royal standard is displayed in token of triumph and joy. For how great is his goodness and how great is his beauty! This is the burden of the songs wherewith they shall make a noise before the Lord. This may refer to the Messiah, to Zion's King that cometh. See that king in his beauty (Isa. xxxiii. 17), who is the fairest of ten thousand, and altogether lovely. Though, in the eye of the world, he had no form or comeliness, in the eye of faith how great is his beauty! How great is his goodness! How rich in mercy is he! Here is an instance of his goodness to his people: Corn shall make the young men cheerful and new wine the maids; that is, God will bless his people with an abundance of the fruits of the earth.

CHAP. X

The scope of this chapter is to encourage the Jews that had returned with hopes that though they had been under divine rebukes for their negligence in rebuilding the temple, and were now surrounded with enemies, yet God would make them prosperous at home and victorious abroad. I. They are here directed, both in the evils they suffered and in the comforts they desired, to acknowledge his hand, ver. 1–4. II. They are encouraged to expect strength and success from him in all their struggles, ver. 5–12.

Verses 1–4

Gracious things and glorious were promised to this poor afflicted people in the foregoing chapter. God intimates to them that he expects they should acknowledge him in all their ways and in all his ways towards them.

I. The prophet directs them to apply to God by prayer for rain in the season thereof. "Ask you of the Lord rain. Do not pray to the clouds, nor to the stars, for rain, but to the Lord." The former rain fell at the seed-time, in autumn, the latter fell in the spring, between March and May, which brought the corn to an ear and filled it. If either of these rains failed, it was very bad with that land. We must, in our prayers dutifully attend the course of Providence; we must ask for mercies in their proper time, and not expect that God should go out of his usual way and method for us. So the Lord shall make bright clouds (which, though they are without rain themselves, are yet presages of rain)—lightnings (so the margin reads it), for he maketh lightnings for the rain.

II. He shows them the folly of making their addresses to idols (v. 2): The idols have spoken vanity. The diviners, who were the prophets of those idols, have seen a lie (their visions were all a cheat and a sham); and they have told false dreams, which proved that they were not from God. They not only got nothing by the false gods, but they lost the favour of the true God, for therefore they went their way into captivity as a flock, and they were troubled as scattered sheep are, because there was no shepherd. Those that wandered after strange gods were made to wander into strange nations.

III. He shows them the hand of God in events, both those that made against them and those that made for them, v. 3. When everything went cross it was God that walked contrary to them (v. 3): "My anger was kindled against the shepherds that should have fed the flock, but neglected it, and starved it. I was displeased at the wicked magistrates and ministers, the idol-shepherds." The captivity in Babylon was a token of God's anger against them; in it likewise he punished the goats, those of the flock that were filthy and mischievous. When things began to change for the better it was God that gave them the happy turn. "He has now visited his flock with favour, and has made them as his goodly horse in the battle, managed and made use of them, as a man does the horse he rides on, has made them valuable in themselves and formidable to those about them, as his goodly horse."

IV. He shows them that every creature is to them what God makes it to be (v. 4): Out of him came forth the corner, out of him the nails. Out of him came the combined force of their enemies; nor could they have had such power unless it had been given them from above. All the power likewise that was engaged for them was derived from him. Out of him came forth the corner-stone of the building, the power of magistrates, which keeps the several parts of the state together. Out of him came forth the nail that fixed the state (Isa. xxii. 23), the nail in his holy place, Ezra ix. 8. Out of him came forth the battle-bow, the military power, and out of him every oppressor.

Verses 5–12

Precious promises made to the people of God, which look further than to the state of the Jews, and have certain reference to the spiritual Israel of God, the gospel-church, and all true believers.

I. They shall have favour and presence, and shall be owned and accepted of him. This is the foundation of all the rest: The Lord is with them,

v. 5. Again (v. 6), I have mercy upon them. All their dignity and joy are owing purely to God's mercy; and mercy, as it supposes misery, so it excludes merit. They shall be as though I had not cast them off. Such favour does God show to returning repenting sinners, such fellowship are they admitted into, and such freedom does he use with them, that they are as though they had never been cast off. I am the Lord their God, according to the original contract, the covenant made with their fathers.

II. They shall be victorious over their enemies. (v. 5): They shall be as mighty men, that are both strong in body and bold in spirit, effective men. They shall, as mighty men, tread down their enemies in the battle because the Lord is with them. Some would argue that they may therefore sit still, and do nothing, because the Lord is with them, who can and will do all. No; God's gracious presence with us to help us must not supersede, but quicken and animate, our endeavours to help ourselves. Then the riders on horses shall be confounded. The preachers of the gospel of Christ went forth to war a good warfare; they charged bravely, because God was with them; and the riders on horses that opposed them were confounded. But whence have they all this might? It is in the Lord, and in the power of his might, that they are so (v. 6). God saves us by strengthening us, and works out our happiness by working in us to do our duty.

III. Those of them that are dispersed shall be gathered together into one body (v. 6): I will bring them again to place them, bring them from other lands to place them in their own land. In order to this (v. 8) I will hiss for them, or, rather, whistle for them, as the shepherd with his pipe calls his sheep together, that know his voice; and so I will gather them. I will gather them, for I have redeemed them. It has its spiritual accomplishment in the gathering in of precious souls out of a bondage worse than that in Egypt or Assyria, and the bringing of them into the glorious liberties of the children of God. All the land of promise is theirs, even Gilead and Lebanon. How shall a people so dispersed be got together? The difficulties seem insuperable, but they shall be got over as effectually as those that lay in the way of their deliverance out of Egypt and their entrance into Canaan: He shall pass through the sea with affliction, as of old through the Red Sea. And all the deeps of the river shall dry up, as Jordan did to make way for Israel's passage into that good land which God had given them. Does the pride of Assyria stand in the way of their deliverance? He shall give check to it who sets bounds to the proud waves of the sea. Does the sceptre of Egypt oppose it? That shall depart away. When the gospel-church was to be gathered out of all nations by the preaching of the gospel, great opposition was given to it by the enraged powers of earth and hell. But, by divine power it became mighty to the pulling down of strongholds, and the conversion and salvation of thousands. Then the sea fled, and Jordan was driven back at the presence of the Lord.

IV. They shall greatly multiply, and the church, that new world, shall be replenished (v. 8): They shall increase as they have increased formerly in Egypt. In Judah only God had been known, and his name was great in Israel only; here only he revealed his statutes and judgments. But in gospel-times that place shall be much too strait; the church's tent must be enlarged. Then I will sow them among the people, v. 9. Their scattering shall be like the scattering of seed in the ground, not to bury it, but to increase it. The Jews that came from all parts to worship at Jerusalem fetched thence the gospel light and fire to their own countries, as those Acts ii, and the eunuch, Acts viii. And their own synagogues in the several cities of the Gentiles were the first receptacles of the apostles and their preaching. Thus when God sowed them among the people he took care that they should remember him, and make mention of his name in far countries; and, by keeping up the knowledge of God among them as he had revealed himself in the Old Testament, they would be the more ready to admit the knowledge of Christ as he has revealed himself in the New Testament.

V. God himself will be both their strength and their song. In him they shall be comforted, and shall have abundant satisfaction (v. 7). When we resolutely resist, and so overcome, our spiritual enemies, then our hearts shall rejoice. And with graces joys shall be propagated: Their children shall see it and be glad, and their hearts also shall rejoice in the Lord. It is good to acquaint children betimes with the delights of religion, and to make the services of it pleasant, that, learning betimes to rejoice in the Lord, they may cleave to him. If God strengthen us (v. 12) we must bestir ourselves, must walk up and down in all the duties of the Christian life. To us to live must be Christ; and, whatever we do in word or deed, we must do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, that we receive not the strengthening grace of God in vain. See Ps. lxxx. 17, 18.

CHAP. XI

Here is, I. A prediction of the destruction that should come upon the Jewish nation, ver. 1-3. II. The putting of it into the hands of the Messiah. 1. He is charged with the custody of that flock, ver. 4-6. 2. He undertakes it, and bears rule in it, ver. 7, 8. 3. Finding it perverse, he gives it up (ver. 9), breaks his shepherd's staff (ver. 10, 11), resents the indignation done him and the contempt put upon him (ver. 12, 13), and then breaks his other staff, ver. 14. 4. He turns them over into the hands of foolish shepherds, who, instead of preventing, shall complete their ruin, and both the blind leaders and the blind followers shall fall together into the ditch, ver. 15-17.

Verses 1-3

In dark and figurative expressions, as is usual in the scripture predictions of things at a great distance, that destruction of Jerusalem and of the Jewish church and nation is here foretold which our Lord Jesus, when the time was at hand, prophesied of very plainly and expressly. 1. Preparation made for that destruction (v. 1): "Open thy doors, O Lebanon! Thou wouldst not open them to let thy king in. Now thou must open them to let thy ruin in. Some by Lebanon here understand the temple which was built of cedars from Lebanon. It was burnt with fire by the Romans, and its gates were forced open by the fury of the soldiers. Others understand it of Jerusalem, or rather of the whole land of Canaan, to which Lebanon was an inlet on the north. All shall lie open to the invader, and the cedars, the mighty and eminent men, shall be devoured, which cannot but alarm those of an inferior rank, v. 2. If the cedars have fallen let the fir-tree howl. How can the slender fir-trees stand if stately cedars fall? And let the oaks of Bashan, that lie exposed to every injury, howl, for the forest of the vintage (or the flourishing vineyard, that used to be guarded with a particular care) has come down, or (as some read it) when the defenced forests, such as Lebanon was, have come down. 2. Lamentation made for the destruction (v. 3): There is a voice of howling. Those who have fallen howl for grief and shame, and those who see their own turn coming howl for fear. The great men especially receive the alarm with the utmost confusion. Those great men were by office shepherds, and such should have protected God's flock committed to their charge; it is the duty both of princes and priests. But they were as young lions, that made themselves a terror to the flock. The young lions howl, for the pride of Jordan is spoiled. The pride of Jordan was the thickets on the banks, in which the lions reposed when the river overflowed, the lions came up from them (as we read Jer. xlix. 19), and they came up roaring.

Verses 4–14

The prophet here is made a type of Christ, as the prophet Isaiah sometimes was; and the scope of these verses is to show that for judgment Christ came into this world (John ix. 39), for judgment to the Jewish church and nation, which were, about the time of his coming, corrupted by the worldliness and hypocrisy of their rulers. Christ would have healed them, but they would not be healed.

I. The desperate case of the Jewish church, under the tyranny of their own governors, v. 5. In Zechariah's time we find the rulers and the nobles justly rebuked for exacting usury of their brethren, Neh. v. 7, 15. In Christ's time the Sadducees, who were deists, corrupted their judgments. The Pharisees, who were bigots for superstition, corrupted their morals, by making void the commandments of God, Matt. xv. 16. Thus they slew the sheep of the flock, thus they sold them. They affronted God, by giving him thanks. They said, Blessed be the Lord, for I am rich, as if, because they prospered in their wickedness God had made himself patron of their unjust practices. Christ had compassion on the multitude because they fainted and were scattered abroad, as if they had no shepherd (as really they had worse than none). It is ill for a church when its pastors can look upon the ignorant, the foolish, the wicked, the weak, without pity.

II. The sentence of God's wrath passed upon them for their stupidity. And, as their shepherds pitied them not, so they did not bemoan themselves; therefore God says (v. 6), "I will no more pity the inhabitants of the land." Those who are willing to have their consciences oppressed by those who teach for doctrines the commandments of men are often punished by oppression in their civil interests, and justly, for those forfeit their own rights who tamely give up God's rights. He will deliver them into the hand of oppressors, everyone into his neighbour's hand. They shall be delivered everyone into the hand of his king, whom they chose to submit to rather than to Christ.

III. A trial yet made whether their ruin might be prevented by sending Christ among them as a shepherd, Matt. xxi. 37. Divers of the prophets had spoken of him as the Shepherd of Israel, Isa. xl. 11; Ezek. xxxiv. 23. He himself told the Pharisees that he was the Shepherd of the sheep (John x. 1, 2, 11), apparently referring to this passage, where we have, 1. The charge he received from his Father to try what might be done with this flock (v. 4); Thus saith the Lord my God, Feed the flock of the slaughter. The Jews were God's flock, but they were the flock of slaughter, for their enemies had killed them all the day long. 2. His acceptance of this charge, v. 7. Christ will care for these lost sheep; he will go about among them, teaching and healing even you, O poor of the flock! His disciples, who were his constant attendants, were of the poor of the flock. I took unto me two staves, pastoral staves; other shepherds have but one crook, but Christ had two, denoting what he did both for the souls and for the bodies of men. David speaks of God's rod and his staff (Ps. xxiii. 4), a correcting rod and a supporting staff. One staff he called Beauty, denoting the Temple; the other he called Bands, denoting their civil state. Christ, in his gospel, and in all he did consulted the advancement both of their civil and of their sacred interests. The chief Shepherd fed the flock (v. 7), and displaced those under-shepherds that were false to their trust (v. 8): Three shepherds I cut off in one month.

IV. Their enmity to Christ. He came to the sheep of his own pasture; it might have been expected that between them and him there would be affection, but they conducted themselves so ill that his soul loathed them, was straitened towards them (so it may be read). Whatever estrangement there is between God and man, it begins on man's side.

V. The sentence of their rejection passed (v. 9): "Then said I, I will not feed you. That which will make itself a prey to the wolf, let it be a prey, and let the rest so far forget their own gentle nature as to eat the flesh of one another; let these sheep fight like dogs." A sign of it given (v. 10): I took my staff, even Beauty, and cut it asunder. The breaking of this staff signified the breaking of God's covenant which he had made with all the people, the covenant of peculiarity made with all the tribes of Israel. When Christ told them plainly that the kingdom of God should be taken from them, and given to another people, then he broke the staff of Beauty, Matt. xxi. 43. Though Jerusalem and the Jewish nation held up forty years longer, yet from that day we may reckon the staff of Beauty broken, v. 11. It was said before, Their souls abhorred him; and here we have an instance of it, their buying and selling him for thirty pieces of silver. This is here foretold in somewhat obscure expressions, lest otherwise the plainness of the prophecy might prevent the accomplishment of it. The Shepherd comes to them for his wages (v. 12): "If you think good, give me my price; you are weary of me, pay me off and discharge me; and, if not, forbear." Compare with this what Christ said to Judas when he was going to sell him, "What thou doest do quickly; let them either take the bargain or leave it," John xiii. 27. They value him at thirty pieces of silver. It was the ordinary price of a slave, Exod. xxi. 32. The silver being no way proportionable to his wrath, it is thrown to the potter with disdain: "Let him take it to buy clay with." So the prophet cast the thirty pieces of silver to the potter in the house of the Lord. There is a particular accomplishment of this in the history of Christ's sufferings, Matt. xxvii. 9, 10. Thirty pieces of silver was the very sum for which Christ was sold to the chief priests; the money was laid out in the purchase of the potter's field. The completing of their rejection was the cutting asunder of the other staff, v. 14. The former denoted the ruin of their church, by breaking the covenant between God and them—that defaced their beauty; this denotes the ruin of their state, by breaking the brotherhood between Judah and Israel. They shall be crumbled into parties and factions, being thus divided, shall be brought to desolation. Nothing ruins a people so inevitably, as the breaking of the staff of Bands, and the weakening of the brotherhood among them.

Verses 15–17

God, having shown this people justly abandoned by the good Shepherd, here shows their further misery in being shamefully abused by a foolish shepherd. The prophet is himself to personate this pretended shepherd (v. 15): Take unto thee the instruments or accoutrements of a foolish shepherd, such a shepherd's coat, and bag, and staff, as a foolish shepherd would appear in; for such a shepherd shall be set over them (v. 16), who, instead of protecting them, shall do them mischief. The description here given of the foolish shepherd suits the character Christ gives of the scribes and Pharisees, Matt. xxiii. They shall be under the tyranny of unmerciful princes. They shall be imposed upon by false Christs and false prophets, as our Saviour foretold, Matt. xxiv. 5.

I. What a curse this foolish shepherd should be to the people, v. 16. He will not visit those that are cut off, will take no care of the young ones, nor heal that which was broken, but let it die of its bruises, when a little thing, in time, would have saved it. He will never do anything to support the weak and comfort the feeble-minded. Foolish shepherds eat of the flesh of the fat; they will have of the best for themselves; when they are in a rage against any of the flock, they tear their very claws in pieces by overdriving them.

II. What a curse this foolish shepherd should bring upon himself (v. 17): Woe to the idol-shepherd. His doom is that the sword of God's justice shall be upon his arm and his right eye, so that he shall quite lose the use of both. This was fulfilled when Christ said to the Pharisees, I have come that those who see may be made blind, John ix. 39.

CHAP. XII

The apostle (Gal iv. 25, 26) distinguishes between "Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children"—the Jewish church that rejected Christ, and "Jerusalem that is from above, that is free, and is the mother of us all"—the Christian church, the spiritual Jerusalem. In the foregoing chapter we read the doom of the former, and in this chapter, we have many precious promises made to the gospel-Jerusalem by him who (ver. 1) declares his power to make them good It is promised, I. That the attempts of the church's enemies against her shall be to their own ruin, ver. 2–4, 6 II. That the endeavours of the church's friends and patrons for her good shall be successful, ver. 5. III. That God will strengthen the meanest and weakest that belong to his church, and work salvation for them, ver. 7, 8 IV. That as a pledge, he will pour upon them a spirit of prayer and repentance, ver 9–14. These promises were of use then to the pious Jews that lived in the troublous times under Antiochus, and oppressors, and they are in every age for the directing of our prayers and the encouraging of our hopes with reference to the gospel-church

Verses 1–8

I. The title of this charter of promises made to God's Israel; it is the burden of the word of the Lord, a divine prediction. But it is for Israel; for their comfort and benefit.

II. The title of him that grants this charter: he is the Creator of the world and our Creator, and therefore has irresistible dominion. He stretches out the heavens and keeps them stretched out like a curtain, and will do so till the end come. He lays the foundation of the earth, and keeps it fixed on its own axis, though it is founded on the seas (Ps. xxiv. 1, 2), nay, though it is hung upon nothing, Job xxvi. 7. He forms the spirit of man within him. He made us these souls, Jer. xxxviii. 16. He not only breathed into the first man, but still breathes into every man the breath of life.

III. The promises by which the church shall be secured. Whatever attacks the enemies of the church may make upon her purity or peace, they will certainly issue in their own confusion. Jerusalem is in safety, and those are in danger who fight against it. This is here illustrated by three comparisons: 1. Jerusalem shall be a cup of trembling to all that lay siege to it, v. 2. Thus Alexander the Great was struck with amazement when he met Jaddas the high priest, and was deterred from offering any violence to Jerusalem. When Sennacherib laid siege against Judah and Jerusalem he found them such a cup of stupefying wine as laid all his mighty men asleep, Ps. lxxvi. 5, 6.

2. Jerusalem shall be a burdensome stone to all that attempt to remove it or carry it away, v. 3. Those that are for advancing the kingdom of sin in the world look upon Jerusalem, even the church of God, as the great obstacle to their design, and they must have it out of the way; but they cannot remove it. God will have a church in the world, in spite of them; it is built upon a rock, and is as Mount Zion, Ps. cxxv. 1. This stone, cut out of the mountain without hands, will break in pieces all that burden themselves with it, as that stone smote the image, Dan. ii. 45. Our Saviour seems to allude to these words when he speaks of himself as a burdensome stone to those that will not have him for their foundation-stone, which shall fall upon them and grind them to powder, Matt. xxi. 44.

3. The governors of Judah shall be among their enemies like a hearth of fire among the wood, and a torch of fire in a sheaf, v. 6. Those that contend with them will find it is like an opposition given by briers and thorns to a consuming fire, Isa. xxvii. 4. It will go through them, and burn them together. The enemies thought to be as water to this fire, but God will make them as wood, nay, as a sheaf of corn (which is more combustible), to this fire. The persecutors of the primitive church found this fulfilled in it, witness the confession of Julian the apostate at last, Thou hast overcome me, O thou Galilean! If you are weary of your life, persecute the Christians, was once a proverb. It is promised that God will infatuate the counsels and enfeeble the courage of the church's enemies (v. 4). The church's infantry shall be too hard for the enemy's cavalry. It is promised that Jerusalem shall be re-peopled and replenished (v. 6). They shall have a new Jerusalem upon the same foundation, the same spot of ground. They had so after their return out of captivity, but the gospel-church is a Jerusalem inhabited in its own place; for, the gospel being preached to all the world, it may call every place its own. It is promised that the inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be enabled to defend themselves under the divine protection, v. 8. God will not only be a wall of fire about the city, but he will encompass particular persons with his favour as with a shield. He does it by giving them strength and courage to help themselves. In that day the feeblest of the inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be as David, as skilful and strong, as serviceable to Jerusalem in guarding it as David himself was in founding it. The house of David shall be as God, that is, as the angel of the Lord, before them. Zerubbabel was now the top-branch of the house of David; he shall be endued with wisdom and grace, and shall go before the people as an angel, Exod. xxiii. 20. But this was to have its full accomplishment in Christ; now the house of David looked little and mean, and its glory was eclipsed, but in Christ the house of David shone more brightly than ever. It is promised that there shall be a very good understanding between the city and the country. The governors of Judah, the magistrates of the country, shall think honourably of the citizens, the inhabitants of Jerusalem. It is well with a kingdom when its great men know how to value its good men. God will put signal honour upon Judah, and so save them from the contempt of their brethren. God says (v. 4), I will open my eyes upon the house of Judah, and (v. 7), the Lord shall save the tents of Judah first. Those that dwell in tents lie most exposed; but God will deliver them before those that dwell in Jerusalem. Courtiers and citizens ought not to despise country people, those whom God opens his eyes upon and who are first saved. This promise has a further reference to the gospel-church, in which no difference shall be made between high and low, rich and poor, bond and free, circumcision and uncircumcision, Col. iii. 11.

Verses 9–14

The day here spoken of is the day of Jerusalem's defence and deliverance, that glorious day, which, if it refer to the successes which the Jews had against their enemies in the time of the Maccabees, yet certainly looks further, to the gospel-day, to Christ's victories over the powers of darkness and the great salvation he has wrought.

I. A glorious work of God to be wrought for his people: "I will seek to destroy all the nations that come against Jerusalem, v. 9. Nations come against Jerusalem, but they shall all be destroyed." In Christ's first coming, he sought to destroy him that had the power of death, and did destroy him. In his second coming, he will complete their destruction, and death itself shall be swallowed up in that victory.

II. A gracious work of God to be wrought in his people. When he seeks to destroy their enemies he will pour upon them the Spirit of grace and supplication. When God intends great mercy for his people the first thing he does is to set them praying. But this promise has reference to the graces of the Spirit given to all believers, as that Isa. xliv. 3, I will pour my Spirit upon thy seed, which was fulfilled when Jesus was glorified, John vii. 39. These blessings are poured on the house of David, on the great men; for they are no more, and no better, than the grace of God makes them. But it was given also to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the common people. The church is Jerusalem, the heavenly Jerusalem; all true believers, that have their conversation in heaven, are inhabitants of this Jerusalem, and to them this promise belongs. God will pour his Spirit upon them: 1. As a Spirit of grace, to sanctify and to make gracious. 2. As a Spirit of supplications, instructing and assisting us in the duty of prayer. I will pour upon them the Spirit of grace. One effect of the gift is that they shall mourn, for there is a mourning that will end in rejoicing and has a blessing upon it. This mourning is a fruit of the Spirit, an evidence of a work of grace in the soul. It is a mourning grounded upon a sight of Christ: They shall look on him whom they have pierced, and shall mourn for him. It is foretold that Christ should be pierced, and this scripture is quoted as that which was fulfilled when Christ's side was pierced upon the cross; see John xix. 37. He is spoken of as one whom we have pierced; it is spoken primarily of the Jews, yet it is true of us all as sinners. Those that truly repent of sin look upon Christ as one who was pierced for their sins and is pierced by them. They shall mourn for sin as one mourns for an only son. The sorrow of parents for a child, for a first-born, is natural; it is secret and lasting; such are the sorrows of a true penitent, flowing purely from love to Christ above any other. It shall be like the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon, where good king Josiah was slain, for whom there was a general lamentation (v. 11). They cried out, The crown has fallen from our head. Woe unto us, for we have sinned! Lam. v. 16. Christ is our King; our sins were his death, and, for that reason, ought to be our grief. There shall be not only a mourning of the land, by its representatives in a general assembly (as Judges ii. 5, when the place was called Bochim—A place of weepers), but: Every family apart shall mourn (v. 12), all the families that remain, v. 14. Four several families are here specified as examples to others: (1) Two of them are royal families; the house of David, in Solomon, and the house of Nathan, another son of David, Luke iii. 27–31. (2) Two of them are sacred families (v. 13), the family of the house of Levi, which was God's tribe, and in it particularly the family of Shimei, which was a branch of the tribe of Levi (1 Chron. vi. 17). As the princes must mourn for the sins of the magistracy, so must the priests for the iniquity of the holy things.

CHAP. XIII

I. Some further promises relating to gospel-times. Here is a promise of the remission of sins (ver. 1), of the reformation of manners (ver. 2), and particularly of the silencing of false prophets, ver. 2–6. II. A clear prediction of the sufferings of Christ and the dispersion of his disciples (ver. 7), of the destruction of the greater part of the Jewish nation not long after (ver. 8), and of the purifying of a remnant of them, ver. 9.

Verses 1–6

Behold the Lamb of God taking away the sin of the world, 1 John iii. 5.

I. He takes away the guilt of sin by the blood of his cross (v. 1): In that day, in the gospel-day, there shall be a fountain opened, that is, provision made for the cleansing of all those from the pollutions of sin who truly repent. In that day, when the Spirit of grace is poured out to set them a mourning for their sins, their consciences shall be purified and pacified by the blood of Christ, which cleanses from all sin, 1 John i. 7. This fountain opened is the pierced side of Jesus Christ, spoken of just before (ch. xii. 10), for thence came there out blood and water, and both for cleansing. Sin is uncleanness; it defiles the mind and conscience, renders us odious to God and uneasy in ourselves, unfit to be employed in the service of God. There is mercy enough in God, and merit enough in Christ, for the forgiving of the greatest sins and sinners, 1 Cor. vi. 11. Under the law there were a brazen laver and a brazen sea to wash in; those were but vessels, but we have a fountain overflowing, ever-flowing. It is a fountain opened; it is opened, not only to the house of David, but to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, to the poor and mean as well as to the rich and great.

II. He takes away the dominion of sin by the power of his grace. Those that are washed, as they are justified, so they are sanctified. In that day (v. 2): I will cut off the names of the idols out of the land. This was fulfilled in the rooted aversion which the Jews had, after the captivity, to idols and idolatry, and still retain to this day; it was fulfilled also in the conversion of many to the faith of Christ, by which they were taken off from making an idol of the ceremonial law. False prophecy shall also be brought to an end. The devil is an unclean spirit; and he has his prophets. It is here foretold that false prophets should be brought to punishment even by their nearest relations (v. 3). Holy zeal for God and godliness will make us hate sin, and dread temptation, most in those whom naturally we love best. False prophets should be themselves convinced of their sin (v. 4): "The prophets shall be ashamed everyone of his vision; because God has by his grace awakened their consciences and shown them their error, or because the event disproves their predictions. And therefore they shall no longer wear a rough garment, or garment of hair, as the true prophets used to do, in imitation of Elijah." Let men be really as good as they seem to be, but not seem to be better than really they are. The pretender, as a true penitent shall say, "I am no prophet, as I have pretended to be. I am a husbandman; I was never taught of God to prophesy, but taught of man to keep cattle." We must evince the truth of our repentance by returning to our duty again, though it be the severest mortification to us. "Hast thou not been beaten into this acknowledgment? Was it not the rod and reproof that gave thee this wisdom?" And he shall own, "Yes, it was; these are the wounds with which I was wounded in the house of my friends, who bound me, and brought me to my senses." Reduced by stripes, he had the sense and honesty to own that they were his friends, his real friends, who thus wounded him, that they might reclaim him. Some good interpreters think that these are the words of Christ who was wounded in his hands, when they were nailed to the cross. After his resurrection, he had the marks of these wounds; and here he tells how he came by them; he received them as a false prophet, for the chief priests called him a deceiver, but he received them in the house of the Jews, who should have been his friends.

Verses 7–9

Here is a prophecy,

I. Of the sufferings of Christ who was to be pierced, and was to be the fountain opened. Awake, O sword! against my Shepherd, v. 7. These are the words of God the Father, giving commission to the sword of his justice to awake against his Son, when he had voluntarily made his soul an offering for sin; for it pleased the Lord to bruise him and put him to grief; and he was stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted, Isa. liii. 4, 10. Observe, 1. How he calls him. "As God, he is my fellow"; for he thought it no robbery to be equal with God. He and the Father are one. "As Mediator, he is my Shepherd, the Shepherd that was to lay down his life for the sheep." 2. How he uses him: Awake, O sword! against him. If he will be a sacrifice, he must be slain, for without the shedding of blood, the life-blood, there was no remission. It is not a charge given to a rod to correct him, but to a sword to slay him; for God spared not his own Son.

II. Of the dispersion of the disciples thereupon: Smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered. This our Lord Jesus himself declares to have been fulfilled when all his disciples were offended because of him in the night wherein he was betrayed, Matt. xxvi. 31; Mark xiv. 27. They all forsook him and fled. They were scattered everyone to his own, and left him alone, John xvi. 32. Some think this refers to Christ the Shepherd of the Jewish nation; he was smitten; they themselves smote him; and therefore they were dispersed among the nations. These words, I will turn my hand upon the little ones, may be understood either as a threatening (as Christ suffered, so shall his disciples), or as a promise that God would gather Christ's scattered disciples together again, and give them the meeting in Galilee.

III. Of the rejection and ruin of the unbelieving Jews (v. 8); and this shall have its accomplishment, in the destruction of the corrupt and hypocritical part of the church.

IV. Of the reformation of the chosen remnant, those of them that believed, and the Christian church in general (v. 9): The third part shall be left. When Jerusalem and Judæa were destroyed, all the Christians in that country, having the warning Christ gave them to flee to the mountains, shifted for their own safety, and were sheltered in a city called Pella, on the other side Jordan. I will bring that third part through the fire of affliction, and will refine and try them as silver and gold are refined and tried. This was fulfilled in the persecutions of the primitive church, the fiery trial, 1 Pet. iv. 12. Their communion with God is their triumph: They shall call on my name, and I will hear them. They write to God by prayer, and receive from him answers of peace. Their covenant with God is their triumph: "I will say, It is my people, whom I have chosen and loved, and will own; and they shall say, The Lord is my God, all-sufficient to me."

CHAP. XIV

This chapter speaks of a "day of the Lord that cometh", and ten times in the foregoing chapters, and seven times in this, it is repeated, "in that day"; but what that day is that is here meant is uncertain. Some passages here seem to look as far forward as gospel-times. Now the "day of the Lord" brings with it both judgment and mercy, mercy to his church, judgment to her enemies and persecutors. I. The gates of hell are here threatening the church (ver. 1, 2) and yet not prevailing. II. The power of Heaven appears here for the church, ver. 3, 5. III. The events concerning the church are represented as (ver. 6, 7) issuing well at last. IV. The spreading of knowledge is here foretold, and the setting up of the gospel-kingdom in the world (ver. 8, 9), which shall be the enlargement and establishment of another Jerusalem, ver. 10, 11. V. Those shall be reckoned with that fought against Jerusalem (ver. 12–15) and those that neglect his worship there, ver. 17–19. VI. It is promised that there shall be great resort to the church, and great purity and piety in it, ver. 16, 20, 21.

Verses 1–7

God's providences concerning his church are here represented as strangely changing and strangely mixed.

I. As strangely changing. Sometimes the tide runs high and strong against them, but presently it turns.

1. God here appears against Jerusalem. When the day of the Lord comes (v. 1) Jerusalem must pass through the fire to be refined. The city shall be taken by the Romans, the houses shall be rifled, and the women shall be ravished. One-half of the city shall then be carried into captivity, to be sold or enslaved.

2. He presently changes his way, and appears for Jerusalem; for, though judgment begin at the house of God, yet, it shall not end there. A remnant shall be spared. One-half shall go into captivity, whence they may be fetched back, and the residue of the people shall not be cut off from the city. Many of the Jews shall receive the gospel, and so shall prevent their being cut off from the city of God, his church upon earth. Then, when God has made use of these nations as a scourge to his people, he shall go forth and fight against them by his judgments. The Roman empire never flourished after the destruction of Jerusalem as it had done before, but in many instances God fought against it. Though Jerusalem and the temple be destroyed, yet God will have a church in the world, into which Gentiles shall be admitted, and with whom the believing Jews shall be incorporated, v. 4, 5. God will carefully inspect Jerusalem, even when the enemies of it are laying it waste: His feet shall stand in that day upon the mount of Olives, Mark xiii. 3. When the refiner puts his gold into the furnace he stands by to see that it receive no damage; so when Jerusalem, God's gold, is to be refined, he will stand by upon the mount of Olives; this was literally fulfilled when our Lord Jesus was often upon this mountain. Thence he ascended up into heaven, Acts i. 12. It was the last place on which his feet stood on this earth. By the destruction of Jerusalem this mountain shall be made to cleave in the midst, and the Gentiles made one with the Jews by the breaking down of this middle wall of partition, Eph. ii. 14. A great mountain the ceremonial law was in the way of the Jews' conversion, yet before Christ and his gospel it was made plain. A new and living way shall be opened to the new Jerusalem. The mountain being divided, one-half towards the north and the other half towards the south, there shall be a very great valley, a broad way of communication between Jerusalem and the Gentile world, by which the Gentiles shall have free admission into the gospel-Jerusalem, and the word of the Lord, that goes forth from Jerusalem, shall have a free course into the Gentile world. The valley of the mountains is the gospel-church, to which there were added of the Jews daily such as should be saved. God makes his mountains a way (Isa. xlix. 11), by making them a valley. To those that are now separated from God this valley shall reach; for the Gentiles, who are afar off, shall be made nigh, with the Jews, who are a people near unto him, and both have a mutual access to each other and a joint access to God as a Father by one Spirit, Eph. ii. 18. God shall appear in his glory for the accomplishing of all this: The Lord my God shall come, and all the saints with thee; which may refer to his coming to destroy Jerusalem, or to destroy the enemies of Jerusalem; or his coming to set up his kingdom in the world, which is called the coming of the son of Man (Matt. xxiv. 37); or to his last coming, at the end of time; however, it teaches us that the Lord will come. Some think that v. 5 may be read as a prayer, Yet, O Lord my God! come, and bring all the saints with thee.

II. God's providences appear here strangely mixed (v. 6, 7): In that day of the Lord the light shall not be clear nor dark, not day nor night; but at evening time it shall be light. Some refer this to all the time from hence to the coming of the Messiah; the Jewish church had neither perfect peace nor constant trouble, but a cloudy day. But it may be taken more generally to represent the method God usually takes in the administration of the kingdom both of providence and grace. It is so with the church of God in this world; where the Sun of righteousness has risen it cannot be dark night, and yet short of heaven it will not be clear day. It shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord. This intimates beauty and harmony in such mixed events; there is one and the same design in all. At evening-time it shall be light; it shall be clear light, and no longer dark; we are sure of it in the other world, and we hope for it in this world—at evening-time, when things are at the worst and the case of the church is most deplorable.

Verses 8–15

I. Blessings promised to Jerusalem, the gospel-Jerusalem, in the day of the Messiah, and to all the earth.

1. Jerusalem shall be a spring of living waters to the world; it was made so when there the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, and thence the word of the Lord diffused itself to the nations about (v. 8). It was the honour of Jerusalem that thence the word of the Lord went forth (Isa. ii. 3). Half of these waters shall go towards the former sea and half towards the hinder sea, as all rivers bend their course towards some sea or other, some eastward, others westward. The gospel shall spread into all parts of the world. The knowledge of God shall diffuse itself every way and every day. In summer and in winter it shall be. And such a divine power goes along with these living waters that they shall not be dried up, either by the droughts in summer or by the frosts in winter.

2. The kingdom of God among men shall be a universal and united kingdom, v. 9. The Lord shall be King over all the earth. There shall be one Lord, and his name one. All false gods shall be abandoned, and all false ways of worship abolished; and as God shall be the centre of their unity, so the scripture shall be the rule of their unity.

3. The land of Judea, and Jerusalem, its mother-city, shall be repaired and taken under the special protection of Heaven, v. 10, 11. Some think this denotes particular favour to the people of the Jews, but it is rather to be understood figuratively of the gospel-church, typified by Judah and Jerusalem. The church shall be like a fruitful country, abounding in all the rich products of the soil. The whole land of Judæa, naturally uneven and hilly, shall be turned as a plain; it shall become a smooth level valley, from Gibeah, its utmost border north, to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem. The gospel of Christ, where it comes in its power, levels the ground, that the Lord alone may be exalted. As the holy land shall be levelled, so the holy city shall be peopled. Jerusalem shall be lifted up out of its low estate, shall be raised out of its ruins. The whole city shall be inhabited. The utmost limits of it are here mentioned, all built upon, from Benjamin's-gate north-east to the corner-gate north-west and from the tower of Hananeel in the south to the king's wine-presses in the north. Those that dwell in it shall dwell securely, and there shall be no more anathema (as some read it), no more curse.

II. Judgments threatened against the enemies of the church, that have fought, or do fight, against Jerusalem. Those that fight against the city of God, and his people, will be found fighting against God, v. 12. They shall waste away under grievous and languishing diseases. They shall be dashed in pieces one against another (v. 13): A great tumult from the Lord shall be among them. Those that are combined against the church will justly be separated, and set against one another; and their tumults raised against God will be avenged in tumults among themselves. Some think this was fulfilled in the factions and dissensions that were among the Jews, when the Romans were destroying them all. The plunder of their camp shall greatly enrich the people of God, or the spoils of their country (v. 14): Judah also shall eat at Jerusalem (so one learned interpreter reads it); people shall come from all parts to share in the prey. The wealth of the sinner is often laid up for the just, and the Israel of God enriched with the spoil of the Egyptians. The very cattle shall share in the plague with which the enemies of God's church shall be cut off (v. 15).

Three things are here foretold:

I. Those that were left of the enemies of religion shall be so sensible of the mercy of God to them in their narrow escape that they shall apply themselves to the worship of the God of Israel, and pay their homage to him, v. 16. As some of Christ's foes shall be made his footstool, so others of them shall be made his friends. They shall go up to worship at Jerusalem, because that was the place which God had chosen, and there the temple was, which was a type of Christ and his mediation. Gospel-worship is here represented by the keeping of the feast of tabernacles, for the sake of those two great graces which were in a special manner acted and signified in that feast—contempt of the world, and joy in God, Neh. viii. 17. We must go to Christ our temple with all our offerings, for in him only our spiritual sacrifices are acceptable to God, 1 Pet. ii. 5. They shall go up from year to year, at the times appointed for this solemn feast. Every day of a Christian's life is a day of the feast of tabernacles, and every Lord's day especially.

II. Those who neglect the duties of gospel-worship shall be reckoned with for their neglect. Upon them there shall be no rain, v. 17. Some understand it figuratively; the rain of heavenly doctrine shall be withheld, and of the heavenly grace, which should accompany that doctrine. It is a righteous thing with God to withhold the blessings of grace from those that do not attend the means of grace, to deny the green pastures to those that attend not the shepherd's tents. If we be barren and unfruitful towards God, justly is the earth made so to us. But what shall be done to the defaulters of the land of Egypt, to whom the threatening is no threatening, for they have no rain at any time; the river Nilus waters their land, and makes it fruitful, v. 18, 19. There shall be, in effect, the same plague. God can restrain the overflowing of the river, which was equivalent to the shutting up of the clouds. It does not follow that those who can live without rain can therefore live without God. Omissions are sins, and those contract guilt that go not up to worship at the times appointed, as they have opportunity.

III. The name and character of holiness shall not be so confined as formerly. Holiness to the Lord had been written only upon the high priest's forehead, but now it shall not be so appropriated. All Christians shall be living temples, and spiritual priests, dedicated to the honour of God and employed in his service. There shall be a more plentiful effusion of the Spirit of holiness and sanctification after Christ's ascension than ever before. There shall be holiness introduced into common things. The furniture of their horses shall be consecrated to God. "Upon the bells of the horses shall be engraven Holiness to the Lord, or upon the bridles of the horses (so the margin) or the trappings. Travellers shall have it upon their bridles, with which they guide their horses, to guide themselves by this rule. The furniture of their houses too shall be consecrated to God, to be employed in his service. The common drinking cups they used shall be like the bowls before the altar, that were used either to receive the blood of the sacrifices or to present the wine and oil for the drink-offerings. The vessels which they used for their own tables shall be used to the glory of God, and their meals shall look like sacrifices; they shall eat and drink, not to themselves, but to him that spread their tables and fills their cups. "Every pot in Jerusalem and in Judah shall be holiness to the Lord—the pots in which they boil their meat, the cups out of which they drink. What they eat and drink out of these shall nourish their bodies for the service of God; and out of these they shall give liberally for the relief of the poor"; then are they Holiness to the Lord. When there shall be such real holiness people shall not be so concerned about ceremonial holiness: "Those that sacrifice shall come and take of these common vessels, and seethe their sacrifices therein, making no distinction between them and the bowls before the altar." In gospel-times the true worshippers shall worship God in spirit and in truth, John iv. 21. One place shall be as acceptable to God as another, and one vessel shall be as acceptable as another. There shall be no unholiness introduced into their sacred things, to corrupt them: In that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts. Some read it, There shall be no more the merchant, for so a Canaanite sometimes signifies; and they think it was fulfilled when Christ once and again drove the buyers and sellers out of the temple. At the end of time, and not before, Christ shall gather out of his kingdom everything that offends.

THE PROPHECY OF MALACHI

God's prophets were his witnesses to his church, each in his day, for several ages, witnesses for him and his authority, witnesses against sin and sinners, attesting God's providences in his dealings with his people then and his grace concerning his church in the days of the Messiah. The Jews say, Prophecy continued forty years under the second temple, and this prophet they call the seal of prophecy, because in him the series or succession of prophets broke off and came to a period. I. The person of the prophet. We have only his name, Malachi, and no account of his country or parentage. Malachi signifies my angel. Prophets were messengers, God's messengers; his name is in the original (ch. iii. 1) my messenger. The tradition of some of the ancients is that he was of the tribe of Zebulun, and that he died young. II. The scope of the prophecy. Haggai and Zechariah were sent to reprove the people for delaying to build the temple; Malachi was sent to reprove them for the neglect of it when it was built, and for their profanation of the temple-service (for from idolatry and superstition they ran into the other extreme of impiety and irreligion). And now that prophecy was to cease he speaks more clearly of the Messiah, as nigh at hand, and concludes with a direction to the people of God to keep in remembrance the law of Moses, while they were in expectation of the gospel of Christ.

CHAP. I

This prophet is sent first to convince and then to comfort, first to discover sin and to reprove and then to promise the coming of him who shall take away sin. And this method the blessed Spirit takes in dealing with souls, John xvi. 8. He first opens the wound and then applies the healing balm. God has provided for the engaging of Israel to himself by providence and ordinances; but it seems that they received the grace of God in vain. I. They were ungrateful to God for his favours, ver. 1–5. II. They were careless and remiss in the observance of his institutions; the priests especially so, ver. 6–14.

Verses 1–5

The prophecy of this book is entitled, The burden of the word of the Lord (v. 1), which intimates, 1. That it was of great weight and importance. 2. That it ought to be often repeated as the burden of a song. 3. That there were those to whom it was a burden and a reproach. 4. That to them it would prove a burden indeed, to sink them, unless they repented.

This burden of the word of the Lord was sent, 1. To Israel. Many prophets God had sent to Israel, and now he will try them with one more. 2. By Malachi, by the hand of Malachi.

In these verses, they are charged with ingratitude.

I. God asserts the great kindness he had for them (v. 2): I have loved you, saith the Lord. Thus abruptly, thus kindly does the sermon begin. In this one word God sums up all his gracious dealings with them.

II. They question his love, Yet you say, Wherein hast thou loved us? As God traces up all his favours to them to the fountain, which was his love, so he traces up all their sins against him to the fountain, which was their contempt of his love. "Have we not been wasted, impoverished, and carried captive; and wherein then hast thou loved us?"

III. He makes it out, beyond contradiction, that he has loved them. Some read their question, Wherefore hast thou loved us? as if they did indeed own that he had loved them, but insinuate that he loved them because their father Abraham had loved him, so that it was not a free love, but a love of debt, to which he replies, "Was not Esau as near akin to Abraham as you are? And therefore, if there were any right to a recompence for Abraham's love, Esau had it, and yet I hated Esau and loved Jacob." What a difference God had made between Jacob and Esau! Esau was Jacob's brother, his twin-brother: "Yet I loved Jacob and I hated Esau, that is, took Jacob into covenant, but refused and rejected Esau." The apostle quotes this (Rom. ix. 13). Esau was justly hated, but Jacob freely loved.

1. The Edomites shall be made the monuments of God's justice. For Esau have I hated; I laid his mountains waste, the mountains of Seir, which were his heritage. When all that part of the world was ravaged by the Chaldean army the country of Edom was laid in ruins, Isa. xxxiv. 6, 11. The Edomites had triumphed in Jerusalem's overthrow (Ps. cxxxvii. 7), and therefore it was just to put the same cup of trembling into their hands. Jacob's cities are laid waste, but they are rebuilt; Edom's are laid waste, and never rebuilt. The sufferings of the righteous will end well; their grievances will be redressed, and their sorrow turned into joy; but the sufferings of the wicked will be as Edom's desolations, v. 4. The vain hopes of the Edomites had no promise to build upon. They say, "It is true, we are impoverished; it is the common chance, and there is no remedy; but we will return and build the desolate places; we are resolved we will" (not so much as asking God leave). They build presumptuously, as Hiel built Jericho in direct contradiction to the word of God (1 Kings xvi. 34), and it shall speed accordingly. They say, We will build; but what says the Lord of hosts? They shall build, but I will throw down. All that see them shall call them the border of wickedness, a sinful nation, incurably so, and therefore the people against whom the Lord has indignation for ever. Since their wickedness is such as will never be reformed, their desolations shall be such as are never to be repaired.

2. The Israelites shall be made the monuments of his mercy, v. 5. "The Edomites shall be stigmatized as a people hated of God, but your eyes shall see your doubts concerning his love to you silenced; for you shall have cause to say, The Lord will be magnified from every part and border of the land of Israel." When the border of Edom still remains desolate, and the border of Israel is repaired and replenished, then it will appear that God has loved Jacob. God's goodness being his glory, when he does us good we must proclaim him great, for that is magnifying him.

The prophet is here calling the priests to account, though they were themselves appointed judges, to call the people to an account. Thus saith the Lord of hosts to you, O priests! v. 6.

I. What it was that God expected from them (v. 6): A son honours his father, because he is his father; nature has written this law in the hearts of children, before God wrote it at Mount Sinai; a servant, though his obligation to his master is by voluntary compact, yet thinks it his duty to honour him. But the priests, who are God's children and his servants, do not fear and honour him. They were fathers and masters to the people, and expected to be called so (Judges xviii. 19, Matt. xxii. 7, 10); but they forgot their Father and Master in heaven, and the duty they owed to him. Our relation to God as our Father and Master strongly obliges us to fear and honour him. If we honour and fear the fathers of our flesh, much more the Father and Master of our spirits, Heb. xii. 9.

II. What the contempt was which the priests put upon God. They despised God's name, his word and ordinances, causing even the sacrifices of the Lord to be abhorred, as Eli's sons did. They profaned God's name, v. 12. They polluted it, v. 7. They not only made no account of sacred things, but they perverted them to the service of the worst purposes—their own pride, covetousness, and luxury. This is the general charge against them. To this they plead Not guilty, and challenge God to prove it upon them. You say, Wherein have we despised thy name? (v. 6), and wherein have we polluted thee? v. 7. Their defence was their offence, and their saying, Wherein have we despised thy name? proved them proud and perverse. Justly might they have been condemned upon the general charge, but God shows them very particularly wherein they had despised his name.

1. They despised God's name in what they said: "You say in your hearts, The table of the Lord is contemptible" (v. 7), and again (v. 12), "You say, The table of the Lord is polluted; it is to be no more regarded than any other table." Either the table in the temple on which the show-bread was placed, is that which they reflect upon, or rather the altar of burnt-offerings is here called the table. This they thought was contemptible in comparison with their own tables, and those of their great men: The fruit thereof, even his meat, is contemptible.

2. They despised God's name in what they did, which was of a piece with what they said. They thought anything would serve for a sacrifice, though ever so coarse and mean. With every sacrifice they were to bring a meat-offering of fine flour mingled with oil; but they brought polluted bread (v. 7). And as to the beasts they offered, though the law was express that what was offered in sacrifice should not have a blemish, yet they brought the blind, and the lame, and the sick (v. 8), and again (v. 13), the torn, and the lame, and the sick, that was ready to die of itself. Some make v. 8 to be a continuation of what the priests profanely said v. 7, You say to the people, If you offer the blind for sacrifice, it is not evil; or the lame and the sick, it is not evil. If we worship God ignorantly, and without understanding, we bring the blind for sacrifice; if we do it carelessly, if we are cold, and dull, and dead, in it, we bring the sick; if we rest in the bodily exercise, and do not make heart-work of it, we bring the lame; and, if we suffer vain thoughts and distractions to lodge within us, we bring the torn. Is it not a great affront to God and a great wrong and injury to our own souls? They would do no more of their work than what they were paid for. There is not a man among the priests that would shut the doors, or kindle a fire, for nought. Their work was a perfect drudgery to them (v. 13): You said also, Behold, what a weariness is it! They thought the duty of their office toilsome and troublesome, and snuffed at it as unreasonable.

III. God expostulates and reasons the case with them. 1. Would they affront an earthly prince thus? You offer to God the lame and the sick; offer it now unto thy governor (v. 8), either as tribute or as a present, will he be pleased with thee? 2. Could they imagine that such sacrifices as these would be pleasing to God? "Should I accept this at your hand, saith the Lord?" (v. 13). If God has no pleasure in the person, if the person be not in a justified state, if he be not sanctified, God will not accept the offering. God had respect to Abel first and then to his sacrifice. 3. How could they expect to prevail with God in their intercessions for the people when they thus affronted God in their sacrifices? 4. Had God deserved this at their hands? No, he had provided comfortably for them, and had given them such encouragement in their work as might have engaged them to do it cheerfully and well.

IV. He calls them to repentance for their profanations of his holy name. So we may understand v. 9, "Now, I pray you, beseech God that he will be gracious to us. Humble yourselves for your sin, cry mightily to God for pardon; for all the rebukes of Providence we are under are by your means."

V. He declares his resolution both to secure the glory of his own name and to reckon with those who profane it. God will magnify his law and make it honourable, though they vilify it and make it contemptible; for (v. 11) from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same my name shall be great among the Gentiles. Instead of those carnal ordinances, which they profaned, a spiritual way of worship shall be introduced and established: Incense shall be offered to God's name (which signifies prayer and praise, Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. viii. 3), instead of the blood and fat of bulls and goats. Instead of his being worshipped and served among the Jews only, a small people in a corner of the world, he will be served and worshipped in all places, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same; in every place, in every part of the world, incense shall be offered to his name; nations shall speak of the wonderful works of God, and have them spoken to them in their own language. This is a plain prediction of that great revolution by which the Gentiles, who had been strangers and foreigners, came to be fellow-citizens with the saints and of the household of God, and welcome to the throne of grace. Profane and careless worshippers are such as vow and sacrifice to the Lord a corrupt thing when they have in their flock a male. The priests would accept it, though God would not, pretending to be more indulgent than he was. They are deceivers; they deal falsely and fraudulently with God. Hypocrites are deceivers, and they will prove self-deceivers, and so self-destroyers. They are cursed; they expect a blessing, but will meet with a curse. The heathen paid more respect to their gods, though idols, than the Jews did to theirs, though the only true and living God.

CHAP. II

There are two great ordinances which divine wisdom has instituted, the wretched profanation of both of which is sharply reproved in this chapter. I. The ordinance of the ministry, which is peculiar to the church; this was profaned by those who were themselves dignified with the honour of it. The priests profaned the holy things of God; this they are here charged with, ver. 1–9. II. The ordinances of marriage, which is common to the world of mankind, was profaned both by the priests and by the people, in marrying strangers (ver. 11, 12), treating their wives unkindly (ver. 13), putting them away (ver. 16), and herein dealing treacherously, ver. 10, 14, 15.

Verses 1–9

What was said in the foregoing chapter was directed to the priests (ch. i. 6): Thus saith the Lord of hosts to you, O priests! that despise my name. They might think it some excuse that they offered what the people brought. If the priests had given the people better instructions, the people would have brought better offerings; and therefore the blame returns upon the priests: And now, O you priests! this commandment is purely for you (v. 1).

I. A recital of the covenant God made with that sacred tribe, which was their commission for their work: The Lord of hosts sent a commandment to them, for the establishing of this covenant (v. 4). Let the sons of Levi know then (and particularly the sons of Aaron) what honour God put upon their family (v. 5): My covenant was with him of life and peace. This is called his covenant of life and peace because it was intended for the support of religion, which brings life and peace to the souls of men. What is here said of the covenant of priesthood is true of the covenant of grace made with all believers, as spiritual priests; it assures all believers of everlasting peace, everlasting life, all happiness both in this world and in that to come. This covenant was made with the whole tribe of Levi when they were distinguished from the rest of the tribes. These great blessings of life and peace, contained in that covenant, God gave to him, to Levi, to Aaron, to Phinehas; he entrusted them with these benefits for the use and behoof of God's Israel; they received that they might give. The tribe of Levi gave a signal proof of their holy fear of God when they appeared so bravely against the worshippers of the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 26); and for their zeal in that matter God bestowed this blessing upon them. Some read v. 5 not as the consideration of the grant, but as the condition of it: I gave them to him, provided that he should fear before me. They were hereby made the messengers of the Lord of hosts, messengers of that covenant of life and peace, not mediators of it, but only messengers, or ambassadors, employed to treat of the terms of peace between God and Israel. The priests were God's mouth to his people. The priests' lips should keep knowledge, not keep it from the people, but keep it for them. Ministers must be men of knowledge; they must not only have it, but they must have it ready to be communicated to others as there is occasion. The people should seek the law at his mouth; they should consult the priests as God's messengers.

II. The fidelity and zeal of many of their predecessors in the priest's office, are mentioned as an aggravation of their sin in degenerating from such honourable ancestors. The good priest (v. 6) was ready and mighty in the scriptures: The law of truth was in his mouth, for the use of those that asked the law at his mouth. Truth is a law, it has a commanding power. It is by truth that Christ rules. He lived like a priest that was chosen to walk before God, 1 Sam. ii. 30. He walked with God in peace, in equity. He did turn many away from iniquity, and God crowned his endeavours with wonderful success; he helped to save many a soul from death, and there are multitudes now in heaven blessing God that ever they knew him. When the priest is upright many will be upright.

III. A high charge drawn up against the priests who violated the covenant. Many corruptions had crept into the church of the Jews at this time, mixed marriages, admitting strangers into the house of God, profanation of the sabbath-day, which were all owing to the carelessness and unfaithfulness of the priests. 1. They transgressed the rule: "You have not kept my ways, not kept in them yourselves, nor done your part to keep others in them," v. 9. 2. They betrayed their trust: "You have corrupted the covenant of Levi. You have managed your office as if it were designed only to feed you fat and make you great, and not for the glory of God and the good of the souls of men." Another instance of their betraying their trust was that they were partial in the law, v. 9. In the law they were to lay down to the people they knew faces (so the word is); they accepted persons. 3. They did mischief to the souls of men, which they should have helped to save: You have caused many to stumble at the law. 4. When they were under the rebukes of the word and of the providence of God, they would not hear.

IV. The judgments God had brought upon these priests. They had lost their comfort (v. 2): I have already cursed your blessings. They had not the comfort of their work, which is the satisfaction of doing good. They had lost their credit (v. 9): Therefore have I also made you contemptible and base before all the people. When they forsook the ways of God, and corrupted the covenant of Levi, they thereby made themselves not only mean, but vile, in the eyes even of the common people.

V. A sentence of wrath passed upon them, v. 2, 3. But it is conditional: If you will not lay it to heart, implying, "If you will, God's anger shall be turned away." I will send a curse upon you, so that you shall neither be blessed yourselves nor blessings to the people, but even your plenty shall be a plague to you and you shall be plagues to your generation." The fruits of the earth should be no comfort to them: "Behold, I will corrupt your seed; the corn you sow shall rot under ground." Or it may be understood of the seed of the word which they preached. Bring no more vain oblations; your incense is an abomination to me.

Verses 10–17

Corrupt practices are the genuine fruit and product of corrupt principles. In these verses we find men dealing falsely with one another, and it is because they think falsely of their God.

I. In general, they dealt treacherously every man against his brother, v. 10. It cannot be expected that he who is false to his God should be true to his friend. Two things they are here charged with—taking strange wives of heathen nations, and abusing and putting away the wives they had of their own nation; in both these they violated a sacred covenant. They married strange wives, which was expressly prohibited, and provided against, in that covenant, Deut. vii. 3. God engaged to do them good upon this condition, that they should not mingle with the heathen; this was the covenant made with their fathers, the great charter by which that nation was incorporated. Have we not all one Father? Yes, we have, for has not one God created us? Are we not all his offspring? Here it seems to refer to the Jewish nation: Have we not all one father, Abraham, or Jacob? This they prided themselves in, We have Abraham to our father. "Has not one God created us, that is, formed us into a people, made us a nation by ourselves, and put a life into us, distinct from that of other nations? And should not this oblige us to maintain the dignity of our character?" They were dedicated to God, as well as distinguished from the neighbouring nations. Israel was holiness to the Lord (Jer. ii. 3), but by marrying strange wives they profaned this holiness, and laid the honour of it in the dust. Judah has married the daughter of a strange god. The harm was not so much that she was the daughter of a strange nation, but that she was the daughter of a strange God. God would reckon with them for it (v. 12): The Lord will cut off the man that doeth this, that marries the daughter of a strange god. He has, in effect, cut himself off from the holy nation, and God will cut him off, him and all that belongs to him; so the original intimates. God will no more own them as belonging to his nation; and the priest that offers an offering to the Lord, if he marry a strange wife (as we find many of the priests did, Ezra x. 18), shall not escape. He shall be cut off from the temple of the Lord, as others from the tabernacles of Jacob. In contempt of the marriage-covenant, which God instituted for the common benefit of mankind, they abused and put away the wives they had of their own nation (v. 13). They did not behave as they ought to have done towards their wives. The wives, not daring to make their case known to any other, complained to God, and covered the altar of the Lord with tears, with weeping, and with crying. The good Master we serve will not have his altar covered with tears, but compassed with songs. It is a reason given why yoke-fellows should live in holy love and joy—that their prayers may not be hindered, 1 Pet. iii. 7. They dealt treacherously with them, v. 14–16. They did not perform their promises to them, but took in concubines to share in the affection that was due to their wives only. They put them away, gave them a bill of divorce, and turned them off. In all this they covered violence with their garment; they abused their wives, and yet, in the sight of others, they pretended to be very loving to them. "The Lord has been witness between thee and the wife of thy youth (v. 14), has been witness to the marriage-covenant between thee and her, for to him you appealed concerning your sincerity and fidelity. She is thy wife; thy own, bone of thy bone and flesh of thy flesh, the nearest to thee of all the relations thou hast in the world, and to cleave to whom thou must quit the rest. She is the wife of thy youth, who had thy affections when they were at the strongest. Let not the darling of thy youth be the scorn and loathing of thy age. She is thy companion; she has long been an equal sharer with thee in thy cares, and griefs, and joys." The wife is to be looked upon, not as a servant, but as a companion to the husband. "She is the wife of thy covenant to whom thou art so firmly bound that, while she continues faithful, thou canst not be loosed from her, for it was a covenant for life." Man and wife should continue together, to their lives' end, in holy love and peace, and neither quarrel with each other nor separate from each other. God has joined them together (v. 15): Did not he make one, one Eve for one Adam, that Adam might never take another to her to vex her (Lev. xviii. 18), nor put her away to make room for another? Designing Adam a help meet for him, he made him one wife; had he made him more, he would not have had a meet help. And wherefore did he make but one woman for one man? It was that he might seek a godly seed—a seed of God (so the word is), a seed that should bear the image of God, that every man having his own wife, and but one, according to the law (1 Cor. vii. 2), they might live in chaste and holy love, and not, as brute beasts, that the children, being born in holy matrimony, which is an ordinance of God, might thus be made a seed to serve him. God is much displeased with those who go about to put asunder what he has joined together (v. 16). The caution inferred from all this (v. 15): Therefore take heed to your spirit, and let none deal treacherously against the wife of his youth; and again, v. 16.

II. How corrupt their principles were, to which were owing all these corrupt practices! Let us trace up the streams to the fountain (v. 17): You have wearied the Lord with your words. It is a wearisome thing, even to God himself, to hear people insist upon their own justification in their corrupt and wicked practices. They had denied him to be a holy God, and had the impudence to say, Every one that does evil is good in the sight of the Lord, and he delights in them. This wicked inference they drew, without any reason, from the prosperity of sinners in their sinful courses (see ch. iii. 15). Under pretence of making God not so severe as he was commonly represented, they said he was altogether such a one as themselves. They said, "Where is the God of judgment? We may do what we please; he sees us not, nor will regard us."

CHAP. III

I. A promise of the coming of the Messiah, and of his forerunner; and the errand he comes upon is here particularly described, ver. 1–6. II. A reproof of the Jews for their corrupting God's ordinances with a charge to them to amend this matter, and a promise that, if they did, God would return in mercy to them, ver. 7–12. III. A description of the wickedness of the wicked that speak against God (ver. 13–15), and of the righteousness of the righteous that speak for him, with the precious promises made to them, ver. 16–18.

Verses 1–6

The first words of this chapter seem a direct answer to the profane atheistical demand of the scoffers: Where is the God of judgment? "Here he is; he is just at the door; the long-expected Messiah is ready to appear; and he says, For judgment have I come into this world."

I. A prophecy of the appearing of his forerunner John the Baptist, which the prophet Isaiah had foretold (ch. xl. 3), as the preparing of the way of the Lord. 1. He is God's messenger. John Baptist had his commission from heaven, and not of men. All held John Baptist for a prophet, for he was God's messenger, as the prophets were, to call men to repentance and reformation. 2. He is Christ's harbinger: He shall prepare the way before me, by taking them off from a confidence in their relation to Abraham as their father (which, they thought, would serve their turn without a saviour), and by giving notice that the Messiah was now at hand.

II. A prophecy of the appearing of the Messiah himself: "The Lord, whom you seek, shall suddenly come to his temple, even the God of judgment, who, you think, has forsaken the earth. The Messiah has been long called he that should come, now shortly he will come." 1. He is the Lord—Adonai, the basis and foundation on which the world is founded, that one Lord over all (Acts x. 36) that has all power committed to him (Matt. xxviii. 18) and is to reign over the house of Jacob for ever, Luke i. 33. 2. He is the Messenger of the covenant, or the angel of the covenant, sent from heaven to negotiate a peace between God and man. Christ is the angel of this covenant, by whose mediation it is brought about and established. That covenant which is all our salvation began to be spoken by the Lord, Heb. ii. 3. Though he is the prince of the covenant (as some read this) yet he condescended to be the messenger of it. 3. He it is whom you seek, whom you delight in, whom the pious Jews expect and desire. In looking and waiting for him, they looked for redemption in Jerusalem and waited for the consolation of Israel, Luke ii. 25, 38. Those that seek Jesus shall find pleasure in him. If he be our heart's desire he will be our heart's delight. 4. He shall suddenly come; his coming draws nigh, and we see it not at so great a distance as the patriarchs saw it at. 5. He shall come to his temple, this temple at Jerusalem, which was lately built. It is his temple, for it is his Father's house, John ii. 16.

III. The great ends and intentions of his coming, v. 2. He is one whom they seek, and yet who may abide the day of his coming, though he comes not to condemn the world, but that the world through him might have life? Even in the days of his flesh there were some emanations of his glory and power, such as none could stand before, witness his transfiguration. The Jewish doctors speak of the pangs or griefs of the Messiah, meaning (they say) the great afflictions that should be to Israel at the time of his coming. He shall be like a refiner's fire, which separates between the gold and the dross by melting the ore, or like fuller's soap, which with much rubbing fetches the spots out of the cloth. Christ came to discover men, that the thoughts of many hearts might be revealed (Luke ii. 35), to separate between the precious and the vile, for his fan is in his hand (Matt. iii. 12).

1. The gospel shall work good upon those that are disposed to be good, to them it shall be a savour of life unto life (v. 3): He shall sit as a refiner. He will purge them as gold and silver, that is, he will sanctify them inwardly. He will purge them with fire, as gold and silver are purged, for he baptizes with the Holy Ghost and with fire (Matt. iii. 11), with the Holy Ghost working like fire. That they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness, that is, that they may be in sincerity converted to God and consecrated. He makes the tree good that the fruit may be good. And then it follows (v. 4), The offering of Judah and Jerusalem shall be pleasant unto the Lord. It shall no longer be offensive, as when they brought the torn, and the lame, and the sick, for sacrifice; but it shall be acceptable. The Messiah will, by his grace in them, make them acceptable; when he has purified and refined them, then they shall offer such sacrifices as God requires and will accept. He will, by his intercession for them, make them accepted.

2. It shall turn for a testimony against those that are resolved to go on in their wickedness, v. 5. This is the direct answer to their challenge, "Where is the God of judgment? You shall know where he is, and shall know it to your terror and confusion, for I will come near to you to judgment." The sinners that must appear to be judged by the gospel of Christ are the sorcerers, who deal in spiritual wickedness, and the adulterers, who wallow in the lusts of the flesh; and the false swearers, who profane God's name by calling him to witness to a lie; and the oppressors, who defraud the hireling in his wages and crush the widow and fatherless. That which is at the bottom of all this is, They fear not me, saith the Lord of hosts. I will come near and will be a swift witness against them.

IV. The ratification of all this (v. 6): For I am the Lord; I change not; therefore you sons of Jacob are not consumed. Though the sentence passed against evil works (v. 5) be not executed speedily, yet it will be executed for he is the Lord; he changes not. The people of Israel had reason to say that he was an unchangeable God, for he had been faithful to his covenant with them and their fathers. They had been false and fickle in their conduct to him, and he might justly have abandoned them; but because he remembered his covenant, they were preserved. We may apply this to ourselves; because we have to do with a God that changes not, therefore it is that we are not consumed.

Verses 7–12

God's controversy with the men of that generation for deserting his service and robbing him.

I. They had run away from their Master, and quitted the work he gave them to do (v. 7): You have gone away from my ordinances and have not kept them. What a gracious invitation God gives them to return and repent: "Return unto me, and to your duty, return to your allegiance, return as a traveller that has missed his way, as a soldier that has run his colours, as a treacherous wife that has gone away from her husband; return to me; and then I will return to you and will remove the judgments you are under and prevent those you fear." What a peevish answer they return! "But you said with disdain to the prophets, to one another, to your own hearts, to stifle the convictions you were under: you said, Wherein shall we return?" They take it as an affront to be told of their faults, and called upon to amend them. They are so ignorant of themselves, and of the strictness, extent, and spiritual nature, of the divine law, that they think they need no repentance. They are firmly resolved to go on in sin.

II. They had robbed their Master, and embezzled his goods. They stand indicted for robbery, for sacrilege, the worst of robberies: You have robbed me. Will a man be so daringly impudent as to rob God? Will a man do violence to God? so some read it. Will a man stint or straighten him? so others read it. The people plead Not guilty, and put God upon the proof of it. They rob God, and know not what they do. They rob him of his honour, rob him of that which is devoted to him, to be employed in his service, rob him of themselves, rob him of sabbath-time, rob him of that which is given for the support of religion, and give him not his dues out of their estates; and yet they ask, Wherein have we robbed thee? It is in tithes and offerings. They detained them, defrauded the priests of them, would not pay their tithes. They brought not the offerings which God required, or brought the torn, and lame, and sick which were not fit for use. For this they were cursed with a curse, v. 9. God punished them with famine and scarcity, through unseasonable weather, or insects that ate up the fruits of the earth. Because God had punished them with scarcity of bread, they made that a pretence for robbing him—that now, being impoverished, they could not afford to bring their tithes and offerings. They are urged to reform in this matter, with a promise that if they did the judgments should be removed. Bring you all the tithes into the storehouse. "Bring in the full tithes to the utmost that the law requires, that there may be meat in God's house for those that serve at the altar, whether there be meat in your houses or no." "Let God be first served, and then prove me herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, whether I will not open the windows of heaven." The expression is figurative; every good gift coming from above, thence God will plentifully pour out upon them the bounties of his providence. Very sudden plenty is expressed by opening the windows of heaven, 2 Kings vii. 2. Here they are opened to pour down blessings, to such a degree that there should not be room enough to receive them. God will not only be reconciled to sinners that repent and reform, but he will be a bountiful benefactor, to them. God has blessings ready to bestow upon us, but, through the weakness of our faith and narrowness of our desires, we have not room to receive them. Whereas the fruits of their ground had been eaten up by locusts and caterpillars God would now remove that judgment (v. 11). Whereas they had lain under the reproach of famine, now all nations shall call them blessed.

Verses 13–18

I. The angry notice God takes of the impudent blasphemous talk of the sinners in Zion. Your words have been stout against me, saith the Lord. They came from their pride, and haughtiness, and contempt of God. They spoke it proudly, and with disdain, scorning to be under the divine check and government. What have we spoken so much against thee, so much that there needs all this ado about it? They cannot deny that they have spoken against God, but they make a light matter of it. They said, It is vain to serve God, or, "He is vain that serves God, that is, he labours in vain and to no purpose; he has his labour for his pains, and therefore is a fool for his labour. We have walked mournfully, or in black, with great gravity and great grief, before the Lord of hosts, have afflicted our souls, and yet we are never the better." They would have it thought that they had served God and had kept his ordinances, whereas it was only the external observance of them that they had kept up, and therefore might say, It is in vain. They had walked mournfully before God, whereas God had required them to serve him with gladness, and to walk cheerfully before him. They by their own superstitions made the service of God a task and drudgery to themselves, and then complained of it as a hard service. They complained that they had got nothing by their religion; they were still in poverty and affliction. Perhaps this refers to the errors of the Sadducees. They denied a future state, and then said, It is vain to serve God, which has indeed some colour in it, for, if in this life only we had hope in Christ, we were of all men most miserable, 1 Cor. xv. 19. They maintained that wickedness was the way of prosperity, v. 15. The outward prosperity of sinners in their sins, as it has weakened the hands of the godly in their godliness (Ps. lxxiii. 13), so it has strengthened the hands of the wicked in their wickedness. Wait awhile, and you shall see those that work wickedness set up as a mark to the arrows of God's vengeance, and those that tempt God delivered to the tormentors.

II. Even in this corrupt and degenerate age, when there was so great a decay, so great a contempt, of serious godliness, there were yet some that retained their integrity and zeal for God. They feared the Lord—that is the beginning of wisdom and the root of all religion; they reverenced the majesty of God, submitted to his authority. In every age there has been a remnant that feared the Lord, though sometimes but a little remnant. They thought upon his name; and meditated upon the discoveries God has made of himself in his word and by his providences. They spoke often one to another concerning the God they feared. Those that feared the Lord kept together; they spoke kindly one to another, for the promoting of mutual love, that might not wax cold when iniquity did thus abound. They spoke intelligently to one another, for the increasing of faith and holiness. Then, when iniquity was bold and barefaced, the people of God took courage, and stirred up themselves, the innocent against the hypocrite, Job xvii. 8. When religion was misrepresented, its friends did all they could to support the credit of it. When seducers were busy to deceive unwary souls with prejudices against religion, those that feared God were industrious to strengthen one another's hands. God countenanced them: The Lord hearkened and heard it, and was well pleased with it. When the two disciples, going to Emmaus, were discoursing concerning Christ, he hearkened and heard, and joined himself to them, and made a third, Luke xxiv. 15. A book of remembrance was written before him. God remembers the services of his people, that he may say, Well done; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. God has a book for the sighs and tears of his mourners (Ps. lvi. 8). Never was any good word spoken of God, or for God, but it was registered, that it might be recompensed. He promises them a share in his glory hereafter (v. 17): They shall be mine, saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels. They shall be my segullah—my peculiar treasure (it is the word used, Exod. xix. 5), in the day when I make or do what I have said and designed to do; so some read it. The saints are God's jewels; they are a royal diadem in his hand, Isa. lxii. 3. There is a day coming when God will make up his jewels. They shall be gathered up out of the dirt into which they are now thrown, from all places to which they are now scattered. He promises them a share in his grace now: I will spare them as a man spares his own son that serves him. The word usually signifies to spare with compassion, as a father pities his children, Ps. ciii. 13. It is our duty to serve God with the disposition of children. We must be his sons, must by a new birth partake of a divine nature. And we must be his servants; God will not have his children trained up in idleness; they must do him service, from a principle of love, with cheerfulness and delight. Nehemiah, when he had done much good, yet, knowing there is not a just man on earth, that does good and sins not, prays, Lord, spare me according to the greatness of thy mercy; Neh. xiii. 22. And God as a Father, will show them this mercy. They will thus be distinguished from the children of this world (v. 18). You that now speak against God as making no difference between good and bad, and say, It is in vain to serve him (v. 14), you shall be made to see your error. This manifest difference that was made between the believing Jews and those that persisted in their infidelity, at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish church and nation, by the Romans. But it is to have its full accomplishment at the second coming of Jesus Christ. All the children of men are either such as serve God or such as serve him not. In this world it is often hard to discern between the righteous and the wicked. There are many who, we think, serve God, who, having not their hearts right with him, will be found none of his servants; and, on the other hand, many will be found his faithful servants, who, because they followed not with us, did not, as we thought, serve him. At the bar of Christ, in the last judgment, it will be easy to discern between the righteous and the wicked; for then every man's character will be both perfected and perfectly discovered, every man will then appear in his true colours, and his disguises will be taken off.

CHAP. IV

I. Concerning the state of recompence and retribution, ver. 1–3. This is represented under a prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem. II. Concerning the state of trial and preparation they are directed to keep to the law of Moses (ver. 4) and expect a further discovery of God's will by Elijah the prophet, that is, by John Baptist, the harbinger of the Messiah, ver. 5, 6.

Verses 1–3

The great and terrible day of the Lord, like the pillar of cloud and fire, shall have a dark side turned towards the Egyptians that fight against God, and a bright side towards the faithful Israelites that follow him: The day cometh, has reference both to the first and to the second coming of Jesus Christ.

I. In both Christ is a consuming fire to those that rebel against him. The day of his coming shall burn as an oven; it shall be a day of wrath, of fiery indignation. God, that has perfect knowledge of everyone's character, knows who are the proud, and of everyone's actions, knows who they are that do wickedly; and they shall be as stubble to this fire; they shall be consumed by it, and it is wholly owing to themselves that they shall be so, for they make themselves stubble, that is, combustible matter, to this fire. Those that by their unbelief oppose Christ thereby set themselves as briers and thorns before a devouring fire, Isa. xxvii. 4, 5. The day that cometh shall burn them up, and shall leave them neither root nor branch. Now this was fulfilled when Christ spoke terror and condemnation to the proud Pharisees and the other Jews that did wickedly, when he sent that fire on the earth which burnt up the chaff of the traditions of the elders and the corrupt glosses they had put upon the law of God. Jerusalem was destroyed by the Romans, and the nation of the Jews, as a nation, blotted out. This seems to be principally intended here; our Saviour says that those should be the days of vengeance, Luke xxi. 22. It is certainly applicable also to the day of judgment.

II. In both Christ is a rejoicing light to those who serve him faithfully (v. 2). Here are mercy and comfort kept in store for all those who fear the Lord and think on his name. To you that fear my name shall the Sun of righteousness arise, with healing in his wings. The day that comes will be a fair and bright day to those who fear God, and reviving as the rising sun is to the earth; and particular notice is taken of the rising of the sun upon Zoar when that was mercifully distinguished from the cities of the plain, Gen. xix. 23. When the hearts of others fail for fear let them lift up their heads for joy, for their redemption draws nigh, Luke xxi. 28. By the Sun of righteousness here we are certainly to understand Jesus Christ. But it is to be applied to the coming of Christ in the flesh to seek and save those that were lost. Christ is the light of the world. He is the light of men (John i. 4), is to men's souls as the sun is to the visible world, which without the sun would be a dungeon; so would mankind be darkness itself without the light of the glory of God shining in the face of Christ. He is the Sun of righteousness, for he is himself a righteous Saviour. Righteousness sometimes signifies mercy or benignity, and it was in Christ that the tender mercy of our God visited us. Those that are governed by a holy fear of God shall have his love also shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost. Christ's second coming will be a glorious and welcome sun-rising to all that fear his name. Christ came, as the sun, to bring not only light to a dark world, but health to a diseased distempered world. The Jews have a proverbial saying, As the sun riseth, infirmities decrease. Christ came into the world to be the great physician, and the great medicine too, both the balm in Gilead, and the physician there. When he was upon earth, he went about as the sun in his circuit, doing this good; he healed all manner of sicknesses and diseases among the people. His healing bodily diseases was a specimen of his great design in coming into the world to heal the diseases of men's souls. "You shall go forth, as those that are healed go abroad and return to their business." The souls shall go forth out of their bodies at death, and the bodies out of their graves at the resurrection, as prisoners out of their dungeons, to see the light and be set at liberty. "You shall likewise grow up; being restored to health and liberty, you shall increase in knowledge, and grace, and spiritual strength." Those that by the grace of God are made wise and good are by the same grace made wiser and better. Their growth is compared to that of the calves of the stall, which is a quick, strong, and useful growth. Some read it, instead of You shall grow up, You shall move yourselves, or leap for joy, shall be as frolicsome as calves of the stall, when they are let loose in the open field. It shall make them victorious over their enemies (v. 3): You shall tread down the wicked. When believers by faith overcome the world, when they suppress their own corrupt appetites and passions, when the God of peace bruises Satan under their feet, then they tread down the wicked. The saints' triumphs are all owing to God's victories; it is not they that do this, but God that does it for them.

Verses 4–6

This is doubtless intended for a solemn conclusion. They were not to expect any more of the dictates of the Spirit of prophecy, till the beginning of the gospel of the Messiah.

Now there are two things required.

I. They must keep up an obedient veneration for the law of Moses (v. 4): Remember the law of Moses my servant, and observe to do according to it, even that law which I commanded unto him in Horeb. Honourable mention is made of Moses. God by Malachi calls him Moses my servant; for the righteous shall be had in everlasting remembrance. Honourable mention is made of the law of Moses; it was what God himself commanded. We are concerned to keep the law because God has commanded it and commanded it for us, for we are the spiritual Israel; and, if we expect the benefit of the covenant with Israel (Heb. viii. 10), we must observe the commands given to Israel, those of them that were intended to be of perpetual obligation. The office of conscience is to bid us remember the law. Even when we have made considerable advances in knowledge we must still retain the first principles of practical religion and resolve to abide by them. Those that study the writings of the prophets, and the apocalypse, must still remember the law of Moses and the four gospels. Prophecy was now to cease in the church for some ages, and the Spirit of prophecy not to return till the beginning of the gospel, and now they are told to remember the law of Moses; let them live by the rules and live upon the promises. As long as we have Bibles, we may keep our communion with God, and keep ourselves in his way. They were to expect the coming of the Messiah, the preaching of his gospel, and the setting up of his kingdom. Let them observe the law of Moses, and then they might expect the benefit of the gospel of Christ, for to him that has, and uses what he has well, more shall be given, and he shall have abundance.

II. They must keep up a believing expectation of the gospel of Christ, and must look for the beginning of it in the appearing of Elijah the prophet (v. 5, 6). The law and the prophets were until John (Luke xvi. 16); they continued to be the only lights of the church till that morning-star appeared. The Jewish doctors will have it to be the same Elijah that prophesied in Israel in the days of Ahab—that he shall come again to be the forerunner of the Messiah; yet others of them say not the same person, but another of the same spirit. But we Christians know very well that John Baptist was the Elias that was to come, Matt. xvii. 10–13; and very expressly, Matt. xi. 14, This is Elias that was to come; and v. 10, the same of whom it is written, Behold, I send my messenger, ch. iii. 1. Elijah was a man of great austerity, bold in reproving sin. John Baptist was animated by the same spirit and power, and preached repentance and reformation, as Elias had done. John Baptist gave them fair warning when he told them of the wrath to come, and put them into a way of escape from it, and when he told them of the fan in Christ's hand, with which Christ would thoroughly purge his floor; see Matt. iii. 7, 10, 12. John Baptist shall turn the heart of the fathers to their children, and the heart of the children to their fathers; so making ready a people prepared for him (Luke i. 16, 17). It is promised concerning John, 1. That he shall make a bold stand against the strong torrent of sin and impiety. This is called his coming to restore all things (Matt. xvii. 11). 2. That he shall preach a doctrine that shall reach men's hearts. Many had their consciences awakened by his ministry. 3. That he shall turn the hearts of the fathers with the children, and of the children with the fathers (for so some read it), to God and to their duty. 4. That thus he shall be an instrument to bind them faster to each other, by bringing and binding them all to their God. He shall prepare the way for that kingdom of heaven which will make all its faithful subjects of one heart and one soul (Acts iv. 32), which will be a kingdom of love, and will slay all enmities. The body of the Jewish nation, by their impiety and impenitence in it, had laid themselves open to the curse of God. God was ready to smite them with that curse, but he will yet once more try them, and therefore he sends John Baptist to preach repentance to them, that their conversion might prevent their confusion; so unwilling is God that any should perish. Some observe that the last word of the Old Testament is a curse, that we may bid Christ welcome, who comes with a blessing; and it is with a blessing, with the choicest of blessings, that the New Testament ends, and with it let us arm ourselves, or rather let God arm us, against this curse. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with us all. Amen.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE GOSPEL

ACCORDING TO

ST. MATTHEW

I. The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; so this second part of the Holy Bible is entitled: The new covenant. But, when it is (as here) spoken of as Christ's act and deed, it is most properly rendered a testament, for he is the testator, and it becomes of force by his death (Heb. ix. 16, 17). All the grace contained in this book is owing to Jesus Christ as our Lord and Saviour; and, unless we consent to him as our Lord, we cannot expect any benefit by him as our Saviour. This is called a new testament, to distinguish it from that which was given by Moses. How carefully do we preserve, and with what attention and pleasure do we read, the last will and testament of a friend, who has therein left us a fair estate, and, with it, high expressions of his love to us! How precious then should this testament of our blessed Saviour be to us, which secures to us all his unsearchable riches! It is his testament; for though, as is usual, it was written by others, yet he dictated it; and the night before he died, in the institution of his supper, he signed, sealed, and published it, in the presence of twelve witnesses. In it is declared the whole counsel of God concerning our salvation, Acts xx. 27.

II. The Four Gospels. Gospel signifies good news, or glad tidings; and this history of Christ's coming into the world to save sinners is, without doubt, the best news that ever came from heaven to earth; the angel gave it this title (Luke ii. 10), Εὐαγγελίζομαι ὑμῖν—I bring you good tidings; I bring the gospel to you. And the prophet foretold it, Isa. lii. 7; lxi. 1. Gospel is an old Saxon word; it is God's spell or word. The four books which contain the history of the Redeemer we commonly call the four gospels, and the inspired penmen of them evangelists, or gospel-writers. These four gospels were early and constantly received by the primitive church, and read in Christian assemblies, as appears by the writings of Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who lived little more than a hundred years after the ascension of Christ. A Harmony of these four evangelists was compiled by Tatian about that time, which he called, Τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων—The Gospel out of the four. In the third and fourth centuries there were gospels forged by divers sects, and published, one under the name of St. Peter, another of St. Thomas, another of St. Philip, &c. But they were never owned by the church.

III. The Gospel according to St. Matthew. The penman was by birth a Jew, by calling a publican, till Christ commanded his attendance, and then he left the receipt of custom, to follow him, and was one of those that accompanied him all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out, beginning from the baptism of John unto the day that he was taken up, Acts i. 21, 22. He was therefore a competent witness of what he has here recorded. Doubtless, it was written in Greek, as the other parts of the New Testament were; not in that language which was peculiar to the Jews, whose church and state were near a period, but in that which was common to the world, and in which the knowledge of Christ would be most effectually transmitted to the nations of the earth.

CHAP. I

This evangelist begins with the account of Christ's parentage and birth, the ancestors from whom he descended, and the manner of his entry into the world, for it was foretold that he should be the son of David, and should be born of a virgin. I. His pedigree from Abraham in forty-two generations, three fourteens, ver. 1–17. II. An account of the circumstances of his birth, to show that he was born of a virgin, ver. 18–25.

Verses 1–17

Concerning this genealogy of our Saviour,

I. The title of it. It is the book of the generation of Jesus Christ, of his ancestors according to the flesh; or, It is the narrative of his birth. It is Βίβλος Γενέσεως—a book of Genesis. The Old Testament begins with the book of the generation of the world, but the glory of the New Testament herein excelleth, that it begins with the book of the generation of him that made the world.

II. The principal intention of it. It is not an endless or needless genealogy. It is like a pedigree given in evidence, to prove a title, and make out a claim; the design is to prove that our Lord Jesus is the son of David, and the son of Abraham, of that nation and family out of which the Messiah was to arise. Abraham and David were, in their day, the great trustees of the promise relating to the Messiah. It was promised to Abraham that Christ should descend from him (Gen. xii. 3; xxii. 18), and to David that he should descend from him (2 Sam. vii. 12; Ps. lxxxix. 3, &c.; cxxxii. 11). Christ is here first called the son of David, because under that title he was commonly spoken of, and expected, among the Jews. They who owned him to be the Christ, called him the son of David, ch. xv. 22; xx. 31; xxi. 15. This, therefore, the evangelist undertakes to make out, that he is not only a son of David, but that son of David on whose shoulders the government was to be; not only a son of Abraham, but that son of Abraham who was to be the father of many nations.

In calling Christ the son of David, and the son of Abraham, he shows that God is faithful to his promise, and will make good every word that he has spoken; and this, 1. Though the performance be long deferred. Delays of promised mercies, though they exercise our patience, do not weaken God's promise. 2. Though it begin to be despaired of. This son of David, and son of Abraham, who was to be the glory of his Father's house, was born when the seed of Abraham was a despised people, recently become tributary to the Roman yoke, and when the house of David was buried in obscurity; for Christ was to be a root out of a dry ground.

III. The particular series of it, drawn in the direct line from Abraham downward, according to the genealogies recorded in the beginning of the books of Chronicles.

Some particulars in this genealogy.

1. Among the ancestors of Christ who had brethren, generally he descended from a younger brother; such Abraham himself was, and Jacob, and Judah, and David, and Nathan, and Rhesa; to show that the pre-eminence of Christ came not from the primogeniture of his ancestors, but from the will of God, who exalteth them of low degree, and puts more abundant honour upon that part which lacked.

2. Among the sons of Jacob, besides Judah from whom Shiloh came, notice is here taken of his brethren: Judas and his brethren. No mention is made of Ishmael the son of Abraham, or of Esau the son of Isaac; because they were shut out of the church; whereas all the children of Jacob were taken in and therefore are mentioned in this genealogy.

3. Phares and Zara, the twin-sons of Judah, are likewise both named, though Phares only was Christ's ancestor, for the same reason that the brethren of Judah are taken notice of.

4. There are four women, and but four, named in this genealogy; two of them were originally strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, Rachab a Canaanitess, and a harlot besides, and Ruth the Moabitess; for in Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew; those that are strangers and foreigners are welcome, in Christ, to the citizenship of the saints. The other two were adulteresses, Thamar and Bathsheba; which was a further mark of humiliation put upon our Lord Jesus. He took upon him the likeness of sinful flesh (Rom. viii. 3), and takes even great sinners, upon their repentance, into the nearest relation to himself.

5. Though divers kings are here named, yet none is expressly called a king but David (v. 6), because with him the covenant of royalty was made. The Messiah is therefore said to inherit the throne of his father David, Luke i. 32.

6. In the pedigree of the kings of Judah, between Joram and Ozias (v. 8), there are three left out, namely, Ahaziah, Joash, and Amaziah; and therefore when it is said, Joram begat Ozias, it is meant, according to the usage of the Hebrew tongue, that Ozias was lineally descended from him.

7. Some observe what a mixture there was of good and bad in the succession of these kings; as for instance (v. 7, 8), wicked Roboam begat wicked Abia; wicked Abia begat good Asa; good Asa begat good Josaphat; good Josaphat begat wicked Joram. Grace does not run in the blood, neither does reigning sin. God's grace is his own, and he gives or withholds it as he pleases.

8. The captivity in Babylon is mentioned as a remarkable period in this line, v. 11, 12. All things considered, it was a wonder that the Jews were not lost in that captivity, as other nations have been; but this intimates the reason why the streams of that people were kept to run pure through that dead sea, because from them, as concerning the flesh, Christ was to come.

9. Josias is said to beget Jechonias and his brethren (v. 11); by Jechonias here is meant Jehoiakim, who was the first-born of Josias. When Jechonias is said to have been written childless (Jer. xxii. 30), it is explained thus: No man of his seed shall prosper. Salathiel is here said to beget Zeruhbabel, whereas Salathiel begat Pedaiah, and he begat Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 19): but, as before, the grandson is often called the son.

10. The line is brought down, not to Mary the mother of our Lord, but to Joseph the husband of Mary (v. 16); for the Jews always reckoned their genealogies by the males; yet Mary was of the same tribe and family with Joseph, so that, both by his mother and by his supposed father, he was of the house of David.

11. The centre in whom all these lines meet is Jesus, who is called Christ, v. 16. This is he that was so importunately desired, so impatiently expected. They who do the will of God are in a more honourable relation to Christ than those who were akin to him according to the flesh, ch. xii. 50. Jesus is called Christ, that is, the Anointed, the same with the Hebrew name Messiah.

Lastly, The general summary of all this genealogy we have, v. 17, where it is summed up in three fourteens, signalised by remarkable periods. In the first fourteen, we have the family of David rising, and looking forth as the morning; in the second, we have it flourishing in its meridian lustre; in the third, we have it declining and growing less and less, dwindling into the family of a poor carpenter, and then Christ shines forth out of it, the glory of his people Israel.

The mystery of Christ's incarnation is to be adored, not pried into. If we know not the way of the Spirit in the formation of common persons, nor how the bones are formed in the womb of anyone that is with child (Eccles. xi. 5), much less do we know how the blessed Jesus was formed in the womb of the blessed virgin. Some circumstances attending the birth of Christ are not in Luke, though it is more largely recorded there. Here we have,

I. Mary's espousals to Joseph. Mary, the mother of our Lord, was espoused to Joseph, not completely married, but contracted. We read of a man who has betrothed a wife and has not taken her, Deut. xx. 7. Christ was born of a virgin, but a betrothed virgin, 1. To put respect upon the marriage state, and to recommend it as honourable among all. Who more highly favoured than Mary was in her espousals? 2. To save the credit of the blessed virgin, which otherwise would have been exposed. It was fit that her conception should be protected by a marriage, and so justified in the eye of the world. 3. That the blessed virgin might have one to be a help-meet for her. Some think that Joseph was now a widower, and that those who are called the brethren of Christ (ch. xiii. 55), were Joseph's children by a former wife. Joseph was a just man, she a virtuous woman. We may also learn, from this example, that it is good to enter into the married state with deliberation, and not hastily —to preface the nuptials with a contract. It is better to take time to consider before than to find time to repent after.

II. Her pregnancy of the promised seed; before they came together, she was found with child, which really was of the Holy Ghost. Now we may well imagine, what a perplexity this might justly occasion to the blessed virgin. She herself knew the divine original of this conception; but how could she prove it? She would be dealt with as a harlot. Never was any daughter of Eve so dignified as the Virgin Mary was, and yet in danger of falling under the imputation of one of the worst of crimes; yet we do not find that she tormented herself about it; but, being conscious of her own innocence, she kept her mind calm and easy, and committed her cause to him that judgeth righteously.

III. Joseph's perplexity, and his care what to do in this case. He is loth to believe so ill a thing of one whom he believed to be so good a woman; and yet the matter, as it is too bad to be excused, is also too plain to be denied.

1. The extremity which he studied to avoid. He was not willing to make her a public example. He might have done so, Deut. xxii. 23, 24. How different was the spirit which Joseph displayed from that of Judah, who in a similar case hastily passed that severe sentence, Bring her forth and let her be burnt! Gen. xxxviii. 24. How good is it to think on things, as Joseph did here! Were there more of deliberation in our censures and judgments, there would be more of mercy and moderation in them.

Some persons of a rigorous temper would blame Joseph for his clemency: but it is here spoken of to his praise; because he was a just man, therefore he was not willing to expose her. He was a religious, good man; and therefore inclined to be merciful as God is, and to forgive as one that was forgiven. It becomes us, in many cases, to be gentle towards those that come under suspicion of having offended. That court of conscience which moderates the rigour of the law we call a court of equity. Those who are found faulty were perhaps overtaken in the fault, and are therefore to be restored with the spirit of meekness.

2. The expedient he found out for avoiding this extremity. He was minded to put her away privily, that is, to give a bill of divorce into her hand before two witnesses, and so to hush up the matter among themselves. The necessary censures of those who have offended ought to be managed without noise. Christian love and Christian prudence will hide a multitude of sins, and great ones, as far as may be done without having fellowship with them.

IV. Joseph's discharge from this perplexity by an express sent from heaven, v. 20, 21. While he thought on these things and knew not what to determine, God graciously directed him what to do, and made him easy. Those who would have direction from God must think on things themselves, and consult with themselves. It is the thoughtful, not the unthinking, whom God will guide. When he was at a loss, and had carried the matter as far as he could in his own thoughts, then God came in with advice. God's time to come in with instruction to his people is when they are nonplussed and at a stand. The message was sent to Joseph by an angel of the Lord. How far God may now, in an invisible way, make use of the ministration of angels, for extricating his people out of their straits, we cannot say; but this we are sure of, they are all ministering spirits for their good. This angel appeared to Joseph in a dream when he was asleep. When we are most quiet and composed we are in the best frame to receive the notices of the divine will.

1. Joseph is here directed to proceed in his intended marriage. It was requisite to put this poor carpenter in mind of his high birth: "Value thyself. Joseph, thou art that son of David through whom the line of the Messiah is to be drawn." We may thus say to every true believer, "Fear not, thou son of Abraham, thou child of God; forget not the dignity of thy birth, thy new birth." Fear not to take Mary for thy wife; so it may be read.

2. He is here informed concerning that holy thing with which his espoused wife was now pregnant. That which is conceived in her is of a divine original. Two things he is told,

(1) That she had conceived by the power of the Holy Ghost; not by the power of nature. The Holy Spirit, who produced the world, now produced the Saviour of the world, and prepared him a body, as was promised him, when he said, Lo, I come, Heb. x. 5. He is the Son of God, and yet so far partakes of the substance of his mother as to be called the fruit of her womb, Luke i. 42. Histories tell us of some who vainly pretended to have conceived by a divine power, as the mother of Alexander; but none ever really did so, except the mother of our Lord. We do not read that the virgin Mary did herself proclaim the honour done to her; but she hid it in her heart, and therefore God sent an angel to attest it.

(2) That she should bring forth the Saviour of the world (v. 21).

[1] In the name that should be given to her Son: Thou shalt call his name Jesus, a Saviour. Jesus is the same name with Joshua, the termination only being changed, for the sake of conforming it to the Greek. Joshua is called Jesus (Acts vii. 45; Heb. iv. 8), from the Seventy. Christ is our Joshua; both the Captain of our salvation, and the High Priest of our profession, and, in both, our Saviour—a Joshua who comes in the stead of Moses, and does that for us which the law could not do, in that it was weak. Joshua had been called Hosea, but Moses prefixed the first syllable of the name Jehovah, and so made it Jehoshua (Num. xiii. 16), to intimate that the Messiah, who was to bear that name, should be Jehovah; he is therefore able to save to the uttermost, neither is there salvation in any other.

[2] In the reason of that name: For he shall save his people from their sins. Those whom Christ saves he saves from their sins; from the guilt of sin by the merit of his death, from the dominion of sin by the Spirit of his grace. In saving them from sin, he saves them from wrath and the curse, and all misery here and hereafter. Those who leave their sins, and give up themselves to Christ as his people, are interested in the Saviour, and the great salvation which he has wrought out, Rom. xi. 26.

V. The fulfilling of the scripture in all this. This evangelist, writing among the Jews, more frequently observes this than any other of the evangelists. Here the Old Testament prophecies had their accomplishment in our Lord Jesus. Now the scripture that was fulfilled in the birth of Christ was that promise of a sign which God gave to king Ahaz (Isa. vii. 14), Behold a virgin shall conceive; where the prophet, encouraging the people of God to hope for the promised deliverance from Sennacherib's invasion, directs them to look forward to the Messiah, who was to come of the people of the Jews, and the house of David.

1. The sign given is that the Messiah shall be born of a virgin. A virgin shall conceive, and, by her, he shall be manifested in the flesh. The word Almah signifies a virgin in the strictest sense, such as Mary professes herself to be (Luke i. 34), I know not a man. Christ would be born, not of an empress or queen, for he appeared not in outward pomp or splendour, but of a virgin, to teach us spiritual purity.

2. The truth proved by this sign is, that he is the Son of God, and the Mediator between God and man; for they shall call his name Immanuel. Immanuel signifies God with us; a mysterious name, but very precious; God incarnate among us, and so God reconcilable to us, at peace with us, and taking us into covenant and communion with himself. The people of the Jews had God with them, in types and shadows, dwelling between the cherubim; but never so as when the Word was made flesh—that was the blessed Shechinah. By the light of nature, we see God as a God above us; by the light of the law, we see him as a God against us; but by the light of the gospel, we see him as Immanuel, God with us, in our own nature, and in our interest. Herein consists the salvation he wrought out, in the bringing of God and man together; this was what he designed, to bring God to be with us, which is our great happiness, and to bring us to be with God, which is our great duty.

VI. Joseph's obedience to the divine precept (v. 24). Being raised from sleep by the impression which the dream made upon him, he did as the angel of the Lord had bidden him. He took unto him his wife. God has still ways of making known his mind in doubtful cases, by hints of providence, debates of conscience, and advice of faithful friends; by each of these, applying the general rules of the written word, we should take direction from God.

VII. The accomplishment of the divine promise (v. 25). She brought forth her first-born son. The circumstances of it are more largely related, Luke ii.

1, &c. If Christ be formed in the soul, God himself has begun the good work which he will perform; what is conceived in grace will no doubt be brought forth in glory.

Joseph, though he solemnized the marriage with Mary, his espoused wife, knew her not till she had brought him forth. Much has been said concerning the perpetual virginity of the mother of our Lord: Jerome was very angry with Helvidius for denying it. It is certain that it cannot be proved from scripture. Dr. Whitby inclines to think that when it is said, Joseph knew her not till she had brought forth her first-born, it is intimated that, afterward he lived with her, according to the law, Exod. xxi. 10. Joseph called his name Jesus, according to the direction given him.

CHAP. II

In this chapter, we have the history of our Saviour's infancy. I. The wise men's solicitous enquiry after Christ, ver. 1–8. II. Their devout attendance on him, when they found out where he was, ver. 9–12. III. Christ's flight into Egypt, to avoid the cruelty of Herod, ver. 13–15. IV. The barbarous murder of the infants of Bethlehem, ver 16–18. V. Christ's return out of Egypt into the land of Israel again, ver. 19–23.

Verses 1–8

It was a mark of humiliation put upon the Lord Jesus that, though he was the Desire of all nations, yet his coming into the world was little observed and taken notice of, his birth was obscure and unregarded. He came into the world, and the world knew him not; nay, he came to his own, and his own received him not. Yet, as afterward, so in his birth, some rays of glory darted forth in the midst of the greatest instances of his abasement.

The first who took notice of Christ after his birth were the shepherds (Luke ii. 15, &c.), who saw and heard glorious things concerning him, and made them known abroad, to the amazement of all that heard them, v. 17, 18. After that, Simeon and Anna spoke of him, by the Spirit, to all that were disposed to heed what they said, Luke ii. 38. Now, one would think, these hints should have been taken by the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and they should with both arms have embraced the long-looked-for Messiah; but, for aught that appears, he continued nearly two years after at Bethlehem, and no further notice was taken of him till these wise men came. Nothing will awaken those that are resolved to be regardless. Observe,

I. When this enquiry was made concerning Christ. It was in the days of Herod the king. This Herod was an Edomite, made king of Judæa by Augustus and Antonius, the then chief rulers of the Roman state, a man made up of falsehood and cruelty; yet he was complimented with the title of Herod the Great.

II. Who and what these wise men were; they are here called Magicians. Some take it in a good sense; the Magi among the Persians were their philosophers and their priests; others think they dealt in unlawful arts; the word is used of Simon, the sorcerer (Acts viii. 9, 11), and of Elymas, the sorcerer (Acts xiii. 6), nor does the scripture use it in any other sense. Well, whatever sort of wise men they were before, now they began to be wise men indeed when they set themselves to enquire after Christ.

This we are sure of, 1. That they were Gentiles, and not belonging to the commonwealth of Israel. The Jews regarded not Christ, but these Gentiles enquired him out. Note, Many times those who are nearest to the means, are furthest from the end. See ch. viii. 11, 12. 2. That they were scholars. They dealt in arts, curious arts; good scholars should be good Christians, and then they complete their learning when they learn Christ. 3. That they were men of the east, who were noted for their soothsayings, Isa. ii. 6. Arabia is called the land of the east (Gen. xxv. 6), and the Arabians are called men of the east, Judges vi. 3. The presents they brought were the products of that country.

III. What induced them to make this enquiry. They, in their country, which was in the east, had seen an extraordinary star, such as they had not seen before; which they took to be an indication of an extraordinary person born in the land of Judæa, over which land this star was seen to hover. This differed so much from anything that was common that they concluded it to signify something uncommon. The birth of Christ was notified to the Jewish shepherds by an angel, to the Gentile philosophers by a star: to both God spoke in their own language, and in the way they were best acquainted with. The same star which they had seen in the east they saw a great while after, leading them to the house where Christ lay, was a candle set up on purpose to guide them to Christ. The idolaters worshipped the stars as the host of heaven, especially the eastern nations. Thus the stars that had been misused came to be put to the right use, to lead men to Christ; the gods of the heathen became his servants. Others impute their enquiry to the general expectation entertained at that time, in those eastern parts, of some great prince to appear. We may suppose a divine impression made upon their minds, enabling them to interpret this star as a signal given by Heaven of the birth of Christ.

IV. How they prosecuted this enquiry. They came from the east to Jerusalem, in further quest of this prince. They might have said, "If such a prince be born, we shall hear of him shortly in our own country, and it will be time enough then to pay our homage to him." But so impatient were they to be better acquainted with him, that they took a long journey on purpose to enquire after him. Those who truly desire to know Christ, and find him, will not regard pains or perils in seeking after him.

Their question is, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? They do not ask, whether there were such a one born? but, Where is he born? Those who know something of Christ cannot but covet to know more of him.

To this question they doubted not but to have a ready answer, and to find all Jerusalem worshipping at the feet of this new king; but no man can give them any information. There is more gross ignorance in the world, and in the church too, than we are aware of. Many that we think should direct us to Christ are themselves strangers to him. They pursue the enquiry, Where is he that is born king of the Jews? Are they asked, "Why do ye make this enquiry?" It is because they have seen his star in the east. Are they asked, "What business have ye with him? What have the men of the east to do with the King of the Jews?" They have their answer ready, We are come to worship him. Those in whose hearts the day-star is risen, to give them anything of the knowledge of Christ, must make it their business to worship him.

V. How this enquiry was treated at Jerusalem. News of it at last came to court; and when Herod heard it he was troubled, v. 3. He could not be a stranger to the prophecies of the Old Testament, concerning the Messiah and his kingdom, and the times fixed for his appearing by Daniel's weeks; but, having himself reigned so long and so successfully, he began to hope that those promises would for ever fail, and that his kingdom would be established and perpetuated in spite of them. What a damp therefore must it needs be upon him, to hear talk of this king being born.

But though Herod, an Edomite, was troubled, one would have thought Jerusalem should rejoice greatly to hear that her King comes; yet, it seems, all Jerusalem were troubled with Herod, and were apprehensive of I know not what ill consequences of the birth of this new king. The slavery of sin is foolishly preferred by many to the glorious liberty of the children of God, only because they apprehend some present difficulties attending that necessary revolution of the government in the soul. Herod and Jerusalem were thus troubled, from a mistaken notion that the kingdom of the Messiah would clash and interfere with the secular powers; whereas the star that proclaimed him king plainly intimated that his kingdom was heavenly, and not of this lower world.

VI. What assistance they met with in this enquiry from the scribes and the priests, v. 4-6. Nobody can pretend to tell where the King of the Jews is, but Herod enquires where it was expected he should be born. It was generally known that Christ should be born at Bethlehem (John vii. 42); but Herod would have counsel's opinion upon it, and therefore applies himself to the proper persons; all the chief priests, and all the scribes; and demands of them what was the place, where Christ should be born? Many a good question is put with an ill design.

The priests and scribes need not take any long time to give an answer to this query; nor do they differ in their opinion, but all agree that the Messiah must be born in Bethlehem, the city of David, here called Bethlehem of Judæa. Bethlehem signifies the house of bread; the fittest place for him to be born in who is the true manna, the bread which came down from heaven, which was given for the life of the world. Bethlehem's honour lay not, as that of other cities, in the multitude of the people, but in the magnificence of the princes it produced. Herein it had the pre-eminence above all the cities of Israel, that the Lord shall count, when he writes up the people, that this man, even the man Christ Jesus, was born there, Ps. lxxxvii. 6. Out of thee shall come a Governor, the King of the Jews. Bethlehem was the city of David, and David the glory of Bethlehem; there, therefore, must David's son and successor be born. There was a famous well at Bethlehem, by the gate, which David longed to drink of (2 Sam. xxiii. 15); in Christ we have not only bread enough and to spare, but may come and take also of the water of life freely.

VII. The bloody project and design of Herod, occasioned by this enquiry, v. 7, 8. Herod was now an old man, and had reigned thirty-five years; this king was but newly born, and not likely to enterprise anything considerable for many years; yet Herod is jealous of him. Crowned heads cannot endure to think of successors, much less of rivals; and therefore nothing less than the blood of this infant king will satisfy him. Passion has got the mastery of reason and conscience.

1. See how cunningly he laid the project (v. 7, 8). He privily called the wise men, to talk with them about this matter. He would not openly own his fears and jealousies. Sinners are often tormented with secret fears, which they keep to themselves. Herod learns of the wise men the time when the star appeared, and then employs them to enquire further, and bids them bring him an account. All this might look suspicious, if he had not covered it with a show of religion: that I may come and worship him also. The greatest wickedness often conceals itself under a mask of piety.

2. See how strangely he was befooled and infatuated in this, that he trusted it with the wise men. It was but seven miles from Jerusalem; how easily might he have sent spies to watch the wise men, who might have been as soon there to destroy the child as they to worship him!

Verses 9–12

We have here the wise men's humble attendance upon this new-born King of the Jews, and the honours they paid him. From Jerusalem they went to Bethlehem, resolving to seek till they should find; but it is very strange that they went alone. They came from a far country, to worship Christ while the Jews, his kinsmen, would not stir a step, would not go to the next town to bid him welcome. We must continue our attendance upon Christ, though we be alone in it; whatever others do, we must serve the Lord.

I. See how they found out Christ by the same star that they had seen in their own country, v. 9, 10. Observe, 1. How graciously God directed them. By the first appearance of the star they were given to understand where they might enquire for this King, and then it disappeared, and they were left to take the usual methods for such an enquiry. Extraordinary helps are not to be expected where ordinary means are to be had. Well, they had traced the matter as far as they could; they were upon their journey to Bethlehem, but that is a populous town. Where shall they find him when they come thither? Here they were at a loss, at their wit's end, but not at their faith's end; they believed that God would not leave them there; nor did he; for, behold, the star which they saw in the east went before them. If we go on as far as we can in the way of our duty, God will direct and enable us to do that which of ourselves we cannot do. The star had left them a great while, yet now returns. They who follow God in the dark shall find that light is sown, is reserved, for them. This star was the token of God's presence with them; for he is light, and goes before his people as their Guide. There is a day-star that arises in the hearts of those that enquire after Christ, 2 Peter i. 19. 2. Observe how joyfully they followed God's direction (v. 10). When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. Now they saw they were not deceived, and had not taken this long journey in vain. Now they were sure that God was with them, and the tokens of his presence and favour cannot but fill with joy unspeakable the souls of those that know how to value them. We cannot expect too little from man, nor too much from God. What a transport of joy these wise men were in upon this sight of the star. Now they had reason to hope for a sight of the Lord's Christ speedily, of the Sun of righteousness, for they see the Morning Star. We should be glad of everything that will show us the way to Christ. This star was sent to meet the wise men, and to conduct them into the presence chamber of the King. Now God fulfills his promise of meeting those that are disposed to rejoice and work righteousness (Isa. lxiv. 5). God is pleased sometimes to favour young converts with such tokens of his love as are very encouraging to them, in reference to the difficulties they meet with at their setting out in the ways of God.

II. See how they made their address to him when they had found him, v. 11. We may well imagine what a disappointment it was to them when they found a cottage was his palace, and his own poor mother all the retinue he had! However, these wise men were so wise as to see through this veil. They did not think themselves baulked or baffled in their enquiry; but, as having found the King they sought, they presented themselves first, and then their gifts, to him.

1. They presented themselves to him: they fell down, and worshipped him. We do not read that they gave such honour to Herod, though he was in the height of his royal grandeur; but to this babe they gave this honour, not only as to a king, but as to a God. All that have found Christ fall down before him; they adore him, and submit themselves to him. He is thy Lord, and worship thou him.

2. They presented their gifts to him. In the eastern nations, when they did homage to their kings, they made them presents. With ourselves, we must give up all that we have to Jesus Christ. Nor are our gifts accepted, unless we first present ourselves to him living sacrifices. The gifts they presented were, gold, frankincense, and myrrh, money, and money's-worth. Providence sent this for a seasonable relief to Joseph and Mary in their present poor condition. These were the products of their own country; what God favours us with, we must honour him with. They offered him gold, as a king, paying him tribute; frankincense, as God, for they honoured God with the smoke of incense; and myrrh, as a Man that should die, for myrrh was used in embalming dead bodies.

III. See how they left him when they had made their address to him, v. 12. Herod appointed them to bring him word. They would have done so, if they had not been countermanded, not suspecting their being thus made his tools in a wicked design. Those that mean honestly and well themselves are easily made to believe that others do so too, and cannot think the world is so bad as really it is. God prevented the mischief Herod designed to the Child Jesus. They were warned not to return to Herod, nor to Jerusalem; those were unworthy to have reports brought them concerning Christ, that might have seen with their own eyes, and would not. They departed into their own country another way, to bring the tidings to their countrymen; but it is strange that we never hear any more of them.

We have here Christ's flight into Egypt to avoid the cruelty of Herod. It was but little respect (compared with what should have been) that was paid to Christ in his infancy: yet even that, instead of honouring him among his people, did but expose him.

I. The command given to Joseph concerning it, v. 13. Joseph knew neither the danger the child was in, nor how to escape it; but God, by an angel, tells him both in a dream, as before he directed him in like manner what to do, ch. i. 20. Joseph is here told what their danger was: Herod will seek the young child to destroy him. God is acquainted with all the cruel projects and purposes of the enemies of his church. How early was the blessed Jesus involved in trouble! Usually, even those whose riper years are attended with toils and perils have a peaceable and quiet infancy; but it was not so with the blessed Jesus: his life and sufferings began together. He is directed what to do, to escape the danger; Take the young child, and flee into Egypt. Thus early must Christ give an example to his own rule (ch. x. 23): When they persecute you in one city, flee to another. Self-preservation, being a branch of the law of nature, is eminently a part of the law of God. Flee; but why into Egypt? Egypt was infamous for idolatry, tyranny, and enmity to the people of God. Yet that is appointed to be a place of refuge to the holy child Jesus. God, when he pleases, can make the worst of places serve the best of purposes. This may be considered,

1. As a trial of the faith of Joseph and Mary. They might be tempted to think, "If this child be the Son of God, as we are told he is, has he no other way to secure himself from a man that is a worm, than by such a mean and inglorious retreat as this? They had been lately told that he should be the glory of his people Israel; and is the land of Israel so soon become too hot for him? Now it appeared how well God had provided for the young child and his mother, in appointing Joseph to stand in so near a relation to them; now the gold which the wise men brought would stand them in stead to bear their charges. God foresees his people's distresses, and provides against them beforehand. God intimates the continuance of his care and guidance, when he saith, Be thou there until I bring thee word, so that he must expect to hear from God again, and not stir without fresh orders.

2. As an instance of the humiliation of our Lord Jesus. As there was no room for him in the inn at Bethlehem, so there was no quiet room for him in the land of Judæa. If we and our infants be at any time in straits, let us remember the straits Christ in his infancy was brought into.

3. As a token of God's displeasure against the Jews, who took so little notice of him; justly does he leave those who had slighted him.

II. Joseph's obedience to this command, v. 14. The journey would be inconvenient and perilous both to the young child and to his mother; yet Joseph was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, made no objection, nor was dilatory in his obedience. As soon as he had received his orders, he immediately arose, and went away by night. Those that would make sure work of their obedience, must make quick work of it. Now Joseph went out, as his father Abraham did, with an implicit dependence upon God, not knowing whither he went, Heb. xi. 8.

Joseph took the young child and his mother. Some observe, that the young child is put first, as the principal person, and Mary is called, not the wife of Joseph, but, which was her greater dignity, the mother of the young child. They continued in Egypt till the death of Herod. There they were at a distance from the temple and the service of it, and in the midst of idolaters. Though they were far from the temple of the Lord, they had with them the Lord of the temple. A forced absence from God's ordinances, and a forced presence with wicked people, may be the lot, are not the sin, yet cannot but be the grief, of good people.

III. The fulfilling of the scripture in all this—that scripture (Hos. xi. 1), Out of Egypt have I called my son. Of all the evangelists, Matthew takes most notice of the fulfilling of the scripture in what concerned Christ. Now this word of the prophet undoubtedly referred to the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, in which God owned them for his son, his first-born (Exod. iv. 22); but it is here applied, by way of analogy, to Christ, the Head of the church. The scripture has many accomplishments. God is every day fulfilling the scripture. It is no new thing for God's sons to be in Egypt, in a strange land, in a house of bondage; but they shall be fetched out. They may be hid in Egypt, but they shall not be left there.

Verses 16–18

I. Herod's resentment of the departure of the wise men. He waited long for their return; but he hears, upon enquiry, that they are gone off another way, which made him exceeding wroth; and he is the more desperate and outrageous for his being disappointed.

II. His politic contrivance, notwithstanding this, to take off him that is born King of the Jews. If he could not reach him by a particular execution, he doubted not but to involve him in a general stroke. It was strange that Herod could find any so inhuman as to be employed in such a bloody and barbarous piece of work; but wicked hands never want wicked tools to work with. Herod was now about seventy years old, so that an infant, at this time under two years old, was not likely ever to give him any disturbance. It was purely to gratify his own brutish lusts of pride and cruelty that he did this.

Observe, What large measures he took, 1. As to time; He slew all from two years old and under. It is probable that the blessed Jesus was at this time not a year old; yet Herod took in all the infants under two years old, that he might be sure not to miss his prey. 2. As to place; he kills all the male children, not only in Bethlehem, but in all the coasts thereof, in all the villages of that city. This was being overmuch wicked, Eccles. vii. 17. An unbridled wrath, armed with an unlawful power, often transports men to the most absurd and unreasonable instances of cruelty. We are not to suppose that these children were sinners above all that were in Israel, because they suffered such things. But we must look upon this murder of the infants under another character: it was their martyrdom. They shed their blood for him, who afterwards shed his for them. These were the infantry of the noble army of martyrs.

III. The fulfilling of the scripture in this (v. 17, 18); Then was fulfilled that prophecy (Jer. xxxi. 15), A voice was heard in Ramah. That prediction was accomplished in Jeremiah's time. But now the prophecy is again fulfilled in the great sorrow that was for the death of these infants. The scripture was fulfilled.

1. In the place of this mourning. The noise of it was heard from Bethlehem to Ramah; for Herod's cruelty extended itself to all the coasts of Bethlehem, even into the lot of Benjamin, among the children of Rachel. Rachel's sepulchre was hard by Bethlehem, Gen. xxxv. 16, 19. Compare 1 Sam. x. 2. These mothers were like Rachel, lived near Rachel's grave, and many of them descended from Rachel; and therefore their lamentations are elegantly respresented by Rachel's weeping.

2. In the degree of this mourning. It was lamentation and weeping, and great mourning; all little enough to express the sense they had of this aggravated calamity. There was a great cry in Egypt when the first-born were slain, and so there was here when the youngest was slain; for whom we naturally have a particular tenderness. This sorrow was so great, that they would not be comforted. Blessed be God, there is no occasion of grief in this world, no, not that which is supplied by sin itself, that will justify us in refusing to be comforted! They would not be comforted, because they are not, that is, they are not in the land of the living, are not as they were, in their mothers' embraces. If, indeed, they were not, there might be some excuse for sorrowing as though we had no hope; but we know they are not lost, but gone before; if we forget that they are, we lose the best ground of our comfort, 1 Thess. iv. 13. If we look further into this prophecy, we shall find that the bitter weeping in Ramah was but a prologue to the greatest joy, for it follows, Thy work shall be rewarded, and there is hope in thy end. The worst things are, the sooner they will mend.

Verses 19–23

We have here Christ's return out of Egypt into the land of Israel again. Egypt may serve to sojourn in, or take shelter in, for a while, but not to abide in. Christ was sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and therefore to them he must return.

I. What it was that made way for his return—the death of Herod, which happened not long after the murder of the infants. Such quick work did divine vengeance make! Of all sins, the guilt of innocent blood fills the measure soonest. So passionate and impatient was he, that he was a torment to himself, and a terror to all that attended him. See what kind of men have been the enemies and persecutors of Christ and his followers! Few have opposed Christianity but such as have first divested themselves of humanity.

II. The orders given from heaven concerning their return, and Joseph's obedience to those orders, v. 19–21. God had sent Joseph into Egypt, and there he stayed till the same that brought him thither ordered him thence. In all our removes, it is good to see our way plain, and God going before us; we should not move either one way or the other without order. No place can exclude God's gracious visits. Angels come to Joseph in Egypt, to Ezekiel in Babylon, and to John in Patmos. 1. The angel informs him of the death of Herod and his accomplices: They are dead, which sought the young Child's life. They are dead, but the young Child lives. Persecuted saints sometimes live to tread upon the graves of their persecutors. Thus did the church's King weather the storm, and many a one has the church in like manner weathered. 2. He directs him what to do. He must go and return to the land of Israel; and he did so without delay. God's people follow his direction whithersoever he leads them, wherever he lodges them.

III. The further direction he had from God, which way to steer, and where to fix in the land of Israel, v. 22, 23. God could have given him these instructions with the former, but God reveals his mind to his people by degrees, to keep them still waiting on him, and expecting to hear further from him. These orders Joseph received in a dream, probably, as those before, by the ministration of an angel.

Now the direction given this holy, royal family, is,

1. That it might not settle in Judæa, v. 22. Joseph might think that Jesus, being born in Bethlehem, must be brought up there; yet he is prudently afraid for the young Child, because he hears that Archelaus reigns in Herod's stead, but only over Judæa. See what a succession of enemies there is to fight against Christ and his church! If one drop off, another presently appears, to keep up the old enmity. But for this reason Joseph must not take the young Child into Judæa. God will not thrust his children into the mouth of danger, but when it is for his own glory and their trial.

2. That it must settle in Galilee, v. 22. There Philip now ruled, who was a mild, quiet man. Note, The providence of God commonly so orders it, that his people shall not want a quiet retreat from the storm and from the tempest. Thither they were sent, to Nazareth, a city upon a hill, in the centre of the lot of Zebulun; there the mother of our Lord lived, when she conceived that holy thing; and, probably, Joseph lived there too, Luke i. 26, 27. Thither they were sent, and there they were well known, and were among their relations; the most proper place for them to be in. There they continued, and from thence our Saviour was called Jesus of Nazareth, which was to the Jews a stumbling-block, for, Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?

In this is said to be fulfilled what was spoken by the prophets, He shall be called a Nazarene, which may be looked upon, (1) As a name of honour and dignity, though primarily it signifies no more than a man of Nazareth; there is an allusion or mystery in it, speaking Christ to be, [1] The Man, the Branch, spoken of, Isa. xi. 1. [2] It speaks him to be the great Nazarite. Not that Christ was, strictly, a Nazarite, for he drank wine, and touched dead bodies; but he was eminently so, both as he was singularly holy, and as he was by a solemn designation and dedication set apart to the honour of God in the work of our redemption, as Samson was to save Israel. Or, (2) As a name of reproach and contempt. To be called a Nazarene, was to be called a despicable man, a man from whom no good was to be expected, and to whom no respect was to be paid. It stuck as a nickname to him and his followers. Let no name of reproach for religion's sake seem hard to us, when our Master was himself called a Nazarene.

CHAP. III

The story of this chapter, concerning the baptism of John, begins the gospel (Mark i. 1); what went before is but preface or introduction. I. The glorious rising of the morning-star, John the Baptist. II. The more glorious shining forth of the Sun of righteousness, immediately after.

Verses 1–6

We have here an account of the preaching and baptism of John.

I. The time when he appeared. In those days (v. 1), or, after those days, long after what was recorded in the foregoing chapter, which left the child Jesus in his infancy; in those days, in the time appointed of the Father for the beginning of the gospel, when the fulness of time was come. Glorious things were spoken both of John and Jesus, at and before their births, which would have given occasion to expect some extraordinary appearances of a divine presence and power with them when they were very young; but it is quite otherwise. Except Christ's disputing with the doctors at twelve years old, nothing appears remarkable concerning either of them, till they were about thirty years old. And this was to show, 1. That even when God is acting as the God of Israel, the Saviour, yet verily he is a God that hideth himself (Isa. xlv. 15). 2. That our faith must principally have an eye to Christ in his office and undertaking, for there is the display of his power; but in his person is the hiding of his power.

Matthew says nothing of the conception and birth of John the Baptist, which is largely related by St. Luke, but finds him at full age, as if dropt from the clouds to preach in the wilderness. After Malachi there was no prophet, nor any pretender to prophecy, till John the Baptist.

II. The place where he appeared first. In the wilderness of Judæa. It was not an uninhabited desert, but a part of the country not so thickly peopled as other parts were; it was such a wilderness as had six cities and their villages in it. In these cities and villages John preached, for thereabouts he had hitherto lived. The word of the Lord found John here in a wilderness. No place is so remote as to shut us out from the visits of divine grace. It was in this wilderness of Judah that David penned the 63rd Psalm, which speaks so much of the sweet communion he then had with God, Hos. ii. 14. John Baptist was a priest of the order of Aaron, yet we find him preaching in a wilderness, and never officiating in the temple; but Christ, who was not a son of Aaron, is yet often found in the temple, and sitting there as one having authority. The Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple; not the messenger that was to prepare his way.

The beginning of the gospel in a wilderness, speaks comfort to the deserts of the Gentile world. The desert shall rejoice, Isa. xxxv. 1, 2.

III. His preaching. This he made his business. By the foolishness of preaching, Christ's kingdom must be set up.

1. The doctrine he preached was that of repentance (v. 2); Repent ye. He preached it, not in Jerusalem, but in the wilderness of Judæa, among the plain country people; for even those who think themselves most out of the way of temptation, and furthest from the vanities and vices of the town, cannot wash their hands in innocency, but must do it in repentance. John Baptist's business was to call men to repent of their sins. "Change your minds; you have thought amiss; think again, and think aright." The change of the mind produces a change of the way. Those who are truly sorry for what they have done amiss, will be careful to do so no more. This repentance is a necessary duty, in obedience to the command of God (Acts xvii. 30); and a necessary preparative and qualification for the comforts of the gospel of Christ. The sore must be searched, or it cannot be cured. I wound and I heal.

2. The argument he used to enforce this call was, For the kingdom of heaven is at hand. It is a kingdom of which Christ is the Sovereign. It is a kingdom of heaven, not of this world. John preached this as at hand; then it was at the door; to us it is come. (1) This is a great inducement to us to repent. There is nothing like the consideration of divine grace to break the heart, both for sin and from sin. Kindness is conquering; abused kindness, humbling and melting. What a wretch was I to sin against such grace, against the law and love of such a kingdom! (2) It is a great encouragement to us to repent. The proclamation of pardon discovers, and fetches in, the malefactor who before fled and absconded. Thus are we drawn to it with the cords of a man, and the bands of love.

IV. The prophecy that was fulfilled in him, v. 3. This is he that was spoken of in the beginning of that part of the prophecy of Esaias, which is mostly evangelical, and which points at gospel-times and gospel-grace; see Isa. xl. 3, 4. John is here spoken of,

1. As the voice of one crying in the wilderness. John owned it himself (John i. 23); I am the voice, and that is all, God is the Speaker, who makes known his mind by John, as a man does by his voice. John is called the voice of one crying aloud, which is startling and awakening. Christ is called the Word, which, being distinct and articulate, is more instructive. John as the voice, roused men, and then Christ, as the Word, taught them.

2. As one whose business it was to prepare the way of the Lord, and to make his paths straight. So John prepares the way of the Lord. (1) He himself did so among the men of that generation. In the Jewish church and nation, at that time, all was out of course. The people were, generally, extremely proud of their privileges, insensible of sin; and, though now under the most humbling providences, being lately made a province of the Roman Empire, yet they were unhumbled. Now John was sent to level these mountains, to take down their high opinion of themselves. (2) His doctrine of repentance and humiliation is still as necessary as it was then. There is a great deal to be done, to make way for Christ into a soul, and nothing is more needful, in order to this, than the discovery of sin, and a conviction of the insufficiency of our own righteousness. That which lets will let, until it be taken out of the way. The way of sin and Satan is a crooked way; to prepare a way for Christ, the paths must be made straight.

V. The garb in which he appeared, the figure he made, and the manner of his life, v. 4. He shall be great in the sight of the Lord, but mean in the eye of the world; and, as Christ himself, having no form or comeliness.

1. His dress was plain. This same John had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; for he lived in a country place, and suited his habit to his habitation. It is good for us to accommodate ourselves to the place and condition which God, in his providence, has put us in. John appeared in this dress, (1) To show that, like Jacob, he was a plain man, and mortified to this world, and the delights and gaieties of it. (2) To show that he was a prophet, for prophets wore rough garments, as mortified men (Zech. xiii. 4). (3) To show that he was a man of resolution; his girdle was not fine, such as were then commonly worn, but it was strong.

2. His diet was plain; his meat was locusts and wild honey. Locusts were a sort of flying insect, very good for food, and allowed as clean (Lev. xi. 22). Wild honey was that which Canaan flowed with, 1 Sam. xiv. 26. This intimates that he ate sparingly, a little served his turn; a man would be long ere he filled his belly with locusts and wild honey. He was so entirely taken up with spiritual things, that he could seldom find time for a set meal. Those whose business it is to call others to mourn for sin, and to mortify it, ought themselves to live a serious life, a life of self-denial. Every day was a fast-day with him. A conviction of the vanity of the world, and everything in it, is the best preparative for the entertainment of the kingdom of heaven in the heart. Blessed are the poor in spirit.

VI. The people who attended upon him, and flocked after him (v. 5); Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judæa. Great multitudes came to him from the city, and from all parts of the country. This was a great honour put upon John. Frequently those have most real honour done them, who least court the shadow of it. Men have a secret value and reverence for them, more than one would imagine. This gave John a great opportunity of doing good, and was an evidence that God was with him. It was generally thought that the kingdom of God would presently appear. They were ready to say of him, that he was the Christ (Luke iii. 15). Those who would have the benefit of John's ministry must go out to him in the wilderness, sharing in his reproach. They who would learn the doctrine of repentance must go out from the hurry of this world, and be still. It appears by the issue, that of the many who came to John's Baptism, there were but few that adhered to it. There may be a multitude of forward hearers, where there are but a few true believers.

VII. The rite, or ceremony, by which he admitted disciples, v. 6. Those who received his doctrine, and submitted to his discipline, were baptized of him in Jordan. They testified their repentance by confessing their sins. The Jews had been taught to justify themselves; but John teaches them to accuse themselves. A penitent confession of sin is required in order to peace and pardon; and those only are ready to receive Jesus Christ as their Righteousness, who are brought with sorrow and shame to own their guilt, 1 John i. 9. The benefits of the kingdom of heaven, now at hand, were thereupon sealed to them by baptism. He washed them with water, in token of this—that from all their iniquities God would cleanse them. It was the baptism of repentance, Acts xix. 4. All Israel were baptized unto Moses, 1 Cor. x. 2. The ceremonial law consisted in divers washings or baptisms (Heb. ix. 10); but John's baptism refers to the remedial law, the law of repentance and faith. By baptism he obliged them to live a holy life, according to the profession they took upon themselves. Confession of sin must always be accompanied with holy resolutions.

The doctrine John preached was that of repentance. Here we have the use of that doctrine. Application is the life of preaching, so it was of John's preaching. To whom he applied it; to the Pharisees and Sadducees that came to his baptism, v. 7. The Pharisees were zealots for the ceremonies, and the traditions of the elders; the Sadducees ran into the other extreme, and were little better than deists, denying the existence of spirits and a future state. Many come to ordinances, who come not under the power of them. Note the application was plain and home, and directed to their consciences; he speaks as one that came not to preach before them, but to preach to them. He was not bashful when he appeared in public, nor did he fear the face of man.

I. Here is a word of conviction and awakening. He begins harshly, calls them not Rabbi, gives them not the titles, much less the applauses, they had been used to. 1. The title he gives them is, O generation of vipers. Christ gave them the same title; ch. xii. 34; xxiii. 33. They were a viperous brood, the seed and offspring of such as had been of the same spirit; it was bred in the bone with them. They were a viperous gang, they were all alike; though enemies to one another, yet confederate in mischief. It becomes the ministers of Christ to be bold in showing sinners their true character. 2. The alarm he gives them is, Who has warned you to flee from the wrath to come? This intimates that they were in danger of the wrath to come; that it was next to a miracle to effect anything hopeful among them. "What brings you hither? Who thought of seeing you here? What fright have you been put into, that you enquire after the kingdom of heaven?" (1) There is a wrath to come. (2) It is the great concern of everyone of us to flee from this wrath. (3) It is wonderful mercy that we are fairly warned to flee from this wrath; think—Who has warned us? God has warned us, who delights not in our ruin. (4) These warnings sometimes startle those who seemed to have been very much hardened in their security and good opinion of themselves.

II. Here is a word of exhortation and direction (v. 8); "Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance. Therefore, because you profess repentance, and attend upon the doctrine and baptism of repentance, evidence that you are true penitents." Repentance is seated in the heart. There it is as a root; but in vain do we pretend to have it there, if we do not bring forth the fruits. Those are not worthy the name of penitents, or their privileges, who say they are sorry for their sins, and yet persist in them. They that profess repentance, as all that are baptized do, must be and act as becomes penitents.

III. Here is a word of caution, not to trust to their external privileges (v. 9); Think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father. There is a great deal which carnal hearts are apt to say within themselves, to put by the convincing, commanding power of the word of God. Please not yourselves with saying this (so some read it); "rock not yourselves asleep with this, nor flatter yourselves into a fool's paradise." God takes notice of what we say within ourselves. Many hide the lie that ruins them, in their right hand, and roll it under their tongue, because they are ashamed to own it. Now John shows them,

1. What their pretence was; "We have Abraham to our father; we are not sinners of the Gentiles; what is this to us?" The word does us no good, when we will not take it as spoken to us, and belonging to us. "Think not that because you are the seed of Abraham, therefore," (1) "You need not repent, that there is no occasion for you to change your mind or way." (2) "That therefore you shall fare well enough, though you do not repent." It is vain presumption to think that our having good relations will save us, though we be not good ourselves. What will all this avail us, if we do not repent, and live a life of repentance? Multitudes, by resting in the honours and advantages of their visible church-membership, take up short of heaven.

2. How foolish and groundless this pretence was; they thought that being the seed of Abraham, they were the only people God had in the world. John shows them the folly of this conceit; I say unto you (whatever you say within yourselves), that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. He was now baptizing in Jordan at Bethabara (John i. 28), the house of passage, where the children of Israel passed over; and there were the twelve stones, one for each tribe, which Joshua set up for a memorial, Joshua iv. 20. It is not unlikely that he pointed to those stones, which God could raise to be, more than in representation, the twelve tribes of Israel. Whatever comes of the present generation, God will never want a church in the world.

IV. Here is a word of terror to the careless and secure Pharisees and Sadducees, and other Jews, that knew not the signs of the times, nor the day of their visitation, v. 10. "Now look about you, now that the kingdom of God is at hand, and be made sensible."

1. "How strict and short your trial is; Now the axe is laid to the root of the tree; now you are marked for ruin, and cannot avoid it but by a speedy and sincere repentance. Behold, I come quickly." Now they were put upon their last trial; now or never.

2. "How sore and severe your doom will be, if you do not improve this." It is now declared with the axe at the root, that every tree, however high in gifts and honours, however green in external professions and performances, if it bring not forth good fruit, the fruits meet for repentance, is hewn down, disowned as a tree in God's vineyard, unworthy to have room there, and is cast into the fire of God's wrath—the fittest place for barren trees: what else are they good for? If not fit for fruit, they are fit for fuel.

V. A word of instruction concerning Jesus Christ. Christ's ministers preach, not themselves, but him.

1. The dignity and pre-eminence of Christ above John. See how meanly he speaks of himself, that he might magnify Christ (v. 11); "I indeed baptize you with water, that is the utmost I can do. But he that comes after me is mightier than I." John was truly great, great in the sight of the Lord (not a greater was born of woman), yet he thinks himself unworthy to be in the meanest place of attendance upon Christ, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear. He sees, (1) How mighty Christ is, in comparison with him. It is a great comfort to faithful ministers, to think that Jesus Christ is mightier than they, his strength is perfected in their weakness. (2) How mean he is in comparison with Christ, not worthy to carry his shoes after him! Those whom God puts honour upon, are thereby made very humble and low in their own eyes, so that Christ may be all.

2. The design and intention of Christ's appearing, which they were now speedily to expect. Christ will come to make a distinction.

(1) By the powerful working of his grace; He shall baptize you, that is, some of you, with the Holy Ghost and with fire. Note, [1] It is Christ's prerogative to baptize with the Holy Ghost. This he did in the extraordinary gifts of the Spirit conferred upon the apostles. This he does in the graces and comforts of the Spirit given to them that ask him. [2] They who are baptized with the Holy Ghost are baptized as with fire. Is fire enlightening? So the Spirit is a Spirit of illumination. Is it warming? And do not their hearts burn within them? Is it consuming? And does not the Spirit of judgment, as a Spirit of burning, consume the dross of their corruptions? Does fire make all it seizes like itself? And does it move upwards? So does the Spirit make the soul holy like itself, and its tendency is heaven-ward.

(2) By the final determinations of his judgment (v. 12); Whose fan is in his hand. Now he sits as a Refiner. Observe here, [1] The visible Church is Christ's floor. The temple, a type of the church, was built, upon a threshing-floor. [2] In this floor there is a mixture of wheat and chaff. True believers are as wheat, hypocrites are as chaff; these are now mixed, good and bad, under the same external profession. [3] There is a day coming when the floor shall be purged, and the wheat and chaff shall be separated. But it is the day of the last judgment that will be the great winnowing, distinguishing day, when saints and sinners shall be parted for ever. [4] Heaven is the garner into which Jesus Christ will shortly gather all his wheat, and not a grain of it shall be lost: and there is no chaff among them. They are not only gathered into the barn (ch. xiii. 30), but into the garner, where they are thoroughly purified. [5] Hell is the unquenchable fire, which will burn up the chaff. As we now are in the field, we shall be then in the floor.

Verses 13–17

Behold, the Sun of righteousness rises in glory. The fulness of time was come that Christ should enter upon his prophetical office; and he chooses to do it, not at Jerusalem, but there where John was baptizing; for to him resorted those who waited for the consolation of Israel, to whom alone he would be welcome. Christ's coming from Galilee to Jordan, to be baptized, teaches us not to shrink from pain and toil, that we may have an opportunity of drawing nigh to God in an ordinance. We should be willing to go far, rather than come short of communion with God. They who will find must seek.

Now in this story of Christ's baptism we may observe,

I. How hardly John was persuaded to admit of it, v. 14, 15. It was an instance of Christ's great humility, that he would offer himself to be baptized of John. As soon as ever Christ began to preach, he preached humility. Christ was designed for the highest honours, yet in his first step he thus abases himself. Those who would rise high must begin low. Before honour is humility. Those that honour God he will honour. Now here we have,

1. The objection that John made against baptizing Jesus, v. 14. John forbade him, as Peter did, when Christ went about to wash his feet, John xiii. 6, 8. Christ's gracious condescensions are so surprising, so deep and mysterious, that even they who know his mind well cannot soon find out the meaning of them. John's modesty thinks this an honour too great for him to receive. John had now obtained a great name, and was universally respected: yet see how humble he is still! God has further honours in reserve for those whose spirits continue low when their reputation rises.

(1) John thinks it necessary that he should be baptized of Christ; I have need to be baptized of thee with the baptism of the Holy Ghost, as of fire. [1] Though John was filled with the Holy Ghost from the womb (Luke i. 15), yet he acknowledges he had need to be baptized with that baptism. They who have much of the Spirit of God, see that they have need of more. [2] John has need to be baptized, though he was the greatest that ever was born of woman. The purest souls are most sensible of their own remaining impurity, and seek most earnestly for spiritual washing. [3] He has need to be baptized of Christ. The best and holiest of men have need of Christ, and the better they are, the more they see of that need. [4] This was said before the multitude, who had a great veneration for John, and were ready to embrace him for the Messiah. It is no disparagement to the greatest of men, to confess that they are undone without Christ and his grace. [5] John was Christ's forerunner, and yet owns that he had need to be baptized of him. Even they who were before Christ in time depended on him. [6] While John was dealing with others about their souls, observe how feelingly he speaks of the case of his own soul, I have need to be baptized of thee. Take heed to thyself first; save thyself, 1 Tim. iv. 16.

(2) He therefore thinks it very preposterous and absurd, that Christ should be baptized by him; Comest thou to me? Christ's coming to us may well be wondered at.

2. The overruling of this objection (v. 15); Jesus said, Suffer it to be so now. Christ accepted his humility, but not his refusal. See,

(1) How Christ insists upon it; It must be so now. Everything is beautiful in its season. But why now? Why yet? [1] Christ is now in a state of humiliation. He is not only found in fashion as a man, but is made in the likeness of sinful flesh, and thus he was made sin for us, though he knew no sin. [2] John's baptism is now in reputation, it is that by which God is now doing his work. What we see God owns, and while we see he does so, we must own. [3] It must be so now, because now is the time for Christ's appearing in public, and this will be a fair opportunity for it.

(2) The reason he gives for it; Thus it becomes us to fulfil all righteousness. [1] There was a propriety in everything that Christ did for us; it was all graceful, lovely, and of good report. [2] Our Lord Jesus looked upon it as a thing well becoming him, to fulfil all righteousness. Thus it becomes him to justify God, and approve his wisdom. Thus it becomes us to countenance and encourage everything that is good, by pattern as well as precept. Thus Jesus began first to do, and then to teach; and his ministers must take the same method. It became Christ to submit to John's washing with water, because it was a divine appointment.

With the will of Christ, and this reason for it, John was entirely satisfied, and then he suffered him. The same modesty which made him at first decline the honour Christ offered him, now made him do the service Christ enjoined him. No pretence of humility must make us decline our duty.

II. How solemnly Heaven was pleased to grace the baptism of Christ with a special display of glory (v. 16, 17); Jesus when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water. Others that were baptized stayed to confess their sins (v. 6); but Christ, having no sins to confess, went up immediately. He went up straightway, as one that entered upon his work with the utmost cheerfulness and resolution; he would lose no time. How was he straightened till it was accomplished!

1. Lo! the heavens were opened unto him, so as to discover something above and beyond the starry firmament, at least, to him. This was, (1) To encourage him to go on in his undertaking, with the prospect of the glory and joy that were set before him. (2) To encourage us to receive him, and submit to him. Sin shut up heaven, put a stop to all friendly intercourse between God and man; but now Christ has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Divine light and love are darted down upon the children of men, and all by Jesus Christ, who is the ladder that has its foot on earth and its top in heaven.

2. He saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, or as a dove, and coming or lighting upon him. Christ saw it (Mark i. 10), and John saw it (John i. 33, 34), and it is probable that all the standers-by saw it; for this was intended to be his public inauguration.

(1) The Spirit of God descended, and lighted on him. In the beginning of the old world, the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters (Gen. i. 2), hovered as a bird upon the nest. So here, in the beginning of this new world the Spirit of the Lord should rest upon him (Isa. xi. 2; lxi. 1), and here he did so. [1] He was to be a Prophet; and prophets always spoke by the Spirit of God, who came upon them. [2] He was to be the Head of the church. Christ received gifts for men, that he might give gifts to men.

(2) He descended on him like a dove. If there must be a bodily shape (Luke iii. 22), it must not be that of a man. None therefore was more fit than the shape of one of the fowls of heaven (heaven being now opened), and of all fowl none was so significant as the dove. [1] The Spirit of Christ is a dove-like spirit. The Spirit descended, not in the shape of an eagle, which is, though a royal bird, yet a bird of prey, but in the shape of a dove, than which no creature is more harmless and inoffensive. Such must Christians be, harmless as doves. The dove mourns much (Isa. xxxviii. 14). Christ wept oft; and penitent souls are compared to doves of the valleys. [2] The dove was the only fowl that was offered in sacrifice (Lev. i. 14), and Christ offered himself without spot to God. [3] The tidings of the decrease of Noah's flood were brought by a dove, with an olive-leaf in her mouth; fitly therefore are the glad tidings of peace with God brought by the Spirit as a dove. That God is in Christ reconciling the world unto himself, is a joyful message, which comes to us upon the wing, the wings of a dove.

3. To explain and complete this solemnity, there came a voice from heaven. The Holy Spirit manifested himself in the likeness of a dove, but God the Father by a voice.

(1) See here how God owns our Lord Jesus; This is my beloved Son. Observe, [1] The relation he stood in to him; He is my Son. He is the Son of God by special designation to the work and office of the world's Redeemer. He was sanctified and sealed, and went upon that errand, brought up with the Father for it. [2] The affection the Father had for him; He is my beloved Son. Particularly as Mediator, and in undertaking the work of man's salvation, he was his beloved Son. Because he consented to the covenant of redemption, and delighted to do that will of God, therefore the Father loved him. Now know we that he loved us, seeing he has not withheld his Son, his only Son, his Isaac whom he loved, but gave him to be a sacrifice for our sin.

(2) See here how ready he is to own us in him: He is my beloved Son, not only with whom, but in whom, I am well pleased. He is pleased with all that are in him, and are united to him by faith. Hitherto God had been displeased with the children of men, but now his anger is turned away, and he has made us accepted in the Beloved, Eph. i. 6. Out of Christ, God is a consuming Fire, but, in Christ, a reconciled Father. This is the sum of the whole gospel. We must by faith cheerfully concur, and say, that he is our beloved Saviour, in whom we are well pleased.

CHAP. IV

John Baptist said concerning Christ, He must increase, but I must decrease. He had done what he came to do. As the rising Sun advances, the morning star disappears. Concerning Jesus Christ we have in this chapter, I. The temptation he underwent, ver. 1–11. II. The teaching work he undertook, the places he preached in (ver. 12–16), and the subject he preached on, ver. 17. III. His calling of disciples, Peter and Andrew, James and John, ver 18–22 IV. His curing diseases (ver 23, 24), and the great resort of the people to him.

Verses 1–11

We have here the story of a famous duel, fought hand to hand, between Michael and the dragon, the Seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, nay, the serpent himself in which the seed of the woman suffers, being tempted, and so has his heel bruised but the serpent is quite baffled in his temptations, and so has his head broken.

I. The time when it happened. Immediately after the heavens were opened to him, and the Spirit descended on him. The next news we hear of him is, he is tempted; for then he is best able to grapple with the temptation. 1. Great privileges, and special tokens of divine favour, will not secure us from being tempted. Nay, 2. After great honours put upon us, we must expect something that is humbling. 3. God usually prepares his people for temptation before he calls them to it. 4. The assurance of our sonship is the best preparative for temptation.

Then, when he was baptized, then he was tempted. After we have been admitted into communion with God, we must expect to be set upon by Satan. The enriched soul must double its guard. The Devil has a particular spite at useful persons, who are not only good, but given to do good, especially at their first setting out. Let young ministers know what to expect, and arm accordingly.

II. The place where it was; in the wilderness. After communion with God, it is good to be private awhile, lest we lose what we have received, in the crowd, and hurry of worldly business. Christ withdrew into the wilderness, 1. To gain advantage to himself. Retirement gives an opportunity for meditation and communion with God; even they who are called to the most active life must yet have their contemplative hours, and must find time to be alone with God. Those are not fit to speak of the things of God in public to others, who have not first conversed with those things in secret by themselves. 2. To give advantage to the tempter. Though solitude is a friend to a good heart, yet Satan knows how to improve it against us. Those who, under pretence of sanctity and devotion, retire into dens and deserts, find that they are not out of the reach of their spiritual enemies, and that there they want the benefit of the communion of saints. Christ retired, (1) That Satan might have leave to do his worst. To make his victory the more illustrious, he gave the enemy sun and wind on his side, and yet baffled him. (2) That he might have an opportunity to do his best himself, that he might be exalted in his own strength. Christ entered the lists without a second.

III. The preparatives for it, which were two.

1. He was directed to the combat; he was led up of the Spirit to be tempted of the Devil. The Spirit that descended upon him like a dove made him meek, and yet made him bold. If God, by his providence, order us into circumstances of temptation, for our trial, we must not think it strange, but double our guard. Be strong in the Lord, resist steadfast in the faith, and all shall be well. Whithersoever God leads us, we may hope he will go along with us, and bring us off more than conquerors.

Christ was led to be tempted of the Devil, and of him only. Others are tempted, when they are drawn aside of their own lust and enticed (James i. 14); but our Lord Jesus had no corrupt nature, and therefore he was led, as a champion into the field, to be tempted purely by the Devil.

Now Christ's temptation is, (1) An instance of his own condescension and humiliation. Christ submitted because he would humble himself, in all things to be made like unto his brethren. (2) An occasion of Satan's confusion. There is no conquest without a combat. Christ was tempted, that he might overcome the tempter. (3) Matter of comfort to all the saints. In the temptation of Christ it appears, that our enemy is not invincible. Though he is a strong man armed, yet the Captain of our salvation is stronger than he. It is some comfort to us to think that Christ suffered, being tempted; for thus it appears that temptations, if not yielded to, are not sins, they are afflictions only. And we have a High Priest who knows, by experience, what it is to be tempted, and who therefore is the more tenderly touched with the feeling of our infirmities in an hour of temptation.

2. He was dieted for the combat, as wrestlers, who are temperate in all things (1 Cor. ix. 25); but Christ beyond any other, for he fasted forty days and forty nights. Christ needed not to fast for mortification (he had no corrupt desires to be subdued); yet he fasted. If good people are brought low, if they want friends and succours, this may comfort them, that their Master himself was in like manner exercised. A man may want bread, and yet be a favourite of heaven, and under the conduct of the spirit. When he fasted forty days he was never hungry; converse with heaven was instead of meat and drink to him, but he was afterwards an hungred, to show that he was really and truly man. Man fell by eating, and that way we often sin, and therefore Christ was an hungred.

IV. The temptations themselves. That which Satan aimed at, in all his temptations, was, to bring him to sin against God, and so to render him for ever incapable of being a Sacrifice for the sin of others. That which he aimed at was, to bring him, 1. To despair of his Father's goodness. 2. To presume upon his Father's power. 3. To alienate his Father's honour, by giving it to Satan. The two former are artful temptations, which there was need of great wisdom to discern; the last was a strong temptation, which there was need of great resolution to resist.

1. He tempted him to despair of his Father's goodness, and to distrust his Father's care concerning him.

(1) See how the temptation was managed (v. 3); The tempter came to him. The tempter came to Christ in a visible appearance. If ever the Devil transformed himself into an angel of light, he did so now, and pretended to be a good genius, a guardian angel.

Observe the subtlety of the tempter, in joining this first temptation with what went before, to make it the stronger. [1] Christ began to be hungry, and therefore the motion seemed very proper, to turn stones into bread for his necessary support. Want and poverty are a great temptation to discontent and unbelief, and the use of unlawful means for our relief, under pretence that necessity has no law. Those therefore who are reduced to straits, have need to double their guard; it is better to starve to death, than live and thrive by sin. [2] Christ was lately declared to be the Son of God, and here the Devil tempts him to doubt of that; If thou be the Son of God.

First, "Thou hast now an occasion to question whether thou be the Son of God or no; for can it be, that the Son of God, who is Heir of all things, should be reduced to such straits? Either God is not thy Father, or he is a very unkind one." a. The great thing Satan aims at, in tempting good people, is to overthrow their relation to God as a Father. b. Outward afflictions, wants and burdens, are the great arguments Satan uses to make the people of God question their sonship. They know how to answer this temptation, who can say with holy Job, Though he slay me, though he starve me, yet I will trust in him, and love him as a Friend. c. The Devil aims to shake our faith in the word of God. Has God said that thou art his beloved Son? Surely he did not say so; or if he did it is not true. d. The Devil carries on his designs very much by possessing people with hard thoughts of God, as if he were unkind, or unfaithful.

Secondly, "Thou hast now an opportunity to show that thou art the Son of God. If thou art the Son of God, prove it by this, command that these stones" (a heap of which, probably, lay now before him) "be made bread," v. 3. He does not say, Pray to thy Father that he would turn them into bread; but command it to be done; thy Father hath forsaken thee, set up for thyself, and be not beholden to him. The Devil is for nothing that is humbling, but everything that is assuming.

(2) See how this temptation was resisted and overcome.

[1] Christ refused to comply with it. He would not command these stones to be made bread; not because he could not; but he would not. And why would he not? At first view, the thing appears justifiable enough, and the truth is, the more plausible a temptation is, and the greater appearance there is of good in it, the more dangerous it is. This matter would bear a dispute, but Christ was soon aware of the snake in the grass, and would not do anything, First, That looked like questioning the truth of the voice he heard from heaven. Secondly, That looked like distrusting his Father's care of him. Thirdly, That looked like setting up for himself, and being his own carver; or, Fourthly, That looked like gratifying Satan, by doing a thing at his motion.

[2] He was ready to reply to it (v. 4); He answered and said, It is written. This is observable, that Christ answered and baffled all the temptations of Satan with, It is written. He put honour upon the scripture, and, to set us an example, he appealed to what was written in the law. The word of God is the sword of the Spirit, the only offensive weapon in all the Christian armoury (Eph. vi. 17).

This answer, as all the rest, is taken out of the book of Deuteronomy, which signifies the second law, and in which there is very little ceremonial; the Levitical sacrifices and purifications, though of divine institution, could not drive away Satan, but moral precepts and evangelical promises, mixed with faith, these are mighty, through God, for the vanquishing of Satan. The reason given why God fed the Israelites with manna is, because he would teach them that man shall not live by bread alone. This Christ applies to his own case. The Devil would have him question his sonship, because he was in straits; no, says he, Israel was God's son, and it follows there (Deut. viii. 5), As a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee. Christ, being a Son, thus learns obedience. The Devil would have him distrust his Father's love and care. The Devil would have him, as soon as he began to be hungry, immediately look out for supply. God will have his children, when they want, not only to wait on him, but to wait for him. The Devil would have him to supply himself with bread. "No," says Christ, "what need is there of that? Man may live without bread, as Israel in the wilderness lived forty years upon manna." Any word proceeding out of the mouth of God, anything that God shall order and appoint for that end, will be as good a livelihood for man as bread, and will maintain him as well. As we may have bread, and yet not be nourished, if God deny his blessing (for though bread is the staff of life, it is God's blessing that is the staff of bread), so we may want bread, and yet be nourished some other way. As in our greatest abundance we must not think to live without God, so in our greatest straits we must learn to live upon God. Let us learn of Christ here to be at God's finding, rather than at our own. Jehovah-jireh; some way or other the Lord will provide. It is better to live poorly upon the fruits of God's goodness, than live plentifully upon the products of our own sin.

2. He tempted him to presume upon his Father's power and protection. See what a restless unwearied adversary the Devil is!

Now in this second attempt we may observe,

(1) What the temptation was, and how it was managed. In general, finding Christ so confident of his Father's care of him, in point of nourishment, he endeavours to draw him to presume upon that care in point of safety. Nor are any extremes more dangerous than those of despair and presumption, especially in the affairs of our souls. Some who have obtained a persuasion that Christ is able and willing to save them from their sins, are then tempted to presume that he will save them in their sins.

Now in this temptation we may observe,

[1] How he made way for it. He took Christ, not by force and against his will, but moved him to go, and went along with him, to Jerusalem. He was set upon a pinnacle of the temple. Now observe, First, How submissive Christ was, in suffering himself to be hurried thus, that he might let Satan do his worst and yet conquer him. How comfortable is it, that Christ, who let loose this power of Satan against himself, does not in like manner let it loose against us, but restrains it, for he knows our frame! Secondly, How subtle the Devil was, in the choice of the place for his temptations. He fixes him on a public place in Jerusalem, a populous city, and the joy of the whole earth; and in the temple, one of the wonders of the world, continually gazed upon with admiration by some one or other. There he might make himself remarkable, and prove himself the Son of God; not, in the obscurities of a wilderness, but before multitudes.

Observe, a. That Jerusalem is here called the holy city; for so it was in name and profession. There is no city on earth so holy as to exempt and secure us from the Devil and his temptations. The holy city is the place where he does, with the greatest advantage and success, tempt men to pride and presumption; but, blessed be God, into the Jerusalem above, that holy city, no unclean thing shall enter; there we shall be for ever out of temptation. b. That he set him upon a pinnacle of the temple. Pinnacles of the temple are places of temptation. (a) High places are so; they are slippery places. God casts down, that he may raise up; the Devil raises up, that he may cast down. (b) High places in the church are, in a special manner, dangerous. They who excel in gifts, who are in eminent stations, and have gained great reputation, have need to keep humble. Those that stand high are concerned to stand fast.

[2] How he moved it; "If thou be the Son of God, now show thyself to the world, and prove thyself to be so; cast thyself down, and then," First, "Thou wilt be admired, as under the special protection of heaven." Secondly, "Thou wilt be received, as coming with a special commission from heaven. All Jerusalem will see and acknowledge, not only that thou art more than a man, but that thou art that Messenger, that Angel of the covenant, that should suddenly come to the temple (Mal. iii. 1)."

Observe, The Devil said, Cast thyself down. The Devil could not cast him down. The power of Satan is a limited power; hitherto he shall come, and no further. The Devil can but persuade, he cannot compel; he can but say, Cast thyself down; he cannot cast us down. Therefore let us not hurt ourselves, and then, blessed be God, no one else can hurt us, Prov. ix. 12.

[3] How he backed this motion with a scripture; For it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee. But is Saul also among the prophets? Is Satan so well versed in scripture, as to be able to quote it so readily? It seems, he is. Note, It is possible for a man to have his head full of scripture-notions, and his mouth full of scripture-expressions, while his heart is full of reigning enmity to God and all goodness.

First, There was something right. It is true, there is such a promise of the ministration of the angels, for the protection of the saints. The devil knows it by experience. The angels guard the saints for Christ's sake, Rev. vii. 5, 11.

Secondly, There was a great deal wrong in it; and perhaps the devil had a particular spite against this promise, and perverted it, because it often stood in his way, and baffled his mischievous designs against the saints. See here, 1. How he misquoted it; and that was bad. The promise is, They shall keep thee; but how? In all thy ways; not otherwise; if we go out of our way, out of the way of our duty, we forfeit the promise, and put ourselves out of God's protection. It is good for us upon all occasions to consult the scriptures themselves, and not to take things upon trust. 2. How he misapplied it; and that was worse. This promise is firm, and stands good; but the devil made an ill use of it, when he used it as an encouragement to presume upon the divine care. But shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? throw ourselves down, that the angels may bear us up? God forbid.

(2) How Christ overcame this temptation; he resisted and overcame it, as he did the former, with, It is written. The Devil's abusing of scripture did not prevent Christ from using it, but he presently urges, Deut. vi. 16, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. In the place whence it is quoted, it is in the plural number, You shall not tempt; here it is singular, Thou shalt not. We are then likely to get good by the word of God, when we hear and receive general promises as speaking to us in particular.

If Christ should cast himself down, it would be the tempting of God, [1] As it would be requiring a further confirmation of that which was so well confirmed.

hours, and must find time to be alone with God. Those are not fit to speak of the things of God in public to others, who have not first conversed with those things in secret by themselves. 2. To give advantage to the tempter. Though solitude is a friend to a good heart, yet Satan knows how to improve it against us. Those who, under pretence of sanctity and devotion, retire into dens and deserts, find that they are not out of the reach of their spiritual enemies, and that there they want the benefit of the communion of saints. First, "Thou hast now an occasion to question whether thou be the Son of God or no; for can it be, that the Son of God, who is Heir of all things, should be reduced to such straits? Either God is not thy Father, or he is a very unkind one." a. The great thing Satan aims at, in tempting good people, is to overthrow their relation to God as a Father. b. Outward afflictions, wants and burdens, are the great arguments Satan uses to make the people of God question their sonship. They know how to answer this temptation, who can say with holy Job, Though he slay me, though he starve me, yet I will trust in him, and love him as a Friend. c. The Devil aims to shake our faith in the word of God. Has God said that thou art his beloved Son? Surely he did not say so; or if he did it is not true. d. The Devil carries on his designs very much by possessing people with hard thoughts of God, as if he were unkind, or unfaithful.

Secondly, "Thou hast now an opportunity to show that thou art the Son of God. If thou art the Son of God, prove it by this, command that these stones" (a heap of which, probably, lay now before him) "be made bread," v. 3. He does not say, Pray to thy Father that he would turn them into bread; but command it to be done; thy Father hath forsaken thee, set up for thyself, and be not beholden to him. The Devil is for nothing that is humbling, but everything that is assuming.

(2) See how this temptation was resisted and overcome.

[1] Christ refused to comply with it. He would not command these stones to be made bread; not because he could not; but he would not. And why would he not? At first view, the thing appears justifiable enough, and the truth is, the more plausible a temptation is, and the greater appearance there is of good in it, the more dangerous it is. This matter would bear a dispute, but Christ was soon aware of the snake in the grass, and would not do anything, First, That looked like questioning the truth of the voice he heard from heaven. Secondly, That looked like distrusting his Father's care of him. Thirdly, That looked like setting up for himself, and being his own carver; or, Fourthly, That looked like gratifying Satan, by doing a thing at his motion.

[2] He was ready to reply to it (v. 4); He answered and said, It is written. This is observable, that Christ answered and baffled all the temptations of Satan with, It is written. He put honour upon the scripture, and, to set us an example, he appealed to what was written in the law. The word of God is the sword of the Spirit, the only offensive weapon in all the Christian armoury (Eph. vi. 17).

This answer, as all the rest, is taken out of the book of Deuteronomy, which signifies the second law, and in which there is very little ceremonial; the Levitical sacrifices and purifications, though of divine institution, could not drive away Satan, but moral precepts and evangelical promises, mixed with faith, these are mighty, through God, for the vanquishing of Satan. The reason given why God fed the Israelites with manna is, because he would teach them that man shall not live by bread alone. This Christ applies to his own case. The Devil would have him question his sonship, because he was in straits; no, says he, Israel was God's son, and it follows there (Deut. viii. 5), As a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee. Christ, being a Son, thus learns obedience. The Devil would have him distrust his Father's love and care. The Devil would have him, as soon as he began to be hungry, immediately look out for supply. God will have his children, when they want, not only to wait on him, but to wait for him. The Devil would have him to supply himself with bread. "No," says Christ, "what need is there of that? Man may live without bread, as Israel in the wilderness lived forty years upon manna." Any word proceeding out of the mouth of God, anything that God shall order and appoint for that end, will be as good a livelihood for man as bread, and will maintain him as well. As we may have bread, and yet not be nourished, if God deny his blessing (for though bread is the staff of life, it is God's blessing that is the staff of bread), so we may want bread, and yet be nourished some other way. As in our greatest abundance we must not think to live without God, so in our greatest straits we must learn to live upon God. Let us learn of Christ here to be at God's finding, rather than at our own. Jehovah-jireh; some way or other the Lord will provide. It is better to live poorly upon the fruits of God's goodness, than live plentifully upon the products of our own sin.

2. He tempted him to presume upon his Father's power and protection. See what a restless unwearied adversary the Devil is!

Now in this second attempt we may observe,

(1) What the temptation was, and how it was managed. In general, finding Christ so confident of his Father's care of him, in point of nourishment, he endeavours to draw him to presume upon that care in point of safety. Nor are any extremes more dangerous than those of despair and presumption, especially in the affairs of our souls. Some who have obtained a persuasion that Christ is able and willing to save them from their sins, are then tempted to presume that he will save them in their sins.

Now in this temptation we may observe,

[1] How he made way for it. He took Christ, not by force and against his will, but moved him to go, and went along with him, to Jerusalem. He was set upon a pinnacle of the temple. Now observe, First, How submissive Christ was, in suffering himself to be hurried thus, that he might let Satan do his worst and yet conquer him. How comfortable is it, that Christ, who let loose this power of Satan against himself, does not in like manner let it loose against us, but restrains it, for he knows our frame! Secondly, How subtle the Devil was, in the choice of the place for his temptations. He fixes him on a public place in Jerusalem, a populous city, and the joy of the whole earth; and in the temple, one of the wonders of the world, continually gazed upon with admiration by some one or other. There he might make himself remarkable, and prove himself the Son of God; not, in the obscurities of a wilderness, but before multitudes.

Observe, a. That Jerusalem is here called the holy city; for so it was in name and profession. There is no city on earth so holy as to exempt and secure us from the Devil and his temptations. The holy city is the place where he does, with the greatest advantage and success, tempt men to pride and presumption; but, blessed be God, into the Jerusalem above, that holy city, no unclean thing shall enter; there we shall be for ever out of temptation. b. That he set him upon a pinnacle of the temple. Pinnacles of the temple are places of temptation. (a) High places are so; they are slippery places. God casts down, that he may raise up; the Devil raises up, that he may cast down. (b) High places in the church are, in a special manner, dangerous. They who excel in gifts, who are in eminent stations, and have gained great reputation, have need to keep humble. Those that stand high are concerned to stand fast.

[2] How he moved it; "If thou be the Son of God, now show thyself to the world, and prove thyself to be so; cast thyself down, and then," First, "Thou wilt be admired, as under the special protection of heaven." Secondly, "Thou wilt be received, as coming with a special commission from heaven. All Jerusalem will see and acknowledge, not only that thou art more than a man, but that thou art that Messenger, that Angel of the covenant, that should suddenly come to the temple (Mal. iii. 1)."

Observe, The Devil said, Cast thyself down. The Devil could not cast him down. The power of Satan is a limited power; hitherto he shall come, and no further. The Devil can but persuade, he cannot compel; he can but say, Cast thyself down; he cannot cast us down. Therefore let us not hurt ourselves, and then, blessed be God, no one else can hurt us, Prov. ix. 12.

[3] How he backed this motion with a scripture; For it is written, He shall give his angels charge concerning thee. But is Saul also among the prophets? Is Satan so well versed in scripture, as to be able to quote it so readily? It seems, he is. Note, It is possible for a man to have his head full of scripture-notions, and his mouth full of scripture-expressions, while his heart is full of reigning enmity to God and all goodness.

First, There was something right. It is true, there is such a promise of the ministration of the angels, for the protection of the saints. The devil knows it by experience. The angels guard the saints for Christ's sake, Rev. vii. 5, 11.

Secondly, There was a great deal wrong in it; and perhaps the devil had a particular spite against this promise, and perverted it, because it often stood in his way, and baffled his mischievous designs against the saints. See here, 1. How he misquoted it; and that was bad. The promise is, They shall keep thee; but how? In all thy ways; not otherwise; if we go out of our way, out of the way of our duty, we forfeit the promise, and put ourselves out of God's protection. It is good for us upon all occasions to consult the scriptures themselves, and not to take things upon trust. 2. How he misapplied it; and that was worse. This promise is firm, and stands good; but the devil made an ill use of it, when he used it as an encouragement to presume upon the divine care. But shall we continue in sin, that grace may abound? throw ourselves down, that the angels may bear us up? God forbid.

(2) How Christ overcame this temptation; he resisted and overcame it, as he did the former, with, It is written. The Devil's abusing of scripture did not prevent Christ from using it, but he presently urges, Deut. vi. 16, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God. In the place whence it is quoted, it is in the plural number, You shall not tempt; here it is singular, Thou shalt not. We are then likely to get good by the word of God, when we hear and receive general promises as speaking to us in particular.

If Christ should cast himself down, it would be the tempting of God, [1] As it would be requiring a further confirmation of that which was so well confirmed.

Christ was abundantly satisfied that God was already his Father, and took care of him. [2] As it would be requiring a special preservation of him, in doing that which he had no call to. If we expect that because God has promised not to forsake us, therefore he should follow us out of the way of our duty; that because he has promised to supply our wants, therefore he should humour us, and please our fancies; this is presumption, this is tempting God. This is to affront him whom we ought to honour. We must never promise ourselves any more than God has promised us.

3. He tempted him to the most black and horrid idolatry, with the proffer of the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them. (1) The worst temptation was reserved for the last. Whatever temptation we have been assaulted by, still we must prepare for worse.

In this temptation, we may observe,

[1] What he showed him—all the kingdoms of the world. In order to this, he took him to an exceeding high mountain. The pinnacle of the temple is not high enough; the prince of the power of the air must have him further up into his territories. Hither the blessed Jesus was carried for the advantage of a prospect; as if the devil could show him more of the world than he knew already, who made and governed it. His taking him up into a high mountain, was but to humour the thing, and to colour the delusion; in which yet the blessed Jesus did not suffer himself to be imposed upon, but saw through the cheat. Hence, observe, concerning Satan's temptations, that, First, They often come in at the eye. The first sin began in the eye, Gen. iii. 6. We have therefore need to make a covenant with our eyes, and to pray that God would turn them away from beholding vanity. Secondly, That temptations commonly take rise from the world, and the things of it. Thirdly, That it is a great cheat which the devil puts upon poor souls, in his temptations. He deceives, and so destroys; he imposes upon men with shadows and false colours; shows the world and the glory of it, and hides from men's eyes the sin and sorrow and death which stain the pride of all this glory. Fourthly, That the glory of the world is the most charming temptation to the unthinking and unwary, and that by which men are most imposed upon. The pride of life is the most dangerous snare.

[2] What he said to him (v. 9); All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me. See,

First, How vain the promise was. All these things will I give thee. He seems to take it for granted, that in the former temptations he had in part gained his point. "Come," says he, "it seems that the God whose Son thou thinkest thyself to be deserts thee, and starves thee—a sign that he is not thy Father; but if thou wilt be ruled by me, I will provide better for thee than so: own me for thy father, and ask my blessing, and all this will I give thee." Satan makes an easy prey of men, when he can persuade them to think themselves abandoned of God. The fallacy of this promise lies in that, All this will I give thee. The devil's baits are all a sham; they are shows and shadows with which he deceives. The nations of the earth had been, long before, promised to the Messiah; if he be the Son of God, they belong to him. We must take heed of receiving even that which God hath promised, out of the devil's hand.

Secondly, How vile the condition was: If thou wilt fall down, and worship me. The devil is fond of being worshipped. What temptation could be more hideous, more black? The best of saints may be tempted to the worst of sins. This is their affliction, but while there is no consent to it, nor approbation of it, it is not their sin; Christ was tempted to worship Satan.

(2) See how Christ warded off the thrust. He rejected the proposal,

[1] With abhorrence and detestation; Get thee hence, Satan. It appears abominable at the first sight, and therefore is immediately rejected. While Satan tempted Christ to do himself a mischief, by casting himself down, though he yielded not, yet he heard it; but now that the temptation flies in the face of God, he cannot bear it; Get thee hence, Satan. It is good to be peremptory in resisting temptation, and to stop our ears to Satan's charms.

[2] With an argument fetched from scripture. The argument is very suitable, and exactly to the purpose, taken from Deut. vi. 13, and x. 20. Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him only shalt thou serve. Our Saviour has recourse to the fundamental law in this case, which is indispensable, and universally obligatory. Religious worship is due to God only. Christ quotes this law concerning religious worship, and quotes it with application to himself; First, To show that in his estate of humiliation as man, he did worship God, both publicly and privately. Thus it became him to fulfil all righteousness. Secondly, To show that the law of religious worship is of eternal obligation.

V. We have here the end and issue of this combat, v. 11.

1. The devil was baffled, and quitted the field; Then the devil leaveth him, forced to do so by the power that went along with that word of command, Get thee hence, Satan. He made a shameful and inglorious retreat, and came off with disgrace. He despairs of moving him, and begins to conclude that he is the Son of God, and that it is in vain to tempt him any further. If we resist the devil, he will flee from us; he will yield, if we keep our ground. When the devil left our Saviour, he owned himself fairly beaten. The devil, though he is an enemy to all the saints, is a conquered enemy. The Captain of our salvation has defeated and disarmed him; we have nothing to do but to pursue the victory.

2. The holy angels came and attended upon our victorious Redeemer; Behold, angels came and ministered unto him. One angel might have served to bring him food, but here are many attending him, to testify their respect to him, and their readiness to receive his commands. Behold this! It is worth taking notice of; (1) That as there is a world of wicked, malicious spirits that fight against Christ and his church, and all particular believers, so there is a world of holy, blessed spirits engaged and employed for them. (2) That Christ's victories are the angels' triumphs. (3) That the angels ministered to the Lord Jesus, not only food, but whatever else he wanted after this great fatigue. Though God may suffer his people to be brought into wants and straits, yet he will take effectual care for their supply, and will rather send angels to feed them, than see them perish.

Christ was thus succoured after the temptation, [1] For his encouragement to go on in his undertaking. [2] For our encouragement to trust in him. We may expect, not only that he will sympathize with his tempted people, but that he will come in with seasonable relief to them.

Verses 12–17

We have here an account of Christ's preaching in the synagogues of Galilee.

Several passages in the other gospels, especially in that of St. John, are supposed, in the order of the story of Christ's life, to intervene between his temptation and his preaching in Galilee. But Matthew, having had his residence in Galilee, begins his story of Christ's public ministry with his preaching there.

I. The time; When Jesus had heard that John was cast into prison, then he went into Galilee, v. 12.

The cry of the saints' sufferings comes up into the ears of the Lord Jesus. If John be cast into prison, Jesus hears it, takes cognizance of it, and steers his course accordingly. 1. Christ did not go into the country, till he heard of John's imprisonment; for he must have time given him to prepare the way of the Lord, before the Lord himself appear. John must be Christ's harbinger, but not his rival. The moon and stars are lost when the sun rises. 2. He did go into the country as soon as he heard of John's imprisonment; not only to provide for his own safety, but to supply the want of John Baptist, and to build upon the good foundation he had laid. God will not leave himself without witness, nor his church without guides.

II. The place where he preached; in Galilee, a remote part of the country, that lay furthest from Jerusalem, and was there looked upon with contempt, as rude and boorish. The inhabitants of that country were reckoned stout men, fit for soldiers, but not polite men, or fit for scholars. Observe,

1. The particular city he chose for his residence; not Nazareth, where he had been bred up; no, he left Nazareth; particular notice is taken of that, v. 13. And with good reason did he leave Nazareth; for the men of that city thrust him out from among them, Luke iv. 29. Christ will not stay long where he is not welcome. Unhappy Nazareth!

But he came and dwelt in Capernaum, which was a city of Galilee, but many miles distant from Nazareth, a great city and of much resort. It is said here to be on the sea coast, not the great sea, but the sea of Tiberias. Hither Christ came, and here he dwelt. However, here he fixed not constantly, for he went about doing good; but this was for some time his headquarters: what little rest he had, was here. And at Capernaum, it should seem, he was welcome. If some reject Christ, yet others will receive him, and bid him welcome. Capernaum is glad of Nazareth's leavings.

2. The prophecy that was fulfilled in this, v. 14–16. It is quoted from Isa. ix. 1, 2, but with some variation. The evangelist here takes only the latter clause, which speaks of the return of the light of liberty and prosperity to those countries that had been in the darkness of captivity, and applies it to the appearing of the gospel among them.

The places are spoken of, v. 15. Christ came to Capernaum, the gospel came to all those places round about; such diffusive influences did the Sun of righteousness cast.

(1) They were in darkness. Those that are without Christ, are in the dark, nay, they are darkness itself. They were sitting in this condition. Sitting is a continuing posture; where we sit, we mean to stay. And it is a contented posture; they were in the dark, and they loved darkness. He that is in the dark because it is night, may be sure that the sun will shortly arise; but he that is in the dark because he is blind, will not so soon have his eyes opened. We have the light, but what will that avail us, if we be not light in the Lord? (2) When the gospel comes, light comes; when it comes to any place, when it comes to any soul, it makes day there. Light is discovering, it is directing; so is the gospel.

It is a great light. Great in comparison with the light of the law, the shadows of which were now done away. It is a great light, for it discovers great things and of vast consequence; it will last long, and spread far. And it is a growing light, intimated in that word, It is sprung up. It was but spring of day with them; now the day dawned, which afterward shone more and more. The gospel-kingdom, like a grain of mustard-seed or the morning light, was small in its beginnings, gradual in its growth, but great in its perfection.

Observe, The light sprang up to them; they did not go to seek it. It came upon them ere they were aware.

III. The text he preached upon (v. 17): From that time he began to preach.

The subject which Christ dwelt upon now in his preaching (and it was indeed the sum and substance of all his preaching), was the very same that John had preached upon (ch. iii. 2); Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand; for the gospel is the same for substance under various dispensations; for it is the everlasting gospel. Fear God, and, by repentance, give honour to him, Rev. xiv. 6, 7. Christ put a great respect upon John's ministry, when he preached to the same purport that John had preached before him. Thus did God confirm the word of his messenger, Isa. xliv. 26. He pitches upon this old, plain text, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. 1. This he preached first upon; he began with this. We need not go up to heaven, nor down to the deep, for matter or language in our preaching. As John prepared Christ's way, so Christ prepared his own, and made way for the further discoveries he designed, with the doctrine of repentance. 2. This he preached often upon; wherever he went, this was his subject, and neither he nor his followers ever reckoned it worn threadbare. That which has been preached and heard before, may yet very profitably be preached and heard again; but then it should be preached and heard better. 3. This he preached as gospel. Not only the austere Baptist, who was looked upon as a melancholy, morose man, but the sweet and gracious Jesus, whose lips dropped as a honey-comb, preached repentance. 4. The reason is still the same; The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Now that it was so much nearer, the argument was so much the stronger; now is the salvation nearer, Rom. xiii. 11.

Verses 18–22

When Christ began to preach, he began to gather disciples, who should now be the hearers, and hereafter the preachers. Now, in these verses, we have an account of the first disciples that he called into fellowship with himself.

And this was an instance, 1. Of effectual calling to Christ. In all his preaching he gave a common call to all the country, but in this he gave a special and particular call to those that were given him by the Father. All the country was called, but these were called out. 2. It was an instance of ordination, and appointment to the work of the ministry. When Christ, as a Teacher, set up his great school, one of his first works was to appoint ushers, or under masters, to be employed in the work of instruction.

Now we may observe here,

I. Where they were called—by the sea of Galilee, where Jesus was walking. Hither he went to call disciples; not to Herod's court (for few mighty or noble are called), not to Jerusalem, among the chief priests and the elders, but to the sea of Galilee; surely Christ sees not as man sees. Galilee was a remote part of the nation, the inhabitants were less cultivated and refined, their very language was broad and uncouth to the curious, their speech betrayed them. Yet thither Christ went, to call his apostles that were to be the prime ministers of state in his kingdom, for he chooses the foolish things of the world, to confound the wise.

II. Who they were. We have an account of the call of two pairs of brothers in these verses—Peter and Andrew, James and John. They had been disciples of John, and so were the better disposed to follow Christ. Those who have submitted to the discipline of repentance, shall be welcome to the joys of faith. We may observe concerning them,

1. That they were brothers. It is the honour and comfort of a house, when those that are of the same family, are of God's family.

2. That they were fishers. Being fishers, (1) They were poor men: if they had had estates, or any considerable stock in trade, they would not have made fishing their trade, however they might have made it their recreation. Christ does not despise the poor, and therefore we must not. (2) They were unlearned men. Yet this will not justify the bold intrusion of ignorant and unqualified men into the work of the ministry. (3) They were men of business, who had been bred up to labour. Diligence in an honest calling is pleasing to Christ, and no hindrance to a holy life. Idle people lie more open to the temptations of Satan than to the calls of God. (4) They were men that were accustomed to hardships and hazards; the fisher's trade, more than any other, is laborious and perilous; fishermen must be often wet and cold; they must watch, and wait, and toil, and be often in peril by waters. Those who have learned to bear hardships, and to run hazards, are best prepared for the fellowship and discipleship of Jesus Christ. Good soldiers of Christ must endure hardness.

III. What they were doing. Peter and Andrew were then using their nets, they were fishing; and James and John were mending their nets, which was an instance of their industry and good husbandry. They did not go to their father for money to buy new nets, but took pains to mend their old ones. It is commendable to make what we have go as far, and last as long, as may be. James and John were with their father Zebedee, ready to assist him. It is a happy and hopeful presage, to see children careful of their parents, and dutiful to them. Observe, 1. They were all employed, all very busy, and none idle. When Christ comes, it is good to be found doing. 2. They were differently employed; two of them were fishing, and two of them mending their nets. Ministers should be always employed, either in teaching or studying; and mending their nets, is in its season, as necessary work as fishing.

IV. What the call was (v. 19); Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men. Even they who have been called to follow Christ, have need to be called to follow on, and to follow nearer. Observe,

1. What Christ intended them for; I will make you fishers of men. Let them not be proud of the new honour designed them, they are still but fishers; let them not be afraid of the new work cut out for them, for they have been used to fishing, and fishers they are still. (1) Ministers are fishers of men, not to destroy them, but to save them, by bringing them into another element. (2) It is Jesus Christ that makes them so; I will make you fishers of men. It is he that qualifies men for this work, calls them to it, authorizes them in it, and gives them success in it.

2. What they must do in order to this; Follow me. They must separate themselves to a diligent attendance on him. (1) Those whom Christ employs in any service for him, must first be fitted and qualified for it. (2) Those who would preach Christ, must first learn Christ, and learn of him. (3) Those who would get an acquaintance with Christ, must be diligent and constant in their attendance on him. There is no learning comparable to that which is got by following Christ. (4) Those who are to fish for men, must therein follow Christ, and do it as he did, with diligence, faithfulness, and tenderness.

V. What was the success of this call. Peter and Andrew straightway left their nets (v. 20); and James and John immediately left the ship and their father (v. 22); and they all followed him. Those who would follow Christ aright, must leave all to follow him.

1. This instance of the power of the Lord Jesus gives us good encouragement to depend upon the sufficiency of his grace. How strong and effectual is his word! He speaks, and it is done.

2. This instance of the pliableness of the disciples, gives us a good example of obedience to the command of Christ. It is the good property of all Christ's faithful servants to come when they are called, and to follow their Master wherever he leads them. Being called, they obeyed, and, like Abraham, went out not knowing whither they went, but knowing very well whom they followed.

Verses 23–25

I. What an industrious preacher Christ was; He went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom. Observe, 1. What Christ preached—the gospel of the kingdom. The kingdom of heaven, that is, of grace and glory, is emphatically the kingdom. The gospel is the charter of that kingdom, containing the King's coronation oath, by which he has graciously obliged himself to pardon, protect, and save the subjects of that kingdom. 2. Where he preached—in the synagogues; not there only, but there chiefly, because those were the places of concourse, where wisdom was to lift up her voice (Prov. i. 21). 3. What pains he took in preaching; He went about all Galilee, teaching. He waits to be gracious, and comes to seek and save. He went about doing good. Never was there such an itinerant preacher, such an indefatigable one, as Christ was.

II. What a powerful physician Christ was; he went about not only teaching, but healing,

1. What diseases he cured—all without exception. He healed all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease. There are diseases which are called the reproach of physicians. He healed them, all, however inveterate.

Three general words are here used to intimate this; he healed every sickness, every disease, or languishing, and all torments. None was too bad, none too hard, for Christ to heal with a word's speaking.

Three particular diseases are specified; the palsy, which is the greatest weakness of the body; lunacy, which is the greatest malady of the mind, and possession of the Devil, which is the greatest misery and calamity of both, yet Christ healed all.

2. What patients he had. See here, what flocking there was to him from all parts; great multitudes of people came, not only from Galilee and the country about, but even from Jerusalem and from Judæa, which lay a great way off; for his fame went throughout all Syria. This is given as the reason why such multitudes came to him, because his fame had spread so widely. What we hear of Christ from others, should invite us to him. The voice of fame is "Come, and see." Christ both taught and healed. It is well if anything will bring people to Christ; and they who come to him will find more in him than they expected.

Now concerning the cures which Christ wrought, let us, once for all, observe the miracle, the mercy, and the mystery, of them.

(1) The miracle of them. They were wrought in such a manner, as plainly spake them to be the immediate products of a divine and supernatural power, and they were God's seal to his commission. Nature could not do these things. All which proves him a Teacher come from God, for, otherwise, none could have done the works that he did, John iii. 2. His healing and his preaching generally went together, for the former confirmed the latter; thus here he began to do and to teach, Acts i. 1.

(2) The mercy of them. The miracles that Christ wrought, were most of them cures, and all of them (except the cursing of the barren fig-tree) blessings and favours; for the gospel dispensation is founded, and built up in love, and grace, and sweetness. Christ designed by his cures to win people, and so to draw them with the bands of love, Hos. xi. 4. The miracle of them proved his doctrine a faithful saying, and convinced men's judgments; the mercy of them proved it worthy of all acceptation, and wrought upon their affections. They were not only great works, but good works, that he showed them from his Father (John x. 32).

(3) The mystery of them. Christ, by curing bodily diseases, intended to show, that his great errand into the world was to cure spiritual maladies. Sin is the sickness, disease, and torment of the soul; Christ came to take away sin, and so to heal these. And the particular stories of the cures Christ wrought are therefore so to be explained and improved, to the honour and praise of that glorious Redeemer, who forgiveth all our iniquities, and so healeth all our diseases.

CHAP. V

This chapter, and the two that follow it, are a sermon; the sermon upon the mount. It is the longest and fullest continued discourse of our Saviour that we have upon record. It is a practical discourse. The circumstances of the sermon being accounted for (ver. 1, 2), the sermon itself follows, the scope of which is, not to fill our heads with notions, but to guide and regulate our practice. I. He proposes blessedness as the end, and gives us the character of those who are entitled to blessedness in eight beatitudes, which may justly be called paradoxes, ver. 3–12. II. He prescribes duty as the way, and gives us standing rules of that duty. He directs his disciples, 1. To understand what they are—the salt of the earth, and the lights of the world, ver. 13–16. 2. To understand what they have to do—they are to be governed by the moral law. (1) A general ratification of the law, and a recommendation of it to us, as our rule, ver. 17–20. (2) A particular rectification of divers mistakes, and an authentic explication of divers branches which most needed to be explained and vindicated, ver. 20. Particularly, here is an explication, (1) Of the sixth commandment, ver. 21–26. (2) Of the seventh commandment, ver. 27–32. (3) Of the third commandment, ver 33–37. (4) Of the law of retaliation, ver. 38–42. (5) Of the law of brotherly love, ver. 43–48.

Verses 1–2

We have here a general account of this sermon.

I. The Preacher was our Lord Jesus, the Prince of preachers. The prophets and John had done virtuously in preaching, but Christ excelled them all. He is the eternal Word, by whom God has in these last days spoken to us. The many miraculous cures wrought by Christ in Galilee were intended to dispose people to receive instructions from one in whom there appeared so much of a divine power and goodness; and, probably, this sermon was the summary, of what he had preached in the synagogues. His text was, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand.

II. The place was a mountain in Galilee. Our Lord Jesus was but ill accommodated; he had no convenient place to preach in, any more than to lay his head on. Our Lord Jesus, the great Teacher of truth, is driven out to the desert, and finds no better a pulpit than a mountain can afford; and not one of the holy mountains of Zion, but a common mountain; by which Christ would intimate that it is the will of God that men should pray and preach everywhere, anywhere, provided it be decent and convenient. Christ preached this sermon, which was an exposition of the law, upon a mountain, because upon a mountain the law was given. But observe the difference: when the law was given, the Lord came down upon the mountain; now the Lord went up; then, he spoke in thunder and lightning; now, in a still small voice: then the people were ordered to keep their distance; now they are invited to draw near: a blessed change!

III. The auditors were his disciples. They followed him for love and learning, while others attended him only for cures. He taught them, because they were willing to be taught; because they would understand what he taught, and because they were to teach others. Though this discourse was directed to the disciples, it was in the hearing of the multitude. No bounds were set about this mountain, to keep the people off, for, through Christ, we have access to God. Nay, he had an eye to the multitude, in preaching this sermon. It is an encouragement to a faithful minister to cast the net of the gospel where there are a great many fishes, in hope that some will be caught. The sight of a multitude puts life into a preacher, which yet must arise from a desire of their profit, not his own praise.

IV. The solemnity of his sermon is intimated in that word, when he was set. This was a set sermon, when he had placed himself so as to be best heard. That phrase, He opened his mouth, is only a Hebrew periphrasis of speaking. Yet some think it intimates the solemnity of this discourse; the congregation being large, he raised his voice, and spoke louder than usual. One of the ancients has this remark upon it; Christ taught much without opening his mouth, that is, by his holy and exemplary life; nay, he taught, when, being led as a lamb to the slaughter, he opened not his mouth, but now he opened his mouth, and taught. He taught them, what was the evil they should abhor, and what the good they should abide and abound in; for Christianity is designed to regulate the temper of our minds and the tenor of our conversations; gospel-time is a time of reformation (Heb. ix. 10); and by the gospel we must be reformed, must be made good, must be made better.

Verses 3–12

Christ begins his sermon with blessings, for he came into the world to bless us (Acts iii. 26). He does it as one having authority, as one that can command the blessing, even life for evermore. The Old Testament ended with a curse (Mal. iv. 6), the gospel begins with a blessing. Each of the blessings Christ here pronounces has a double intention: 1. To show who they are that are to be accounted. 2. What this is wherein true happiness consists.

1. This is designed to rectify the ruinous mistakes of a blind and carnal world. Blessedness is the thing which men pretend to pursue; Who will make to see good? Ps. iv. 6. But most mistake the end, and form a wrong notion of happiness; and then no wonder that they miss the way. The general opinion is, Blessed are they that are rich, and great, and honourable in the world; that spend their days in mirth, and their years in pleasure; that eat the fat, and drink the sweet, and carry all before them with a high hand. Now our Lord Jesus comes to give us quite another notion of blessedness and blessed people. The beginning of a Christian's practice must be to take his measures of happiness from those maxims, and to direct his pursuits accordingly.

2. It is designed to remove the discouragements of the weak and poor who receive the gospel. Even the least in the kingdom of heaven, whose heart was upright with God, was happy in the honours and privileges of that kingdom.

3. It is designed to invite souls to Christ. And those who had seen the gracious cures wrought by his hand (ch. iv. 23, 24), and now heard the gracious words proceeding out of his mouth, would say that he was all of a piece, made up of love and sweetness.

4. It is designed to settle and sum up the articles of agreement between God and man. The scope of the divine revelation is to let us know what God expects from us, and what we may then expect from him; and nowhere is this more fully set forth in a few words than here. The way to happiness is here opened, and made a highway (Isa. xxxv. 8). Some of the wiser heathen had notions of blessedness different from the rest of mankind, and looking toward this of our Saviour. Seneca, undertaking to describe a blessed man, makes it out, that it is only an honest, good man that is to be so called: In whose estimations nothing is good or evil, but a good or evil heart.

Our Saviour here gives us eight characters of blessed people; which represent to us the principal graces of a Christian. On each of them a present blessing is pronounced; Blessed are they; and to each a future blessedness is promised.

I. The poor in Spirit are happy, v. 3. There is a poor-spiritedness that is so far from making men blessed that it is a sin and a snare—cowardice and base fear. To be poor in spirit is, 1. To be contentedly poor, willing to be empty of worldly wealth, if God orders that to be our lot. Many are poor in the world, but high in spirit, poor and proud, but we must accommodate ourselves to our poverty, must know how to be abased, Phil. iv. 12. It is to sit loose to all worldly wealth, and not set our hearts upon it. It is not, in pride or pretence, to make ourselves poor, by throwing away what God has given us. If we be rich in the world we must be poor in spirit, that is, we must condescend to the poor and sympathize with them, as being touched with the feeling of their infirmities; we must expect and prepare for poverty; must not inordinately fear or shun it, but must bid it welcome, especially when it comes upon us for keeping a good conscience, Heb. x. 34. Job was poor in spirit, when he blessed God in taking away, as well as giving. 2. To be humble and lowly in our own eyes. To be poor in spirit, is to think meanly of ourselves, of what we are, and have, and do; it is to be as little children in our opinion of ourselves. Paul was rich in spirituals, excelling most in gifts and graces, and yet poor in spirit, the least of the apostles, less than the least of all saints, and nothing in his own account. It is to be willing to make ourselves cheap, and mean, and little, to do good; to become all things to all men. It is to acknowledge that God is great, and we are mean; that he is holy and we are sinful; that he is all and we are nothing. 3. To come off from all confidence in our own righteousness and strength, that we may depend only upon the merit of Christ and the spirit and grace of Christ. That broken and contrite spirit with which the publican cried for mercy to a poor sinner, is this poverty of spirit. We must call ourselves poor, because always in want of God's grace, always begging at God's door, always hanging on in his house.

(1) This poverty in spirit is put first among the Christian graces. The philosophers did not reckon humility among their moral virtues, but Christ puts it first. The foundation of all other graces is laid in humility. Those who would build high must begin low. Those who are weary and heavy laden, are the poor in spirit, and they shall find rest with Christ.

(2) They are blessed. Now they are so, in this world. God looks graciously upon them. Nothing comes amiss to them; while high spirits are always uneasy.

(3) Theirs is the kingdom of heaven. The kingdom of grace is composed of such; the kingdom of glory is prepared for them. The great, high spirits go away with the glory of the kingdoms of the earth; but the humble, mild, and yielding souls obtain the glory of the kingdom of heaven. The same happiness is promised to those who are contentedly poor, as to those who are usefully rich. If I am not able to spend cheerfully for his sake, if I can but want cheerfully for his sake, even that shall be recompensed.

II. They that mourn are happy (v. 4); Blessed are they that mourn. This is another strange blessing. We are apt to think, Blessed are the merry; but Christ, who was himself a great mourner, says, Blessed are the mourners. There is a sinful mourning, which is an enemy to blessedness—the sorrow of the world. There is a natural mourning, which may prove a friend to blessedness, by the grace of God working with it. But there is a gracious mourning, which qualifies for blessedness. 1. A penitential mourning for our own sins; this is godly sorrow, a sorrow according to God; sorrow for sin, with an eye to Christ. Those are God's mourners, who live a life of repentance, who, out of regard to God's honour, mourn also for the sins of others. 2. A sympathising mourning for the afflictions of others; the mourning of those who weep with them that weep, who look with compassion on perishing souls, and weep over them, as Christ over Jerusalem.

Now these gracious mourners, (1) Are blessed. As in vain and sinful laughter the heart is sorrowful, so in gracious mourning the heart has a serious joy, a secret satisfaction, which a stranger does not intermeddle with. (2) They shall be comforted. Light is sown for them; and in heaven, it is certain, they shall be comforted, as Lazarus, Luke xvi. 25. The happiness of heaven consists in being perfectly and eternally comforted, and in the wiping away of all tears from their eyes. Heaven will be heaven indeed to those who go mourning thither; it will be a harvest of joy, the return of a seed-time of tears (Ps. cxxvi. 5, 6).

III. The meek are happy (v. 5); Blessed are the meek. The meek are those who quietly submit themselves to God, and are gentle towards all men (Titus iii. 2); who can bear provocation without being inflamed by it; are either silent, or return a soft answer; who can be cool when others are hot; and in their patience keep possession of their own souls, when they can scarcely keep possession of anything else. They are the meek, who would rather forgive twenty injuries than revenge one.

These meek ones are here represented as happy, even in this world. 1. They are blessed, for they are like the blessed Jesus. They are blessed, for they have the most comfortable, undisturbed enjoyment of themselves, their friends, their God; they are fit to live, and fit to die. 2. They shall inherit the earth. Not that they shall always have much of the earth, much less that they shall be put off with that only; but this branch of godliness has, in a special manner, the promise of that life that now is. Meekness, however ridiculed and run down, has a real tendency to promote our health, wealth, comfort, and safety, even in this world. Or, They shall inherit the land (so it may be read), the land of Canaan, a type of heaven. So that all the blessedness of heaven above, and all the blessings of earth beneath, are the portion of the meek.

IV. They that hunger and thirst after righteousness are happy, v. 6. Some understand this as a further instance of outward poverty, and a low condition in this world. Yet, blessed are they, if they suffer these hardships for and with a good conscience; let them hope in God. Those who contentedly bear oppression, and quietly refer themselves to God to plead their cause, shall in due time be satisfied, abundantly satisfied, in the wisdom and kindness, which shall be manifested in his appearances for them. 1. Righteousness is here put for all spiritual blessings. They are purchased for us by the righteousness of Christ. To become a new man, and to bear the image of God; to have an interest in Christ and the promises —this is righteousness. 2. These we must hunger and thirst after. We must truly and really desire them. Our desires of spiritual blessings must be earnest and importunate; "Give me these, or else I die; give me these, and I have enough, though I had nothing else." Hunger and thirst are appetites that return frequently, and call for fresh satisfactions. The quickened soul calls for constant meals of righteousness, grace to do the work of every day in its day. Those who hunger and thirst will labour for supplies; so we must not only desire spiritual blessings, but take pains for them in the use of the appointed means.

Those who thus hunger and thirst shall be filled with those blessings. (1) They are blessed in those desires.

Though all desires of grace are not grace (feigned, faint desires are not), yet such a desire as this is; it is an evidence of something good, and an earnest of something better. It is a desire of God's own raising. (2) They shall be filled with those blessings. God will give them what they desire to their complete satisfaction. It is God only who can fill a soul, whose grace and favour are adequate to its just desires. He fills the hungry (Luke i. 53), satiates them, Jer. xxxi. 25.

V. The merciful are happy, v. 7. This, like the rest, is a paradox; for the merciful are not taken to be the wisest, nor are likely to be the richest; yet Christ pronounces them blessed. A man may be truly merciful, who has not wherewithal to be bountiful or liberal; and then God accepts the willing mind. We must not only bear our own afflictions patiently, but we must, by Christian sympathy, partake of the afflictions of our brethren; pity must be shown (Job vi. 14), and bowels of mercy put on (Col. iii. 12). We must have compassion on the souls of others, and help them; pity the ignorant, and instruct them; the careless, and warn them; those who are in a state of sin, and snatch them as brands out of the burning. Nay, a good man is merciful to his beast.

1. They are blessed; so it was said in the Old Testament; Blessed is he that considers the poor, Ps. xli. 1. Herein they resemble God, whose goodness is his glory. One of the purest and most refined delights in this world, is that of doing good. In this word, Blessed are the merciful, is included that saying of Christ, which otherwise we find not in the gospels, It is more blessed to give than to receive, Acts xx. 35. 2. They shall obtain mercy; mercy with men, when they need it (we know not how soon we may stand in need of kindness, and therefore should be kind); but especially mercy with God, for with the merciful he will show himself merciful, Ps. xviii. 25. The most merciful and charitable cannot pretend to merit, but must fly to mercy. Whereas they shall have judgment without mercy who have shown no mercy.

VI. The pure in heart are happy (v. 8); Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. This is the most comprehensive of all the beatitudes.

1. Here is the most comprehensive character of the blessed; they are the pure in heart. True Christianity lies in the heart, in the purity of the heart; the washing of that from wickedness, Jer. iv. 14. We must lift up to God, not only clean hands, but a pure heart, Ps. xxiv. 4, 5; 1 Tim. i. 5. The heart must be pure, in opposition to mixture—an honest heart that aims well; and pure, in opposition to pollution and defilement; as wine unmixed, as water unmuddied. The heart must be kept pure from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, all that which comes out of the heart, and defiles the man. The heart must be purified by faith, and entire for God. Create in me such a clean heart, O God!

2. Here is the most comprehensive comfort of the blessed; They shall see God. (1) It is the perfection of the soul's happiness to see God; seeing him, as we may by faith in our present state, is a heaven upon earth; and seeing him as we shall in the future state, is the heaven of heaven. (2) The happiness of seeing God is promised to those, and those only who are pure in heart. None but the pure are capable of seeing God. What pleasure could an unsanctified soul take in the vision of a holy God? But all that are pure in heart, all that are truly sanctified, have desires wrought in them, which nothing but the sight of God will satisfy.

VII. The peace-makers are happy, v. 9. The wisdom that is from above is first pure, and then peaceable; the blessed ones are pure toward God, and peaceable toward men. The peace-makers are those who have, 1. A peaceable disposition. It is to love, and desire, and delight in peace; to be in it as in our element. 2. A peaceable conversation; industriously, as far as we can, to preserve the peace that it be not broken, and to recover it when it is broken. The making of peace is sometimes a thankless office, and it is the lot of him who parts a fray, to have blows on both sides; yet it is a good office, and we must be forward to it. (1) Such persons are blessed. They are working together with Christ, who came into the world to slay all enmities, and to proclaim peace on earth. (2) They shall be called the children of God. God will own them as such. If the peacemakers are blessed, woe to the peace-breakers!

VIII. Those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake, are happy. This is the greatest paradox of all, and peculiar to Christianity. This beatitude, like Pharaoh's dream, is doubled, because hardly credited, and yet the thing is certain.

1. The case of suffering saints described.

(1) They are persecuted, hunted, pursued, run down, as noxious beasts are, that are sought for to be destroyed; they are abandoned as the offscouring of all things.

(2) They are reviled, and have all manner of evil said against them falsely. Nicknames, and names of reproach, are fastened upon them, sometimes to make them formidable, that they may be powerfully assailed. Those who have had no power in their hands to do them any other mischief, could yet do this; and those who have had power to persecute, have found it necessary to do this too, to justify themselves in their barbarous usage of them. Reviling the saints is persecuting them, and will be found so shortly when hard speeches must be accounted for (Jude 15), and cruel mockings, Heb. xi. 36. They will say all manner of evil of you falsely. There is no evil so black and horrid, which, at one time or other, has not been said falsely, of Christ's disciples and followers.

(3) All this is for righteousness' sake (v. 10); for my sake, v. 11. This precludes those from this blessedness who suffer justly, and are evil spoken of truly for their real crimes; it is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes the martyr. Those suffer for righteousness' sake, who suffer for doing that which is good.

2. The comforts of suffering saints laid down.

(1) They are blessed; for they now, in their lifetime, receive their evil things (Luke xvi. 25), and receive them upon a good account. They are blessed, for it is an honour to them; it is an opportunity of glorifying Christ, and of experiencing special comforts and tokens of his presence.

(2) They shall be recompensed; Theirs is the kingdom of heaven. They have at present a sure title to it, and sweet foretastes of it; and shall ere long be in possession of it. Great is your reward in heaven: so great, as far to transcend the service. God will provide that those who lose for him, though it be life itself, shall not lose by him in the end. This is that which has borne up the suffering saints in all ages—this joy is set before them.

(3) "So persecuted they the prophets that were before you, v. 12. They were before you in excellency, above what you are yet arrived at; they were before you in time, that they might be examples to you of suffering affliction and of patience, James v. 10. Can you expect to go to heaven in a way by yourselves? It is a comfort to see the way of suffering a beaten road, and an honour to follow such leaders. That grace which was sufficient for them, to carry them through their sufferings, shall not be deficient to you."

(4) Therefore rejoice and be exceeding glad, v. 12. It is not enough to be patient and content under sufferings, but we must rejoice. Not to take a pride in our sufferings " we must take a pleasure in them, as knowing that Christ is herein beforehand with us, and that he will not be behindhand with us.

Verses 13–16

Christ had lately called his disciples, and told them that they should be fishers of men; here he tells them further what he designed them to be—the salt of the earth, and lights of the world.

I. Ye are the salt of the earth. The prophets, who went before them, were the salt of the land of Canaan; but the apostles were the salt of the whole earth, for they must go into all the world to preach the gospel. What could they do in so large a province as the whole earth? But, being to work silently as salt, one handful of that salt would diffuse its savour far and wide; would go a great way, and work insensibly and irresistibly as leaven, ch. xiii. 33. The doctrine of the gospel is as salt; it is penetrating, it reaches the heart, Acts ii. 37. It is cleansing, it is relishing, and preserves from putrefaction. An everlasting covenant is called a covenant of salt (Num. xviii. 19); and the gospel is an everlasting gospel. Salt was required in all the sacrifices. Christians, and especially ministers, are the salt of the earth.

1. If they be such as they should be they are as good salt, white, and small, and broken into many grains, but very useful and necessary. See in this, (1) What they are to be in themselves—seasoned with the gospel, with the salt of grace. Have salt in yourselves, else you cannot diffuse it among others, Mark ix. 50. (2) What they are to be to others; they must not only be good but do good. (3) What great blessings they are to the world. Mankind, lying in ignorance and wickedness, were a vast heap of unsavoury stuff, ready to putrefy; but Christ sent forth his disciples, by their lives and doctrines, to season it with knowledge and grace, and so to render it acceptable to God. (4) How they must expect to be disposed of. They must be scattered as salt upon the meat, here a grain and there a grain. Some have observed, that whereas it is foolishly called an ill omen to have the salt fall towards us, it is really an ill omen to have this salt fall from us.

2. If they be not, they are as salt that has lost its savour. If a Christian be so, especially if a minister be so, his condition is very sad; for, (1) He is irrecoverable: Wherewith shall it be salted? There is no remedy for unsavoury salt. (2) He is unprofitable: It is thenceforth good for nothing. As a man without reason, so is a Christian without grace. (3) He is doomed to ruin and rejection; He shall be cast out. He shall be trodden under foot of men.

II. Ye are the light of the world, v. 14. This also bespeaks them useful, as the former. (Nothing more useful than the sun and salt), but more glorious. Truly the light is sweet, it is welcome; the light of the first day of the world was so, so is the morning light of every day; so is the gospel, and those that spread it.

1. As the lights of the world, they are illustrious and conspicuous, and have many eyes upon them. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. They are for signs (Isa. viii. 18), men wondered at (Zech. iii. 8); all their neighbours have an eye upon them. Some admire them, commend them, rejoice in them, and study to imitate them; others envy them, hate them, censure them, and study to blast them. They are concerned therefore to walk circumspectly, because of their observers.

2. As the lights of the world, they are intended to illuminate and give light to others (v. 15), and therefore, (1) They shall be set up as lights. Christ having lighted these candles, they shall not be put under a bushel. The gospel is so strong a light, and carries with it so much of its own evidence, that, like a city on a hill, it cannot be hid, it cannot but appear to be from God. It will give light to all that are in the house, to all that will draw near to it, and come where it is. Those to whom it does not give light, must thank themselves; they will not be in the house with it. (2) They must shine as lights, [1] By their good preaching. The knowledge they have, they must communicate for the good of others; not put it under a bushel, but spread it. The disciples of Christ must not muffle themselves up in privacy and obscurity, under pretence of contemplation, modesty, or self-preservation. [2] By their good living. They must be burning and shining lights.

First, How our light must shine—by doing such good works as men may see. We must do good works that may be seen to the edification of others, but not that they may be seen to our own ostentation. Those about us must not only hear our good words, but see our good works.

Secondly, For what end our light must shine—"That those who see your good works may be brought, not to glorify you, but to glorify your Father which is in heaven." The glory of God is the great thing we must aim at in everything we do in religion. We must do all we can to bring others to glorify him. The sight of our good works will do this, by furnishing them, 1. With matter for praise. 2. With motives to piety. The holy, regular, and exemplary conversation of the saints, may do much towards the conversion of sinners. Examples teach. There is a winning virtue in a godly conversation.

Verses 17–20

Those to whom Christ preached had an eye, 1. To the scriptures of the Old Testament as their rule, and therein Christ here shows them they were in the right: 2. To the scribes and Pharisees as their example, and therein Christ here shows them they were in the wrong; for,

1. The rule which Christ came to establish exactly agreed with the scriptures of the Old Testament, here called the law and the prophets.

1. He protests against the thought of cancelling and weakening the Old Testament; Think not that I am come to destroy the law and the prophets. (1) "Let not the pious Jews, who have an affection for the law and the prophets, fear that I come to destroy them." (2) "Let not the profane Jews, who have a disaffection to the law and the prophets, and are weary of that yoke, hope that I am come to destroy them." The Saviour of souls is the destroyer of nothing that comes from God, much less of those excellent dictates which we have from Moses and the prophets. No, he came to fulfil them. That is, [1] To obey the commands of the law. He in all respects yielded obedience to the law, and never broke the law in anything. [2] To make good the promises of the law, and the predictions of the prophets. [3] To answer the types of the law. [4] To fill up the defects of it, and so to complete and perfect it. As a picture that is first rough-drawn, displays some outlines only of the piece intended, which are afterwards filled up; so Christ made an improvement of the law and the prophets by his additions and explications. [5] To carry on the same design. The gospel is the time of reformation (Heb. ix. 10), not the repeal of the law, but the amendment of it, and, consequently, its establishment.

2. He asserts the perpetuity of it. "Verily I say unto you, I, the Amen, the faithful Witness, solemnly declare it, that till heaven and earth pass, one jot, or one tittle, shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled." The word of the Lord endures for ever, both that of the law, and that of the gospel. The care of God concerning his law extends itself even to those things that seem to be of least account on it, for whatever belongs to God, and bears his stamp, be it ever so little, shall be preserved.

3. He gives it in charge to his disciples, carefully to preserve the law, and shows them the danger of the neglect and contempt of it (v. 19); Whosoever therefore shall break one of the least commandments of the law of Moses he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven. Whosoever shall do and teach them shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. (1) Among the commands of God there are some less than others; none absolutely little, but comparatively so. (2) It is a dangerous thing, in doctrine or practice, to disannul the least of God's commands. It is something more than transgressing the law, it is making void the law, Ps. cxix. 126. (3) That the further such corruptions as these spread, the worse they are. It is impudence enough to break the command, but it is a greater degree of it to teach men so. He that does so, shall be called least in the kingdom of heaven, in the kingdom of glory. Those are truly honourable, and of great account in the church of Christ, who both do and teach that which is good; for those who do not as they teach, pull down with one hand what they build up with the other. Those who speak from experience, who live up to what they preach, are truly great; hereafter they shall shine as the stars in the kingdom of our Father.

II. The righteousness which Christ came to establish by this rule, must exceed that of the scribes and Pharisees, v. 20. This was strange doctrine to those who looked upon the scribes and Pharisees as having arrived at the highest pitch of religion. It was therefore a great surprise to them, to hear that they must be better than they. The scribes and Pharisees were enemies to Christ and his doctrine, and were great oppressors; and yet it must be owned, that there was something commendable in them. Yet our Lord Jesus here tells his disciples, that the religion he came to establish, did not only exclude the badness, but excel the goodness, of the scribes and Pharisees. We must do more than they, and better than they. They minded only the outside, but we must make conscience of inside godliness. They aimed at the praise and applause of men, but we must aim at acceptance with God: but we, when we have done all, must deny ourselves, and say, We are unprofitable servants, and trust only to the righteousness of Christ.

Verses 21-26

Christ proceeds to expound the law in some particular instances. He adds not anything new, only limits and restrains some permissions which had been abused: and as to the precepts, shows the breadth, strictness, and spiritual nature of them. In these verses, he explains the law of the sixth commandment, according to the true intent and full extent of it.

I. Here is the command itself laid down (v. 12). The laws of God are not novel, upstart laws, but were delivered to them of old time; they are ancient laws, but of that nature as never to be antiquated nor grow obsolete. Killing is here forbidden, killing ourselves, killing any other, directly or indirectly, or being any way accessory to it. The law of God, the God of life, is a hedge of protection about our lives.

II. The exposition of this command which the Jewish teachers contented themselves with; their comment upon it was, Whosoever shall kill, shall be in danger of the judgment. Now this gloss of theirs upon this commandment was faulty, for it intimated, That the law of the sixth commandment was only external, and forbade no more than the act of murder, and laid no restraint upon the inward lusts, from which wars and fightings come. This was indeed the fundamental error of the Jewish teachers, that the divine law prohibited only the sinful act, not the sinful thought.

III. The exposition which Christ gave of this commandment.

1. Christ tells them that rash anger is heart-murder (v. 22); Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, breaks the sixth commandment. Anger is a natural passion; there are cases in which it is lawful and laudable; but it is then sinful, when we are angry without cause. When it is without any just provocation given; either for no cause, or no good cause, or no great and proportionable cause; when we are angry upon groundless surmises, or for trivial affronts not worth speaking of. When it is without any good end aimed at, then it is in vain, it is to do hurt; whereas if we are at any time angry, it should be to awaken the offender to repentance, and prevent his doing so again. When it exceeds due bounds; when we are outrageous and mischievous, and when we seek the hurt of those we are displeased at. This is a breach of the sixth commandment, for he that is thus angry, would kill if he could and durst; he has taken the first step towards it.

2. He tells them, that giving opprobrious language to our brother is tongue-murder, calling him, Raca, and Thou fool. When this is done with mildness and for a good end, to convince others of their vanity and folly, it is not sinful. But when it proceeds from anger and malice within, it is the smoke of that fire which is kindled from hell. (1) Raca is a scornful word, and comes from pride, "Thou empty fellow." This people who knoweth not the law, is cursed, is such language, John vii. 49. (2) Thou fool, is a spiteful word, and comes from hatred; looking upon him, not only as mean and not to be honoured, but as vile and not to be loved. The former speaks a man without sense, this (in scripture language) speaks a man without grace; the more the reproach touches his spiritual condition, the worse it is. Malicious slanders and censures are poison under the tongue, that kills secretly and slowly. It is an evidence of such an ill-will to our neighbour as would strike at his life, if it were in our power.

3. He tells them, that how light soever they made of these sins, they would certainly be reckoned for; he that is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment and anger of God; he that calls him Raca, shall be in danger of the council, of being punished by the Sanhedrim for reviling an Israelite; but whosoever saith, Thou fool, thou profane person, thou child of hell, shall be in danger of hell-fire, to which he condemns his brother. Christ would thus show which sin was most sinful, by showing which it was the punishment whereof was most dreadful.

IV. From all this it is here inferred, that we ought carefully to preserve Christian love and peace with all our brethren, and that if at any time a breach happens, we should labour for a reconciliation.

1. Because, till this be done, we are utterly unfit for communion with God in holy ordinances, v. 23, 24. If thou have aught against thy brother, make short work of it; no more is to be done but to forgive him (Mark xi. 25), and forgive the injury; but if the quarrel began on thy side, and the fault was either at first or afterwards thine, so that thy brother has a controversy with thee, go and be reconciled to him before thou offer thy gift at the altar, before thou approach solemnly to God. When we are addressing ourselves to any religious exercises, it is good for us to take that occasion of serious reflection and self-examination. Religious exercises are not acceptable to God, if they are performed when we are in wrath. Prayers made in wrath are written in gall, Isa. i. 15; lviii. 4. Love or charity is so much better than all burnt-offerings and sacrifice, that God is content to stay for the gift, rather than have it offered while we are under guilt and engaged in a quarrel. Thou art unfitted for communion with God quarrel with a brother, yet that can be no excuse for the omission or neglect of our duty. Many give this as a reason why they do not come to church or to the communion, because they are at variance with some neighbour; and whose fault is that? One sin will never excuse another, but will rather double the guilt. Want of charity cannot justify the want of piety. Therefore we must not let the sun go down upon our wrath any day, because we must go to prayer before we go to sleep; much less let the sun rise upon our wrath on a sabbath-day, because it is a day of prayer.

2. Because, till this be done, we lie exposed to much danger, v. 25, 26.

(1) Upon a temporal account. If the offence we have done to our brother, in his body, goods, or reputation, be such as will bear an action, in which he may recover considerable damages, it is our wisdom, and it is our duty to our family, to prevent that by a humble submission and a just and peaceable satisfaction; lest otherwise he recover it by law, and put us to the extremity of a prison. It is in vain to contend with the law, and there is danger of our being crushed by it. It is good to agree, for the law is costly. Though we must be merciful to those we have advantage against, yet we must be just to those that have advantage against us. A prison is an uncomfortable place to those who are brought to it by their own pride, and prodigality, their own wilfulness and folly.

(2) Upon a spiritual account. "Go, and be reconciled to thy brother, be just to him, be friendly with him, because while the quarrel continues, as thou art unfit to bring thy gift to the altar, unfit to come to the table of the Lord, so thou art unfit to die."

This is very applicable to the great business of our reconciliation to God through Christ; Agree with him quickly, whilst thou art in the way. Note, [1] The great God is an Adversary to all sinners. [2] It is our concern to agree with him. [3] It is our wisdom to do this quickly, while we are in the way. While we are alive, we are in the way; after death, it will be too late to do it. [4] They who continue in a state of enmity to God, are continually exposed to the arrests of his justice. Hell is the prison, into which those will be cast that continue in a state of enmity to God. Sinners must remain in it to eternity; they shall not depart till they have paid the uttermost farthing.

Verses 27–32

We have here an exposition of the seventh commandment. It is the law against uncleanness, which fitly follows upon the former; that laid a restraint upon sinful passions, this upon sinful appetites.

I. The command is here laid down (v. 17), Thou shalt not commit adultery; which includes a prohibition of all other acts of uncleanness, and the desire of them.

II. It is here explained in the strictness of it, in three things.

1. We are here taught, that there is such a thing as heart-adultery, adulterous thoughts and dispositions which never proceed to the act of adultery or fornication. Whosoever looketh on a woman (not only another man's wife, as some would have it, but any woman), to lust after her, has committed adultery with her in his heart, v. 28. This command forbids not only the acts of fornication and adultery, but, (1) All appetites to them. Lust is conscience baffled or biassed: biassed, if it say nothing against the sin; baffled, if it prevail not in what it says. (2) All approaches towards them; feeding the eye with the sight of the forbidden fruit. The eye is both the inlet and outlet of a great deal of wickedness of this kind. What have we the covering of the eyes for, but to restrain corrupt glances, and to keep out their defiling impressions? This forbids also the using of any other of our senses to stir up lust. If ensnaring looks are forbidden fruit, much more unclean discourses, and wanton dalliances, the fuel and bellows of this hellish fire. These precepts are hedges about the law of heart-purity, v. 8. And if looking be lust, they who dress and deck, and expose themselves, with design to be looked at and lusted after are no less guilty. Men sin, but devils tempt to sin.

2. That such looks and such dalliances are so very dangerous and destructive to the soul, that it is better to lose the eye and the hand that thus offend than to give way to the sin. "It is a hard saying, who can bear it? Flesh and blood cannot but look with pleasure upon a beautiful woman; and it is impossible to forbear lusting after and dallying with such an object." Such pretences as these will scarcely be overcome by reason, and therefore must be argued against with the terrors of the Lord.

(1) It is a severe operation that is here prescribed for the preventing of these fleshly lusts. If thy right eye offend thee, or cause thee to offend, by wanton glances, or wanton gazings, upon forbidden objects; if thy right hand offend thee, or cause thee to offend, by wanton dalliances; if there were no other way to restrain them (which, blessed be God, through his grace, there is), it were better for us to pluck out the eye, and cut off the hand than to indulge them in sin to the ruin of the soul. And if this must be submitted to, at the thought of which nature startles, much more must we resolve to keep a constant watch over our own hearts, and to suppress the first rising of lust and corruption there; to avoid the occasions of sin, to resist the beginnings of it, and to decline the company of those who will be a snare to us, though ever so pleasing; to keep out of harm's way, and abridge ourselves in the use of lawful things, when we find them temptations to us; and to seek unto God for his grace, and depend upon that grace daily, and so to walk in the Spirit, as that we may not fulfil the lusts of the flesh; and this will be as effectual as cutting off a right hand or pulling out a right eye; and perhaps as much against the grain to flesh and blood; it is the destruction of the old man.

(2) It is a startling argument that is made use of to enforce this prescription (v. 29). It is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. It is not unbecoming a minister of the gospel to preach of hell and damnation; nay, he must do it, for Christ himself did it; and we are unfaithful to our trust, if we give not warning of the wrath to come. [1] There are some sins from which we need to be saved with fear, particularly fleshly lusts, which are such natural brute beasts as cannot be checked, but by being frightened. [2] Those do not know or do not believe what hell is, that will rather venture their eternal ruin than deny themselves the gratification of a base and brutish lust. [3] Even those duties that are most unpleasant to flesh and blood, are profitable for us; and our Master requires nothing from us but what he knows to be for our advantage.

3. That men's divorcing their wives upon dislike, or for any other cause except adultery, was a violation of the seventh commandment, as it opened a door to adultery, v. 31, 32. Here observe,

(1) How the matter now stood with reference to divorce. "Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a bill of divorce; let him not think to do it by word of mouth, when he is in a passion; let him do it solemnly." Thus the law had prevented rash and hasty divorces.

(2) How this matter was rectified and amended by our Saviour. He reduced the ordinance of marriage to its primitive institution: They two shall be one flesh, not to be easily separated, and therefore divorce is not to be allowed, except in case of adultery, which breaks the marriage covenant; but he that puts away his wife upon any other pretence, causeth her to commit adultery, and him also that shall marry her when she is thus divorced.

Verses 33–37

We have here an exposition of the third commandment. God will not hold him guiltless, however he may hold himself, who breaks this commandment, by taking the name of the Lord God in vain.

I. It is agreed on all hands that it forbids perjury, forswearing, and the violation of oaths and vows, v. 33. Perjury is a sin condemned by the light of nature, as a complication of impiety toward God and injustice toward man, and as rendering a man highly obnoxious to the divine wrath. So help me God; wishing I may never have any help from God, if I swear falsely. Thus, by the consent of nations, have men cursed themselves, not doubting but that God would curse them, if they lied against the truth then when they solemnly called God to witness to it.

II. It is here added, that the commandment does not only forbid false swearing, but all rash, unnecessary swearing: Swear not at all, v. 34. Not that all swearing is sinful; so far from that, if rightly done, it is a part of religious worship, and we in it give unto God the glory due to his name. In swearing, we pawn the truth of something known, to confirm the truth of something doubtful or unknown; we appeal to a greater knowledge, to a higher court.

Now the mind of Christ in this matter is,

1. That we must not swear at all, but when we are duly called to it, and justice or charity to our brother, or respect to the commonwealth, make it necessary for the end of strife (Heb. vi. 16). We may be sworn, but we must not swear.

2. That we must not swear lightly and irreverently, in common discourse: it is a very great sin to make a ludicrous appeal to the glorious Majesty of heaven. It is a sin that has no cloak, no excuse for it, and therefore a sign of a graceless heart.

3. That we must in a special manner avoid promissory oaths, of which Christ more particularly speaks here, for they are oaths that are to be performed. The frequent requiring and using of oaths, is a reflection upon Christians, who should be of such acknowledged fidelity. as that their sober words should be as sacred as their solemn oaths.

4. That we must not swear by any creature. It should seem there were some, who, in civility (as they thought) to the name of God, would not make use of that in swearing, but would swear by heaven or earth, &c. There is nothing we can swear by, but it is some way or other related to God, who is the Fountain of all beings, and therefore it is as dangerous to swear by them, as it is to swear by God himself: it is the verity of the creature that is laid at stake; now that cannot be an instrument of testimony, but as it has regard to God.

(1) Swear not by the heaven; "As sure as there is a heaven, this is true;" for it is God's throne, where he resides. You cannot swear by heaven, but you swear by God himself.

(2) Nor by the earth, for it is his footstool. The earth is the Lord's; so that in swearing by it, you swear by its Owner.

(3) Neither by Jerusalem, a place for which the Jews had such a veneration, that they could not speak of anything more sacred to swear by. It is the city of the great King (Ps. xlviii. 2), the city of God (Ps. xlvi. 4), he is therefore interested in it, and in every oath taken by it.

(4) "Neither shalt thou swear by thy head. It is more God's than thine; for he made it, and formed all the springs and powers of it; whereas thou thyself canst not, from any natural intrinsic influence, change the colour of one hair, so as to make it white or black; so that thou canst not swear by thy head, but thou swearest by him who is the Life of thy head, and the Lifter up of it." Ps. iii. 3.

5. That therefore in all our communications we must content ourselves with, Yea, yea, and Nay, nay, v. 37. Verily, verily, was our Saviour's yea, yea. So if we deny a thing, let it suffice to say, No. If our fidelity be known, that will suffice to gain us credit; and if it be questioned, to back what we say with swearing and cursing, is but to render it more suspicious. They who can swallow a profane oath, will not strain at a lie.

The reason is observable; For whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil, though it do not amount to the iniquity of an oath. It comes from that deceitfulness which is in men, All men are liars; therefore men use these protestations, because they are distrustful one of another, and think they cannot be believed without them. An oath is physic, which supposes a disease.

Verses 38–42

In these verses the law of retaliation is expounded. Observe,

I. What the Old Testament permission was, in case of injury. It was not a command, that everyone should of necessity require such satisfaction; but they might lawfully insist upon it, if they pleased; an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. It was a direction, and a restraint to such as have mischief done to them that they may not insist on a greater punishment than is proper: it is not a life for an eye, nor a limb for a tooth, but observes a proportion.

Now, so far this is in force with us, as a direction to magistrates, to use the sword of justice according to the good and wholesome laws of the land, for the terror of evil-doers, and the vindication of the oppressed. And it is in force as a rule to lawgivers, to provide accordingly, and wisely to apportion punishments to crimes.

II. What the New Testament precept is, as to the complainant himself, his duty, is to forgive the injury as done to himself, and no further to insist upon the punishment of it than is necessary to the public good.

Two things Christ teaches us here:

1. We must not be revengeful (v. 39); I say unto you, that ye resist not evil;—the evil person that is injurious to you. We may avoid evil, and may resist it, so far as is necessary to our own security; but we must not render evil for evil, must not bear a grudge, nor avenge ourselves, nor study to be even with those that have treated us unkindly, but we must go beyond them by forgiving them. The law of retaliation must be made consistent with the law of love. It will not justify us in hurting our brother to say that he began, for it is the second blow that makes the quarrel.

Three things our Saviour specifies, to show that Christians must patiently yield to those who bear hard upon them.

(1) A blow on the cheek, which is an injury to me in my body; "Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, which is not only a hurt, but an affront and indignity, turn to him the other cheek." Bear it patiently: give not the rude man as good as he brings. Pass it by, and take no further notice of it: there are no bones broken, no great harm done, forgive it and forget it; and if proud fools think the worse of thee, and laugh at thee for it, all wise men will value and honour thee for it, as a follower of the blessed Jesus. Though this may perhaps, with some base spirits, expose us to the like affront another time, and so it is, in effect, to turn the other cheek.

not that disturb us. Perhaps, the forgiving of one injury may prevent another, when the avenging of it would but draw on another; some will be overcome by submission, who by resistance would but be the more exasperated.

(2) The loss of a coat, which is a wrong to me in my estate (v. 40); If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat. Though judges be just and circumspect, yet it is possible for bad men who make no conscience of oaths and forgeries, by course of law to force off the coat from a man's back. Marvel not at the matter (Eccles. v. 8), but let him even take thy cloak also. If the matter be small it is good to submit to it for peace' sake. "It will not cost thee so much to buy another cloak, as it will cost thee by course of law to recover that."

(3) The going a mile by constraint, which is a wrong to me in my liberty (v. 41); "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him two miles." Say, "Therefore I will do it, for otherwise there will be a quarrel;" and it is better to serve him, than to serve thy own lusts of pride and revenge. The sum of all is, that Christians must not be litigious; small injuries must be submitted to, and no notice taken of them; and if the injury be such as requires us to seek reparation, it must be for a good end, and without thought of revenge.

2. We must be charitable and beneficent (v. 42); must not only do no hurt to our neighbours, but labour to do them all the good we can. (1) We must be ready to give; "Give to him that asketh thee. If thou hast an ability, look upon the request of the poor as giving thee an opportunity for the duty of almsgiving." Yet the affairs of our charity must be guided with discretion, lest we give that to the idle and unworthy, which should be given to those that are necessitous, and deserve well. What God says to us, we should be ready to say to our poor brethren, Ask, and it shall be given you. (2) We must be ready to lend. This is sometimes as great a piece of charity as giving; as it not only relieves the present exigence, but obliges the borrower to providence, industry, and honesty. Be easy of access to him that would borrow: though he be bashful, and have not confidence to make known his case and beg the favour, yet thou knowest both his need and his desire, and therefore offer him the kindness. It becomes us to be thus forward in acts of kindness, for before we call, God hears us, and prevents us with the blessings of his goodness.

We have here, lastly, an exposition of that great fundamental law of the second table, Thou shalt love thy neighour.

I. See here how this law was corrupted by the comments of the Jewish teachers, v. 43. God said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour; and by neighbour they understood those only that they were pleased to look upon as their friends. They were willing to infer what God never designed; Thou shalt hate thine enemy; and they looked upon whom they pleased as their enemies. See how willing corrupt passions are to fetch countenance from the word of God, and to take occasion by the commandment to justify themselves.

II. See how it is cleared by the command of the Lord Jesus, who teaches us another lesson: "But I say unto you, Love your enemies," v. 44. Though men are ever so bad themselves, and carry it ever so basely towards us, yet that does not discharge us from the great debt we owe them, of love to our kind, love to our kin. It is the great duty of Christians to love their enemies; whilst we cannot have complacency in one that is openly wicked and profane, yet we must take notice, with pleasure, of that even in our enemies which is amiable and commendable; and love that, though they are our enemies. We must have a compassion for them, and a goodwill toward them. We are here told,

1. That we must speak well of them: Bless them that curse you. When we speak to them, we must answer their revilings with courteous and friendly words, and not render railing for railing. They, in whose tongues is the law of kindness, can give good words to those who give bad words to them.

2. That we must do well to them: Do good to them that hate you, and that will be a better proof of love than good words. Be ready to do them all the real kindness that you can, and glad of an opportunity to do it.

3. We must pray for them: Pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you. Christ himself was so treated. When at any time we meet with such usage, we have an opportunity of showing our conformity both to the precept and to the example of Christ, by praying for them who thus abuse us. We must pray that God will forgive them, that they may never fare the worse for anything they have done against us, and that he would make them to be at peace with us. This is heaping coals of fire on their heads.

We must do it,

[1] That we may be like God our Father; "that ye may be, may approve yourselves to be, the children of your Father which is in heaven." Can we write after a better copy? God maketh his sun to rise, and sendeth rain, on the just and unjust, v. 45. Sunshine and rain are great blessings to the world, and they come from God. Common mercies must be valued as instances and proofs of the goodness of God, who in them shows himself a bountiful Benefactor. These gifts of common providence are dispensed indifferently to good and evil, just and unjust. The worst of men partake of the comforts of this life in common with others. which is an amazing instance of God's patience and bounty. The gifts of God's bounty to wicked men that are in rebellion against him, teach us to do good to those that hate us. Those only will be accepted as the children of God, who study to resemble him, particularly in his goodness.

[2] That we may herein do more than others, v. 46, 47. First, Publicans love their friends. Nature inclines them to it; interest directs them to it. To do good to them who do good to us, is a common piece of humanity. Secondly, We must therefore love our enemies, that we may exceed them. Christianity is something more than humanity. It is a serious question, and which we should frequently put to ourselves, "What do we more than others? What excelling thing do we do? God has done more for us, and therefore justly expects more from us than from others; but what do we more than others? Wherein do we live above the rate of the children of this world? We cannot expect the reward of Christians, if we rise no higher than the virtue of publicans." Those who promise themselves a reward above others must study to do more than others.

Our Saviour concludes this subject with this exhortation (v. 48), Be ye therefore perfect, as your Father which is in heaven is perfect. Which may be understood, 1. In general, including all those things wherein we must be followers of God as dear children. It is the duty of Christians to desire, and aim at, and press towards a perfection in grace and holiness. Or, 2. In this particular before mentioned, of doing good to our enemies; see Luke vi. 36. It is God's perfection to forgive injuries and to entertain strangers, and to do good to the evil and unthankful, and it will be ours to be like him. We that owe so much, that owe our all, to the divine bounty, ought to copy it out as well as we can.

CHAP. VI

Christ, having in the former chapter, armed his disciples against the corrupt doctrines and opinions of the scribes and Pharisees, comes in this chapter to warn them against hypocrisy and worldly-mindedness, sins which, of all others, the professors of religion need most to guard against. We are here cautioned, I. Against hypocrisy, 1. In the giving of alms, ver. 1–4. 2. In prayer, ver. 5–8. We are here taught what to pray for, and how to pray (ver. 9–13); and to forgive in prayer, ver. 14, 15. 3. In fasting, ver. 16–18. II. Against worldly-mindedness, 1. In our choice, which is the destroying sin of hypocrites, ver. 19–24. 2. In our cares, which is the disquieting sin of many good Christians, ver. 25–34.

Verses 1–4

We must watch against hypocrisy, which was the leaven of the Pharisees, as well as against their doctrine, Luke xii. 1. Almsgiving, prayer, and fasting, are three great Christian duties. Thus we must not only depart from evil, but do good, and do it well, and so dwell for evermore.

We are cautioned against hypocrisy in giving alms. Take heed of it. It is a subtle sin; vain-glory insinuates itself into what we do ere we are aware. It is a sin we are in great danger by. Take heed of hypocrisy, for if it reign in you, it will ruin you. It is the dead fly that spoils the whole box of precious ointment.

Two things are here supposed,

I. The giving of alms is a great duty, and a duty which all the disciples of Christ, according to their ability, must abound in. The Jews called the poor's box the box of righteousness. It is true, our alms-deeds do not deserve heaven; but it is as true that we cannot go to heaven without them. Christ here takes it for granted that his disciples give alms, nor will he own those that do not.

II. That it is such a duty as has a great reward attending it, which is lost if it be done in hypocrisy. It shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just (Luke xiv. 14), in eternal riches.

The riches you impart form the only wealth you will always retain.

1. What was the practice of the hypocrites about this duty. They did it indeed, but not from any principle of obedience to God, or love to man, but in pride and vain-glory; not in compassion to the poor, but purely for ostentation. Pursuant to this intention, they chose to give their alms in the synagogues, and in the streets, where there was the greatest concourse of people to observe them. Not that it is unlawful to give alms when men see us; we may do it, we must do it, but not that men may see us. The hypocrites, if they gave alms at their own houses, sounded a trumpet, to proclaim their charity, and to have that taken notice of and made the subject of discourse.

Now the doom that Christ passes upon this is very observable: Verily I say unto you, they have their reward. Two words in it make it a threatening.

(1) It is a reward, but it is their reward; not the reward which God promises to them that do good, but the reward which they promise themselves, and a poor reward it is; they did it to be seen of men, and they are seen of men.

(2) It is a reward, that it is a present reward, they have it; and there is none reserved for them in the future state. They now have all that they are likely to have from God. It signifies a receipt in full. The world is but for provision to the saints, it is their spending-money; but it is pay to hypocrites, it is their portion.

2. What is the precept of our Lord Jesus about it, v. 3, 4. "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth when thou givest alms." The giving of alms with the right hand, intimates readiness to it and resolution in it; do it dexterously. But, "whatever kindness thy right hand doeth to the poor, let not thy left hand know it; conceal it as much as possible; industriously keep it private. Do it because it is a good work, not because it will give thee a good name." It is intimated, (1) That we must not let others know what we do. (2) That we must not observe it too much ourselves. Self-conceit and self-complacency, and an adoring of our own shadow, are branches of pride. We find those had their good works remembered to their honour, who had themselves forgotten them: When saw we thee an hungered, or athirst?

3. What is the promise to those who are thus sincere and humble in their alms-giving. Let thine alms be in secret, and then thy Father who seeth in secret will observe them. When we take least notice of our good deeds ourselves, God takes most notice of them. It is a comfort to sincere Christians, that God sees in secret. Observe how emphatically it is expressed; himself shall reward, he will himself be the Rewarder. Nay, he will himself be the Reward (Gen. xv. 1), thine exceeding great reward. He will reward thee as thy Father, not as a master who gives his servant just what he earns and no more, but as a father who gives abundantly more, and without stint, to his son that serves him. If the work be not open, the reward shall, and that is better.

Verses 5–8

When thou prayest (v. 5). It is taken for granted that all the disciples of Christ pray. You may as soon find a living man that does not breathe, as a living Christian that does not pray. If prayerless, then graceless.

Now there were two great faults they were guilty of in prayer—vain-glory (v. 5, 6); and vain repetitions, v. 7, 8.

I. We must not be proud and vain-glorious in prayer, nor aim at the praise of men. And here observe,

1. What was the way and practice of the hypocrites. In all their exercises of devotion, it was plain, the chief thing they aimed at was to be commended by their neighbours. When they seemed to soar upwards in prayer then their eye was downwards upon this as their prey. Observe,

(1) What the places were which they chose for their devotion; they prayed in the synagogues, which were indeed proper places for public prayer, but not for personal. They prayed in the corners of the streets, the broad streets (so the word signifies), which were most frequented. It was to cause themselves to be taken notice of.

(2) The posture they used in prayer; they prayed standing; this is a lawful and proper posture for prayer, but kneeling being the more humble and reverent gesture, their standing seemed to savour of pride and confidence in themselves (Luke xviii. 11).

(3) Their pride in choosing those public places, which is expressed in two things: [1] They love to pray there. They did not love prayer for its own sake, but they loved it when it gave them an opportunity of making themselves noticed. [2] It is that they may be seen of men; not that God might accept them, but that men might admire and applaud them.

(4) The product of all this, they have their reward; they have all the recompence they must ever expect from God for their service, and a poor recompence it is. What will it avail us to have the good word of our fellow-servants, if our Master do not say, Well done? They did it to be seen of men, and they are so; and much good may it do them. What passes between God and our own souls must be out of sight. Public places are not proper for private solemn prayer.

2. What is the will of Jesus Christ in opposition to this. Thou, when thou prayest, do so and so (v. 6). Personal prayer is here supposed to be the duty and practice of all Christ's disciples.

Observe, (1) The directions here given about it.

[1] Instead of praying in the synagogues and in the corners of the streets, enter into thy closet, into some place of privacy and retirement. Isaac went into the field (Gen. xxiv. 63), Christ to a mountain, Peter to the house-top. No place amiss in point of ceremony, if it do but answer the end. Yet if the circumstances be such that we cannot possibly avoid being taken notice of, we must not therefore neglect the duty, lest the omission be a greater scandal than the observation of it.

[2] Instead of doing it to be seen of men, pray to thy Father who is in secret. The Pharisees prayed rather to men than to God. Do you pray to God, and let that be enough for thee. Pray to him as a Father, as thy Father, ready to hear and answer, graciously inclined to pity, help, and succour thee. Pray to thy Father who is in secret. He is there in thy closet when no one else is there; there especially nigh to thee in what thou callest upon him for.

(2) The encouragements here given us to it.

[1] Thy Father seeth in secret. There is not a secret sudden breathing after God, but he observes it.

[2] He will reward thee openly; they have their reward that do it openly, and thou shalt not lose thine for thy doing it in secret. It is called a reward, but it is of grace, not of debt. Sometimes secret prayers are rewarded openly in this world by signal answers to them, which manifests God's praying people in the consciences of their adversaries.

II. We must not use vain repetitions in prayer, v. 7, 8. Though the life of prayer lies in lifting up the soul and pouring out the heart, yet there is some interest which words have in prayer, especially in joint prayer; for in that, words are necessary. Use not vain repetitions, either alone or with others. Now observe,

1. What the fault is that is here reproved and condemned; it is making a mere lip-labour of the duty of prayer. (1) Vain repetitions—tautology. It is not all repetition in prayer that is here condemned, but vain repetitions. Christ himself prayed, saying the same words (ch. xxvi. 44), out of a more than ordinary fervour and zeal, Luke xxii. 44. When we would fain say much, but cannot say much to the purpose; this is displeasing to God and all wise men. (2) Much speaking, an affectation of prolixity in prayer, because men love to hear themselves talk. Not that all long prayers are forbidden; Christ prayed all night, Luke vi. 12. It is not much praying that is condemned; no, we are bid to pray always, but much speaking; the danger of this error is when we only say our prayers, not when we pray them.

2. What reasons are given against this.

(1) This is the way of the heathen, as the heathen do; and it ill becomes Christians to worship their God as the Gentiles worship theirs. Thinking God altogether such a one as themselves, they thought he needed many words to make him understand what was said to him, or to bring him to comply with their requests. Lip-labour in prayer, though ever so well laboured, if that be all, is but lost labour.

(2) "It need not be your way, for your Father in heaven knoweth what things ye have need of before ye ask him, and therefore there is no occasion for such abundance of words. It does not follow that therefore ye need not pray; for God requires you by prayer to own your need of him. Open your case, and pour out your hearts before him, and then leave it with him." [1] The God we pray to is our Father. Children do not make long speeches to their parents when they want anything. They need not say many words, that are taught by the Spirit of adoption to say that one aright, Abba Father. [2] He is a Father that knows our case and knows our wants better than we do ourselves. He knows what things we have need of. He often gives before we call (Isa. lxv. 24), and more than we ask for (Eph. iii. 20). We need not be long, nor use many words in representing our case; God knows it better than we can tell him, only he will know it from us (what will ye that I should do unto you?). The most powerful intercessions are those which are made with groanings that cannot be uttered, Rom. viii. 26.

Verses 9–15

Because we know not what to pray for as we ought, he here helps our infirmities, by putting words into our mouths; after this manner therefore pray ye, v. 9. Not that we are tied up to the use of this form only, or of this always, as if this were necessary to the consecrating of our other prayers; we are here bid to pray after this manner, with these words, or to this effect. Yet, without doubt, it is very good to use it as a form, and it is a pledge of the communion of saints, it having been used by the church in all ages. It is used acceptably no further than it is used with understanding and without vain repetition.

The Lord's prayer (as indeed every prayer) is a letter sent from earth to heaven. Here is the inscription of the letter, the person to whom it is directed, our Father; the place where, in heaven; the contents of it in several errands of request; the close, for thine is the kingdom; the seal, Amen; and if you will, the date, too, this day.

I. The preface, Our Father who art in heaven. Our Father. Intimating, that we must pray, not only alone and for ourselves, but with and for others. We are here taught to whom to pray, to God only, and not to saints and angels. We are taught how to address ourselves to God, and what title to give him, that which speaks him rather beneficent than magnificent, for we are to come boldly to the throne of grace.

1. We must address ourselves to him as our Father, and must call him so. Nothing more pleasing to God, nor pleasant, to ourselves, than to call God Father. Christ in prayer mostly called God Father. If he be our Father, he will pity us under our weaknesses and infirmities (Ps. ciii. 13), will spare us (Mal. iii. 17), will make the best of our performances, though very defective, will deny us nothing that is good for us, Luke xi. 11–13. When we come repenting of our sins, we must eye God as a Father, as the prodigal did (Luke xv. 18), as a loving, gracious, reconciled Father in Christ.

2. As our Father in heaven: so in heaven as to be everywhere else, for the heaven cannot contain him; yet so in heaven as there to manifest his glory, for it is his throne (Ps. ciii. 19), and it is to believers a throne of grace: thitherward we must direct our prayers. Thence he has a full and clear view of all our wants and burdens and desires, and all our infirmities. He is not only, as a Father, willing to help us, but as a heavenly Father, able to help us, able to do great things for us, more than we can ask or think; he has wherewith to supply our needs, for every good gift is from above. He is a Father, and therefore we may come to him with boldness, but a Father in heaven, and therefore we must come with reverence. By prayer, we send before us thither, where we profess to be going.

II. The petitions, and those are six; the three first relating more immediately to God and his honour, the three last to our own concerns. The method of this prayer teaches us to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then to hope that other things shall be added.

1. Hallowed be thy name. (1) We give glory to God. We should give glory to God, before we expect to receive mercy and grace from him. Let him have the praise of his perfections, and then let us have the benefit of them. (2) We fix our end, that God may be glorified; all our other requests must be in subordination to this, and in pursuance of it. "Father, glorify thyself in giving me my daily bread and pardoning my sins," &c. Since all is of him and through him, all must be to him and for him. In prayer our thoughts and affections should be carried out most to the glory of God. "Do so and so for me, for the glory of thy name, and as far as is for the glory of it." (3) We desire and pray that the name of God, that is, God himself, in all that whereby he has made himself known, may be sanctified and glorified both by us and others, and especially by himself. "Father, let thy name be glorified as a Father, and a Father in heaven; glorify thy goodness and thy highness, thy majesty and mercy.

2. Thy kingdom come. This petition has plainly a reference to the doctrine which Christ preached at this time, the kingdom of heaven is at hand. The kingdom of your Father, who is in heaven, this is at hand, pray that it may come. We should turn the word we hear into prayer, our hearts should echo to it; does Christ promise, surely I come quickly? our hearts should answer, Even so, come. What God has promised we must pray for; for promises are given, not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage prayer.

3. Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven. We pray that God's kingdom being come, we and others may be brought into obedience to all the laws and ordinances of it. We make Christ but a titular Prince, if we call him King, and do not do his will: having prayed that he may rule us, we pray that we may in everything be ruled by him. (1) The thing prayed for, thy will be done. In this sense Christ prayed, not my will, but thine be done. "Enable me to do what is pleasing to thee; give me that grace that is necessary to the right knowledge of thy will, and an acceptable obedience to it, that we may neither displease God in anything we do nor be displeased at anything God does." (2) The pattern of it, that it may be done on earth (where our work must be done, or it never will be done), as it is done in heaven. We pray that earth may be made more like heaven by the observance of God's will.

4. Give us this day our daily bread. Because our natural being is necessary to our spiritual well-being in this world, therefore, after the things of God's glory, kingdom, and will, we pray for the necessary supports and comforts of this present life.

Every word here has a lesson in it: (1) We ask for bread; not dainties, not superfluities; that which is wholesome. (2) We ask for our bread; that teaches us honesty and industry. (3) We ask for our daily bread; which teaches us not to take thought for the morrow (v. 34), but constantly to depend upon divine Providence. (4) We beg of God to give it us. The greatest of men must be beholden to the mercy of God for their daily bread, (5) We pray, "Give it to us; not to me only, but to others in common with me." This teaches us charity, and a compassionate concern for the poor and needy. (6) We pray that God would give it us this day; which teaches us to renew the desire of our souls toward God, as the wants of our bodies are renewed. We could as well go a day without meat, as without prayer.

5. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. This is connected with the former. Our daily bread does but feed us as lambs for the slaughter, if our sins be not pardoned. It intimates, likewise, that we must pray for daily pardon, as duly as we pray for daily bread.

(1) A petition; Father in heaven forgive us our debts, our debts to thee. Our sins are our debts; there is a debt of duty, which, as creatures, we owe to our Creator; we do not pray to be discharged from that, but upon the non-payment of that there arises a debt of punishment. Our hearts' desire and prayer to our heavenly Father every day should be, that he would forgive us our debts; that we may be discharged and have the comfort of it.

(2) An argument to enforce this petition; as we forgive our debtors. This is not a plea of merit, but a plea of grace. Our duty is to forgive our debtors. We must forbear, and forgive, and forget the affronts put upon us, and the wrongs done us; and this is a moral qualification for pardon and peace; it encourages to hope, that God will forgive us; it will be an evidence to us that he has forgiven us, having wrought in us the condition of forgiveness.

6. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Lead us not into temptation. Having prayed that the guilt of sin may be removed, we pray, as is fit, that we may never return again to folly, that we may not be tempted to it. But deliver us from evil; ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ—from the evil one, the devil, the tempter; keep us, that we may not be assaulted: Or from the evil thing, sin, the worst of evils; an evil, an only evil; that evil thing which God hates, and which Satan tempts men to and destroys them by.

III. The conclusion: For thine is the kingdom, and the power and the glory, for ever. Amen.

1. It is our duty to plead with God in prayer, to fill our mouth with arguments not to move God, but to affect ourselves; to encourage our faith, to excite our fervency, and to evidence both. Now the best pleas in prayer are those that are taken from God himself, and from that which he has made known of himself. We must wrestle with God in his own strength. "Thine is the kingdom"; God gives and saves like a king. "Thine is the power, to maintain and support that kingdom, and to make good all thine engagements to thy people." Thine is the glory, as the end of all that which is given to, and done for, the saints, in answer to their prayers.

2. It is a form of praise and thanksgiving. The best pleading with God is praising of him; it is the way to obtain further mercy, as it qualifies us to receive it. We praise God, and give him glory, not because he needs it—he is praised by a world of angels, but because he deserves it. Praise is the work and happiness of heaven; and all that would go to heaven hereafter, must begin their heaven now. It becomes us to be copious in praising God. A true saint never thinks he can speak honourably enough of God. Ascribing glory to God for ever, intimates an acknowledgment, that it is eternally due, and an earnest desire to be eternally doing it, with angels and saints above, Ps. lxxi. 14.

Lastly, To all this we are taught to affix our Amen, so be it. God's Amen is a grant; it shall be so: our Amen is only a summary desire; let it be so: it is in token of our desire and assurance to be heard, that we say Amen. It is good to conclude religious duties with some warmth and vigour, that we may go from them with a sweet savour upon our spirits.

Most of the petitions in the Lord's prayer had been commonly used by the Jews in their devotions, or words to the same effect: but that clause in the fifth petition, As we forgive our debtors, was perfectly new, and therefore our Saviour here shows for what reason he added it, from the necessity and importance of the thing itself. God, in forgiving us, has a peculiar respect to our forgiving those that have injured us; and therefore, when we pray for pardon, we must mention our making conscience of that duty, not only to remind ourselves of it, but to bind ourselves to it. Selfish nature is loth to comply with this, and therefore it is here inculcated, v. 14, 15.

1. In a promise. If ye forgive, your heavenly Father will also forgive. Not as if this were the only condition required; there must be repentance and faith, and new obedience. He that relents toward his brother thereby shows that he repents toward his God. It is a good evidence, and a good help of our forgiving others, to call the injuries done us by a mollifying, excusing name. Call them not wilful injuries, but casual inadvertencies; peradventure it was an oversight, therefore make the best of it. We must forgive, as we hope to be forgiven; must not upbraid our brother with the injuries he has done us, nor rejoice in any hurt that befalls him, but must be ready to help him and do him good, and if he repent and desire to be friends again, we must be free and familiar with him, as before.

2. In a threatening. "But if you forgive not" those that have injured you, that is a bad sign you have not the other requisite conditions, but are altogether unqualified for pardon; and therefore your Father will not forgive you. And if other graces be sincere, and yet you be defective greatly in forgiving, you cannot expect the comfort of your pardon Those that would find mercy with God must show mercy to their brethren. If we pray in anger, we have reason to fear God will answer in anger. It has been said, Prayers made in wrath are written in gall. What reason is it that God should forgive us the talents we are indebted to him, if we forgive not our brethren the pence they are indebted to us? Christ came into the world as the great Peace-Maker, not only to reconcile us to God, but one to another. It is great presumption and of dangerous consequence, for any to make a light matter of that which Christ here lays such a stress upon. Men's passions shall not frustrate God's word.

We are here cautioned against hypocrisy in fasting.

I. It is here supposed that religious fasting is a duty required of the disciples of Christ, when God, in his providence, calls to it, and when the case of their own souls upon any account requires it. Fasting is here put last, because it is not so much a duty for its own sake, as a means to dispose us for other duties. Prayer comes in between almsgiving and fasting, as being the life and soul of both. It was not the Pharisee's fasting twice in the week, but his boasting of it, that Christ condemned. It is a laudable practice, and we have reason to lament it, that it is so generally neglected among Christians. It is an act of self-denial and humiliation under the hand of God. The most grown Christians must hereby own, they are so far from having anything to be proud of, that they are unworthy of their daily bread.

II. We are cautioned not to do this as the hypocrites did it, lest we lose the reward of it.

Now, 1. The hypocrites pretended fasting, when there was nothing of that contrition or humiliation of soul in them, which is the life and soul of the duty. Theirs were mock-fasts, the show and shadow without the substance.

2. They proclaimed their fasting, and managed it so that all who saw them might take notice that it was a fasting-day with them. Even on these days they appeared in the streets, that men might see how often they fasted, and might extol them as devout, mortified men. It is sad that men, who have, in some measure, mastered their pleasure, which is sensual wickedness, should be ruined by their pride, which is spiritual wickedness, and no less dangerous. Here also they have their reward, and it is their all.

III. We are directed how to manage a private fast. He does not tell us how often we must fast; the Spirit in the word has left that to the Spirit in the heart; but take this for a rule, whenever you undertake this duty, study therein to approve yourselves to God, and not to recommend yourselves to the good opinions of men. Christ does not direct to abate anything of the reality of the fast; he does not say, "take a little meat, or a little drink, or a little cordial;" no, "let the body suffer, but lay aside the show and appearance of it. Look pleasant, anoint thine head and wash thy face, as thou dost on ordinary days, on purpose to conceal thy devotion; and thou shalt be no loser in the praise of it at last; for though it be not of men, it shall be of God." Fasting is the humbling of the soul; let that therefore be thy principal care. If we be sincere in our solemn fasts, and humble, and trust God's omniscience for our witness, and his goodness for our reward, we shall find, both that he did see in secret, and will reward openly. Religious fasts, if rightly kept, will shortly be recompensed with an everlasting feast.

Christ, having warned us against coveting the praise of men, proceeds next to warn us against coveting the wealth of the world; in this also we must take heed, lest we be as the hypocrites are, and do as they do: the fundamental error that they are guilty of is, that they choose the world for their reward.

I. In choosing the treasure we lay up. Something or other every man has which he makes his treasure, his portion, which his heart is upon. Something the soul will have, which it looks upon as the best thing. Now Christ designs not to deprive us of our treasure, but to direct us in the choice of it.

1. A good caution against making the things that are seen, that are temporal, our best things, and placing our happiness in them. Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth. Christ's disciples had left all to follow him, let them still keep in the same good mind. Now we must not lay up our treasures on earth, that is, (1) We must not count these things the best things: we must not call them glory, but see and own that they have no glory in comparison with the glory that excelleth. (2) We must not covet an abundance of these things, nor be still grasping at more and more of them, as never knowing when we have enough. (3) We must not confide in them for futurity: must not say to the gold, Thou art my hope. (4) We must not content ourselves with them, as all we need or desire. It concerns thee to choose wisely, for thou art choosing for thyself, and shalt have as thou choosest. If we know and consider ourselves what we are, what we are made for, how large our capacities are, and how long our continuance, and that our souls are ourselves, we shall see it a foolish thing to lay up our treasures on earth.

2. Here is a good reason given why we should not look upon anything on earth as our treasure, because it is liable to loss and decay: (1) From corruption within. That which is treasure upon earth moth and rust do corrupt. Manna itself bred worms. The rust and the moth breed in the metal itself and in the garment itself. Worldly riches have in themselves a principle of corruption and decay. (2) From violence without. Thieves break through and steal. Every hand of violence will be aiming at the house where treasure is laid up; nor can anything be laid up so safe, but we may be spoiled of it. It is folly to make that our treasure which we may so easily be robbed of.

3. Good counsel, to make the joys and glories of the other world, those things not seen that are eternal, our best things, and to place our happiness in them. Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven. There are treasures in heaven, as sure as there are on this earth; and those in heaven are the only true treasures. (1) It is our wisdom to lay up our treasure in those treasures; to give all diligence to make sure our title to eternal life through Jesus Christ, and to depend upon that as our happiness, and look upon all things here below with a holy contempt. If we thus make those treasures ours, they are laid up, and we may trust God to keep them safe for us. Let us not burthen ourselves with the cash of this world. The promises are bills of exchange, by which all true believers return their treasure to heaven, payable in the future state. (2) It is a great encouragement to us to lay up our treasure in heaven, for there it is safe; no moth nor rust will corrupt it; thieves do not break through and steal. It is a happiness above and beyond the changes and chances of time, an inheritance incorruptible.

4. A good reason why we should thus choose. Where your treasure is, on earth or in heaven, there will your heart be. The heart follows the treasure, as the needle follows the loadstone, or the sunflower the sun. Where the treasure is there the value and esteem are, there the love and affection are. Where the treasure is there our hope and trust are; there our joys and delights will be; and there our thoughts. The heart is God's due and that he may have it, our treasure must be laid up with him. Our treasure is our alms, prayers, and fastings, and the reward of them; if we have done these only to gain the applause of men, we have laid up this treasure on earth. Now it is folly to do this, for the praise of men we covet so much is liable to corrupt: a little folly, like a dead fly, will spoil it all, Eccles. x. 1. Slander and calumny are thieves that break through and steal it away. Hypocritical services lay up nothing in heaven (Isa. lviii. 3). But if we have prayed and fasted and given alms in truth and uprightness, with an eye to God, we have laid up that treasure in heaven; a book of remembrance is written there (Mal. iii. 16). Hypocrites are written in the earth, but God's faithful ones have their names written in heaven, Luke x. 20. His well done shall stand for ever; and if we have thus laid up our treasure with him, with him our hearts will be; and where can they be better?

II. We must take heed of hypocrisy and worldly-mindedness in choosing the end we look at. Our concern as to this is represented by two sorts of eyes which men have, a single eye and an evil eye, v. 22, 23.

1. The eye, that is, the heart (so some) if that be single, free and bountiful, if the heart be liberally affected and stand inclined to goodness and charity, it will direct the man to Christian actions, the whole conversation will be full of light, of good works, which are our light shining before men; but if the heart be evil, covetous, and hard, and envious, griping and grudging, the body will be full of darkness, the whole conversation will be heathenish and unchristian. If the light that is in us be darkness, if there be not so much as good nature in a man, not so much as a kind disposition, how great is the corruption of a man, and the darkness in which he sits! Luke xii. 33; 2 Cor. ix. 7.

2. The eye, that is, the understanding (so some); the practical judgment, the conscience, which is to the other faculties of the soul, as the eye is to the body, to guide and direct their motions; now if this eye be single, if it make a true and right judgment, it will rightly guide the affections and actions, which will all be full of the light of grace and comfort; but if this be evil and corrupt, the heart and life must needs be full of darkness, and the whole conversation corrupt. An error in the practical judgment is fatal, it is that which calls evil good and good evil (Isa. v. 20).

3. The eye, that is, the aims and intentions; by the eye we set our end before us. In everything we do in religion, there is something or other that we have in our eye. If we aim purely and only at the glory of God, seek his honour and favour, and direct all entirely to him, then the eye is single, the whole body will be full of light, all the actions will be regular and gracious, pleasing to God and comfortable to ourselves; but if this eye be evil, if, instead of aiming only at the glory of God, and our acceptance with him, we look aside at the applause of men, and while we profess to honour God, contrive to honour ourselves, and seek our own things under colour of seeking the things of Christ, this spoils all. It is of the last importance in religion, that we be right in our aims. The hypocrite is like the waterman, that looks one way and rows another; the true Christian like the traveller, that has his journey's end in his eye. The hypocrite soars like the kite, with his eye upon the prey below. The true Christian soars like the lark, higher and higher, forgetting the things that are beneath.

III. We must take heed of hypocrisy and worldly-mindedness in choosing the master we serve, v. 24. No man can serve two masters. Serving two masters is contrary to the single eye; for the eye will be to the master's hand, Ps. cxxiii. 1, 2. Our Lord Jesus here exposes the cheat which those put upon their own souls, who think to divide between God and the world, to have a treasure on earth, and a treasure in heaven too, to please God and please men too.

1. A general maxim laid down; No man can serve two masters, much less two gods; for their commands will some time or other cross or contradict one another. While two masters go together, a servant may follow them both; but when they part, you will see to which he belongs. This truth is plain enough in common cases.

2. The application of it to the business in hand. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. Mammon is a Syriac word, that signifies gain; so that whatever in this world is, or is accounted by us to be, gain (Phil. iii. 7), is mammon. Whatever is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eye, and the pride of life, is mammon. Self, the unity in which the world's trinity centres, sensual, secular self, is the mammon which cannot be served in conjunction with God. He does not say, We must not or we should not, but we cannot serve God and Mammon; we cannot love both (1 John ii. 15; James iv. 4); or hold to both, or hold by both in observance, obedience, attendance, trust, and dependence, for they are contrary, the one to the other. Let us not then halt between God and Baal, but choose ye this day whom ye will serve, and abide by your choice.

There is scarcely any one sin against which our Lord Jesus more largely and earnestly warns his disciples, than the sin of disquieting, distracting, distrustful cares about the things of this life.

I. The prohibition laid down. It is the counsel and command of the Lord Jesus, that we take no thought about the things of this world; I say unto you. He says it as our Lawgiver, and the Sovereign of our hearts; he says it as our Comforter, and the Helper of our joy. What is it that he says? Take no thought. Be not in care. It is the repeated command of the Lord Jesus to his disciples, that they should not divide and pull in pieces their own minds which care about the world. There is a thought concerning the things of this life, which is not only lawful, but duty.

But the thought here forbidden is, 1. A disquieting, tormenting thought, which disturbs our joy in God, which breaks the sleep, and hinders our enjoyment of ourselves, of our friends, and of what God has given us. 2. A distrustful, unbelieving thought. God has promised to provide for those that are his all things needful for life as well as godliness, the life that now is, food and a covering: not dainties, but necessaries. He never said, "They shall be feasted," but, "Verily, they shall be fed." Now an inordinate care for time to come, and fear of wanting those supplies, spring from a disbelief of these promises, and of the wisdom and goodness of Divine Providence. But for the future, we must cast our care upon God, and take no thought, because it looks like a jealousy of God, who knows how to give what we want when we know not how to get it. Let our souls dwell at ease in him! This gracious carelessness is the same with that sleep which God gives to his beloved.

Take no thought for your life. Life is our greatest concern for this world; All that a man has will he give for his life; yet take no thought about it. Refer it to God to lengthen or shorten it as he pleases; my times are in thy hand, and they are in a good hand. Refer it to God to embitter or sweeten it as he pleases. We must not be solicitous, no not about the necessary support of this life, food and raiment; these God has promised. Say not, What shall we eat? Though many good people have the prospect of little, yet there are few but have present support.

Take no thought for the morrow, for the time to come. Be not solicitous for the future. As we must not boast of tomorrow, so we must not care for tomorrow.

II. The reasons and arguments to enforce this prohibition. To show how much the heart of Christ is upon it, and what pleasure he takes in those that hope in his mercy, the command is backed with the most powerful arguments. To free us from anxious thoughts and to expel them, Christ here suggests to us comforting thoughts, that we may be filled with them. They may be weakened by right reason, but it is by an active faith only that they can be overcome.

1. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? v. 25. Yes, no doubt it is; the thing speaks for itself. Our life is a greater blessing than our livelihood. Meat and raiment are in order to life, and the end is more noble and excellent than the means. The daintiest food and finest raiment are from the earth, but life from the breath of God. This is an encouragement to us to trust God for food and raiment, and so to ease ourselves of all perplexing cares about them. God has given us life, and given us the body; what cannot he do for us, who did that? —what will he not? If we take care about our souls and eternity, which are more than the body, and its life, we may leave it to God to provide for us food and raiment, which are less. He that guards us against the evils we are exposed to, will supply us with the good things we are in need of.

2. Behold the fowls of the air, and consider the lilies of the field. Here is an argument taken from God's common providence toward the inferior creatures. A fine pass fallen man has come to, that he must be sent to school to the fowls of the air, and that they must teach him!

(1) Look upon the fowls, and learn to trust God for food (v. 26). Observe the providence of God concerning them. There are various sorts of fowls; they are numerous, some of them ravenous, but they are all fed, and fed with food convenient for them. The fowls, as they are least serviceable to man, so they are least within his care; men often feed upon them, but seldom feed them; yet they are fed, and it is your heavenly Father that feeds them; he knows all the wild fowls of the mountains, better than you know the tame ones at your own barn-door. But that which is especially observed here is, that they are fed without any care or project of their own; they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns. Every day, as duly as the day comes, provision is made for them, and their eyes wait on God, that great and good Housekeeper, who provides food for all flesh. Improve this for your encouragement to trust in God. Are ye not much better than they? Yes, certainly you are. The heirs of heaven are much better than the fowls of heaven; nobler and more excellent beings, and, by faith, they soar higher. He is their Maker and Lord, their Owner and Master; but besides all this, he is your Father; you are his children, his first-born; now he that feeds his birds surely will not starve his babes. They trust your Father's providence, and will not you trust it? In dependence upon that, they are careless for the morrow; and being so, they live the merriest lives of all creatures; they sing among the branches. If we were, by faith, as unconcerned about the morrow as they are, we should sing as cheerfully as they do.

(2) Look upon the lilies, and learn to trust God for raiment. That is another part of our care, what we shall put on. This care returns almost as often as that for our daily bread. Consider the lilies of the field; not only look upon them (every eye does that with pleasure), but consider them. There is a great deal of good to be learned from what we see every day, if we would but consider it. Consider how frail the lilies are; they are the grass of the field. Thus all flesh is grass: though some in the endowments of body and mind are as lilies, much admired, still they are grass. This grass today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven; in a little while the place that knows us will know us no more. We should not take thought for the morrow, what we shall put on, because, perhaps, by tomorrow, we may have occasion for our grave-clothes. Consider how free from care the lilies are: they toil not as men do, to earn clothing; neither do they spin, as women do, to make clothing. It does not follow that we must therefore neglect, or do carelessly, the proper business of this life. Idleness tempts God, instead of trusting him. Consider how fair, how fine the lilies are; how they grow; what they grow from. The root of the lily is, in the winter, lost and buried under ground, yet, when spring returns, it appears, and starts up in a little time; hence it is promised to God's Israel, that they shall grow as the lily. Consider what they grow to. Out of that obscurity in a few weeks they come to be so very gay, that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these. Let him dress himself as fine as he could, he comes far short of the beauty of the lilies, and a bed of tulips outshines him. Let us, therefore, be ambitious of the wisdom of Solomon rather than the glory of Solomon, in which he was outdone by the lilies. Knowledge and grace are the perfection of man, not beauty, much less fine clothes. Now God is here said thus to clothe the grass of the field. All the excellences of the creature flow from God. It was he that gave the horse his strength, and the lily its beauty. Consider how instructive all this is to us, v. 30.

First, As to fine clothing; this teaches us not to care for it at all, not to covet it, nor to be proud of it, for after all our care in this the lilies will far outdo us; we cannot dress so fine as they do, why then should we attempt to vie with them? Their adorning will soon perish, and so will ours.

Secondly, As to necessary clothing; this teaches us to cast the care of it upon God. If he give such fine clothes to the grass, much more will he give fitting clothes to his own children. Observe the title he gives them (v. 30), O ye of little faith. This may be taken, 1. As an encouragement to true faith, though it be but weak. Great faith shall be commended, and shall procure great things, but little faith shall not be rejected. Sound believers shall be provided for, though they be not strong believers. The babes in the family are fed and clothed, as well as those that are grown up, and with a special care and tenderness. Or, 2. It is rather a rebuke to weak faith, though it be true. If we had but more faith, we should have less care.

3. Which of you, the wisest, the strongest of you, by taking thought, can add one cubit to his stature? We did not arrive at the stature we are by our own care and thought, but by the providence of God. An infant of a span long has grown up to be a man of six feet, he grew he knew not how, by the power and goodness of God. Now he that made our bodies, and made them of such a size, surely will take care to provide for them. The growing age is the thoughtless, careless age, yet we grow; and shall not he who reared us to this, provide for us now we are reared? We cannot alter the stature we are of, if we would. We are not all of a size, yet the difference in stature between one and another is not material, nor of any great account. Now as we do in reference to our bodily stature, so we should do in reference to our worldly estate. We should not covet an abundance of the wealth of this world, any more than we would covet the addition of a cubit to our stature, which is a great deal in a man's height; it is enough to grow by inches; such an addition would but make one unwieldy, and a burden to one's self. We must reconcile ourselves to our state, as we do to our stature; we must set the conveniences against the inconveniences, and so make a virtue of necessity. We cannot alter the disposals of Providence.

4. After all these things do the Gentiles seek, v. 32. The Gentiles seek these things, because they know not better things; they are eager for this world, because they are strangers to a better; they seek these things with care and anxiety, because they are without God in the world, and understand not his providence. They fear and worship their idols, but know not how to trust them. But it is a shame for Christians, who build upon nobler principles, to walk as Gentiles walk, and to fill their heads and hearts with these things.

5. Your heavenly Father knows ye have need of all these things; these necessary things, food and raiment; he knows our wants better than we do ourselves. You think, if such a good friend did but know your wants and straits, you would soon have relief: your God knows them; and he is your Father that loves you and pities you, and is ready to help you. Though he knows our wants, he will know them from us. Therefore, we should ease ourselves of the burthen of care, by casting it upon God, because it is he that careth for us. If he cares, why should we care?

6. Seek first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you, v. 33. Here is a double argument against the sin of thoughtfulness; take no thought for your life, the life of the body; for, (1) You have greater and better things to take thought about, the life of your soul, your eternal happiness; that is the one thing needful (Luke x. 42), about which you should employ your thoughts. (2) You have a surer and easier, a safer and a more compendious way to obtain the necessaries of this life, and that is, by seeking first the kingdom of God.

[1] The great duty required: it is the sum and substance of our whole duty: "Seek first the kingdom of God." Our duty is to seek; though we have not attained, but in many things fail and come short, sincere seeking is accepted. We must mind heaven as our end, and holiness as our way. We make nothing of our religion, if we do not make heaven of it. And with the happiness of this kingdom, seek the righteousness of it; God's righteousness. Seek first the kingdom of God. We must seek the things of Christ more than our own things. "Seek these things first; first in thy days: let the morning of youth be dedicated to God. Seek this first every day; let waking thoughts be of God." Let him that is the First, have the first.

[2] The gracious promise annexed; all these things, the necessary supports of life, shall be added unto you; shall be given over and above; as he that buys goods has paper and packthread given him into the bargain. Godliness has the promise of the life that now is, 1 Tim. iv. 8. We then begin at the right end of our work, when we begin with God. As to all the things of this life, Jehovah-jireh—the Lord will provide as much of them as he sees good for us, and more we would not wish for. God's Israel were not only brought to Canaan at last, but had their charges borne through the wilderness.

7. The morrow shall take thought for the things of itself: sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, v. 34. Every day brings along with it its own burthen of cares and grievances. It brings along with it its own strength and supply too. Let the morrow take thought for the things of itself. If wants and troubles be renewed with the day, there are aids and provisions renewed likewise; compassions, that are new every morning, Lam. iii. 22, 23. Let us refer it therefore to the morrow's strength to do the morrow's work, and bear the morrow's burthen. This does not forbid a prudent foresight, and preparation accordingly, but a perplexing solicitude, and a prepossession of difficulties and calamities, which may perhaps never come. The meaning is, let us mind present duty, and then leave events to God; do the work of the day in its day, and then let tomorrow bring its work along with it. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. This present day has trouble enough attending it, we need not accumulate burthens by anticipating our trouble, nor borrow perplexities from tomorrow's evils to add to those of this day. Let us not pull that upon ourselves all together at once, which Providence has wisely ordered to be borne by parcels. By our daily prayers we may procure strength to bear us up under our daily troubles, and to arm us against the temptations that attend them, and then let none of these things move us.

CHAP. VII

This chapter continues and concludes Christ's sermon on the mount. I. Some rules concerning censure and reproof, ver. 1–6. II. Encouragements given us to pray to God for what we need, ver. 7–11. III. The necessity of strictness in conversation urged upon us, ver. 12–14. IV. A caution given us to take heed of false prophets, ver. 15–20. V. The conclusion of the whole sermon, ver. 21–27. VI. The impression which Christ's doctrine made upon his hearers, ver. 28, 29.

Verses 1–6

Our Saviour is here directing us how to conduct ourselves in reference to the faults of others.

I. A caution against judging, v. 1, 2. The prohibition; Judge not. We must judge ourselves, and judge of our own acts, but we must not judge our brother. We must not sit in the judgment-seat, to make our word a law to everybody. We must not despise him, nor set him at nought, Rom. xiv. 10. We must not judge rashly. We must not judge uncharitably, unmercifully, nor with a spirit of revenge, and a desire to do mischief. We must not judge the hearts of others, nor their intentions, for it is God's prerogative to try the heart. Nor must we judge of their eternal state, nor call them hypocrites, reprobates, and castaways; that is stretching beyond our line; what have we to do, thus to judge another man's servant? Counsel him, and help him, but do not judge him. The reason to enforce this prohibition. That ye be not judged. This intimates, (1) That if we presume to judge others, we may expect to be ourselves judged. Commonly none are more censured, than those who are most censorious; and no mercy shall be shown to the reputation of those that show no mercy to the reputation of others. Yet that is not the worst of it; they shall be judged of God; from him they shall receive the greater condemnation, James iii. 1. Both parties must appear before him (Rom. xiv. 10), who, as he will relieve the humble sufferer, will also resist the haughty scorner, and give him enough of judging. (2) That if we be modest and charitable in our censures of others, and decline judging them, and judge ourselves rather, we shall not be judged of the Lord. As God will forgive those that forgive their brethren; so he will not judge those that will not judge their brethren; the merciful shall find mercy.

The judging of those that judge others is according to the law of retaliation; With what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged, v. 2. The righteous God, in his judgments, often observes a rule of proportion. With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again; perhaps in this world, so that men may read their sin in their punishment. What would become of us, if God should be as exact and severe in judging us, as we are in judging our brethren; if he should weigh us in the same balance? We may justly expect it, if we be extreme to mark what our brethren do amiss. In this, as in other things, the violent dealings of men return upon their own heads.

II. Some cautions about reproving. Because we must not judge others, which is a great sin, it does not therefore follow that we must not reprove others, which is a great duty, and may be a means of saving a soul from death.

1. It is not everyone who is fit to reprove. Those who are themselves guilty of the same faults of which they accuse others, or of worse, bring shame upon themselves, and are not likely to do good to those whom they reprove, v. 3–5. Here is,

(1) A just reproof to the censorious, who quarrel with their brother for small faults, while they allow themselves in great ones; who are quick-sighted to spy a mote in his eye, but are not sensible of a beam in their own. [1] There are degrees in sin: some sins are comparatively but as motes, others as beams; some as a gnat, others as a camel: not that there is any sin little, for there is no little God to sin against. [2] Our own sins ought to appear greater to us than the same sins in others, for the sins of others must be extenuated, but our own aggravated. [3] There are many that have beams in their own eyes, and yet do not consider it. They are under the guilt and dominion of very great sins, and yet are not aware of it, but justify themselves, as if they needed no repentance nor reformation. With great assurance, they say, We see. [4] It is common for those who are most sinful themselves, and least sensible of it, to be most forward and free in judging and censuring others. Pride and uncharitableness are commonly beams in the eyes of those that pretend to be critical and nice in their censures of others. Nay, many are guilty of that in secret, which they have the face to punish in others when it is discovered. [5] Men's being so severe upon the faults of others, while they are indulgent of their own, is a mark of hypocrisy. Thou hypocrite, v. 5. Whatever such a one may pretend, it is certain that he is no enemy to sin (if he were, he would be an enemy to his own sin), and therefore he is not worthy of praise. This spiritual charity must begin at home; "For how canst thou say, how canst thou for shame say, to thy brother, Let me help to reform thee, when thou takest no care to reform thyself? [6] The consideration of what is amiss in ourselves, though it ought not to keep us from administering friendly reproof, ought to keep us from magisterial censuring.

(2) Here is a good rule for reprovers, v. 5. Go in the right method, first cast the beam out of thine own eye. Our own badness is so far from excusing us in not reproving, that our being by it rendered unfit to reprove is an aggravation of our badness. A man's *of*fence will never be his *de*fence: but I must first reform myself, that I may thereby help to reform my brother, and may qualify myself to reprove him. Those who blame others, ought to be blameless and harmless themselves. The snuffers of the sanctuary were to be of pure gold.

2. It is not everyone that is fit to be reproved; Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, v. 6. Our zeal against sin must be guided by discretion, and we must not go about to give instructions, counsels, and rebukes, much less comforts, to hardened scorners. Throw a pearl to a swine, and he will resent it, as if you threw a stone at him; therefore give not to dogs and swine (unclean creatures) holy things. Good counsel and reproof are a holy thing, and a pearl: they are ordinances of God, they are precious. Among the generation of the wicked, there are some that have so long walked in the way of sinners, that they have sat down in the seat of the scornful; they professedly hate and despise instruction, and set it at defiance. Reproofs of instruction are ill bestowed upon such, and expose the reprover to all the contempt and mischief that may be expected from dogs and swine. Those are to be reckoned such, who hate reproofs and reprovers, and fly in the face of those who, in kindness to their souls, show them their sin and danger. These sin against the remedy; who shall heal and help those that will not be healed and helped? It is not meet to take the children's bread, and cast it to the dogs. Yet we must be very cautious whom we condemn as dogs and swine. Many a patient is lost, by being thought to be so, who, if means had been used, might have been saved. Our Lord Jesus is very tender of the safety of his people, and would not have them needlessly to expose themselves to the fury of those that will turn again and rend them.

Verses 7–11

Our Saviour, in the foregoing chapter, had spoken of prayer as a commanded duty, by which God is honoured. Here he speaks of it as the appointed means of obtaining what we need.

I. Here is a precept in three words to the same purport, Ask, Seek, Knock (v. 7); that is, in one word, "Pray; pray, and pray again. Ask, as a beggar asks alms." Those that would be rich in grace, must betake themselves to the poor trade of begging, and they shall find it a thriving trade. "Ask; represent your wants and burthens to God. Ask as a traveller asks the way; to pray is to enquire of God (Ezek. xxxvi. 37). Seek as for a thing of value that we have lost. Seek by prayer (Dan. ix. 3). Knock, as he that desires to enter into the house knocks at the door." Sin has shut and barred the door against us; by prayer, we knock; Lord, Lord, open to us. Christ knocks at our door (Rev. iii. 20; Cant. v. 2); and allows us to knock at his, which is a favour we do not allow to common beggars. Seeking and knocking imply something more than asking and praying. We must not only ask but seek; we must second our prayers with our endeavours; we must, in the use of the appointed means, seek for that which we ask for, else we tempt God. We must not only ask, but knock; we must come to God's door, must ask importunately; not only pray, but plead and wrestle with God.

II. Here is a promise annexed: our labour in prayer, if indeed we do labour in it, shall not be in vain: where God finds a praying heart, he will be found a prayer-hearing God; he shall give thee an answer of peace.

1. The promise is made, and made so as exactly to answer the precept, v. 7. God will meet those that attend on him; Ask, and it shall be given you; not lent you, not sold you, but given you; and what is more free than gift? It is but ask and have; ye have not, because ye ask not, or ask not aright: what is not worth asking, is not worth having, and then it is worth nothing. Seek, and ye shall find, and then you do not lose your labour; God is himself found of those that seek him, and if we find him we have enough. "Knock, and it shall be opened; the door of mercy and grace shall no longer be shut against you as enemies and intruders, but opened to you as friends and children. If the door be not opened at the first knock, continue instant in prayer; it is an affront to a friend to knock at his door, and then go away; though he tarry, yet wait."

2. It is repeated, v. 8. It is to the same purport, yet with some addition. It is made to extend to all that pray aright. Everyone that asketh, receiveth, whether Jew or Gentile, high or low, they are all alike welcome to the throne of grace, if they come in faith: for God is no respecter of persons. It is made in words of the present tense, which is more than a promise for the future. Everyone that asketh, not only shall receive, but receiveth; so sure and inviolable are the promises of God, that they do, in effect, give present possession. What we have in hope, according to the promise, is as sure, and should be as sweet, as what we have in hand. Conditional grants become absolute upon the performance of the condition; so here, he that asketh, receiveth.

3. It is illustrated, by a similitude taken from earthly parents, and their innate readiness to give their children what they ask, Christ appeals to his hearers, What man is there of you, though ever so morose and ill-humoured, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? v. 9, 10. Whence he infers (v. 11), If ye then, being evil, yet grant your children's requests, much more will your heavenly Father give you the good things you ask. Now this is of use,

(1) To direct our prayers and expectations. We must come to God, as children to a Father in heaven. How naturally does the child in want or distress run to the father with its complaints. We must come to him for good things, for those he gives to them that ask him. He knows what is good for us, we must therefore leave it with him; Father, thy will be done. We often ask that of God which would do us hurt if we had it; he knows this, and therefore does not give it to us. Denials in love are better than grants in anger; we should have been undone ere this if we had had all we desired.

(2) To encourage our prayers and expectations. We may hope that we shall not be denied and disappointed: we shall not have a stone for bread, to break our teeth (though we have a hard crust to employ our teeth), nor a serpent for a fish, to sting us. God has put into the hearts of parents a compassionate inclination to succour and supply their children, according to their need. No law was ever thought necessary to oblige parents to maintain their legitimate children. He has assumed the relation of a Father to us, and owns us for his children. He compares his concern for his people to that of a father for his children (Ps. ciii. 13), nay, to that of a mother, which is usually more tender, Isa. lxvi. 13; xlix. 14, 15. But here it is supposed, that his love, and tenderness, and goodness, far excel that of any earthly parent; and therefore it is argued with a much more. Our earthly fathers have taken care of us; we have taken care of our children; much more will God take care of his. And, First, God is more knowing; parents are often foolishly fond, but God is wise, infinitely so. Secondly, God is more kind. All the compassions of all the tender fathers in the world compared with the tender mercies of our God, would be but as a candle to the sun, or a drop to the ocean. God is more rich, and more ready to give to his children than the fathers of our flesh can be.

Our Lord Jesus here presses upon us that righteousness towards men which is an essential branch of true religion, and that religion towards God which is an essential branch of universal righteousness.

I. We must make righteousness our rule, and be ruled by it, v. 12. Therefore, lay this down for your principle, to do as you would be done by; that you may have the benefit of the foregoing promises. Fitly is the law of justice subjoined to the law of prayer, for unless we be honest in our conversation, God will not hear our prayers, Isa. i. 15–17; lviii. 6, 9; Zech. vii. 9, 13. We cannot expect to receive good things from God, if we do not fair things, and that which is honest, and lovely, and of good report among men.

1. The rule of justice laid down; Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do you even so to them. Christ came to teach us, not only what we are to know and believe, but what we are to do; what we are to do, not only toward God, but toward men. The golden rule of equity is, to do to others as we would they should do to us. We must not do to others the evil they have done to us, nor the evil which they would do to us, if it were in their power; but what we desire should be done to us. This is grounded upon that great commandment, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. As we must bear the same affection to our neighbour that we would have borne to ourselves, so we must do the same good offices. We must do that to our neighbour which we ourselves acknowledge to be fit and reasonable. We may fear, lest God by his judgments should do to us as we have done to others, if we have not done as we would be done by.

2. A reason given to enforce this rule; This is the law and the prophets. It is the summary of that second great commandment, which is one of the two, on which hang all the law and the prophets, ch. xxii. 40. We have not this in so many words, either in the law or the prophets, but it is the concurring language of the whole. Christ has here adopted it into this law; so that both the Old Testament and the New agree in prescribing this to us, to do as we would be done by.

II. We must make religion our business, and be intent upon it. Observe here,

1. The account that is given of the bad way of sin, and the good way of holiness. There are but two ways, right and wrong, good and evil; the way to heaven, and the way to hell; in one of which we are all of us walking: no middle place hereafter, no middle way now.

Here is, (1) An account given us of the way of sin and sinners; both what is the best, and what is the worst of it. That which allures multitudes into it, and keeps them in it; the gate is wide, and the way broad, and there are many travellers in that way. First, "You will have abundance of liberty, in that way. You may go in at this gate with all your lusts about you; it gives no check to your appetites, to your passions: you may walk in the way of your heart, and in the sight of your eyes." There is choice of sinful ways, contrary to each other, but all paths in this broad way. Secondly, "You will have abundance of company in that way: many there be that go in at this gate, and walk in this way." If we follow the multitude, it will be to do evil: if we go with the crowd, it will be the wrong way. It is natural for us to incline to go down the stream, and do as the most do. If many perish, we should be the more cautious. That which should affright us all from it, is that it leads to destruction. Whether it be the high way of open profaneness, or the back way of close hypocrisy, if it be the way of sin, it will be our ruin, if we repent not.

(2) Here is an account given us of the way of holiness. What there is in it that frightens many from it. Christ deals faithfully with us, and tells us,

First, That the gate is strait. Conversion and regeneration are the gate, by which we enter into this way. Out of a state of sin into a state of grace we must pass, by the new birth, John iii. 3, 5. This is a strait gate, hard to find, and hard to get through; like a passage between two rocks, 1 Sam. xiv. 4. There must be a new heart, and a new spirit, and old things must pass away. The bent of the soul must be changed. We must swim against the stream; much opposition must be struggled with, and broken through from without, and from within. It is easier to set a man against all the world than against himself, and yet this must be in conversion. It is a strait gate, for we must stoop, or we cannot go in at it; we must become as little children; we must deny ourselves, put off the world, put off the old man; we must be willing to forsake all for our interest in Christ. The gate is strait to all, but to some straiter than to others; as to the rich. The gate is strait; blessed be God, it is not shut up, nor locked against us, nor kept with a flaming sword, as it will be shortly, ch. xxv. 10.

Secondly, That the way is narrow. We are not in heaven as soon as we have got through the strait gate, no, we must go through a wilderness, must travel a narrow way, hedged in by the divine law, which is exceedingly broad, and that makes the way narrow; self must be denied; daily temptations must be resisted; duties must be done that are against our inclination. We must endure hardness, must wrestle and be in an agony, must watch in all things, and walk with care and circumspection. We must go through much tribulation. It is a way hedged about with thorns; blessed be God, it is not hedged up. But, as the understanding and will grow more and more sound, it will open and enlarge, and grow more and more pleasant.

Thirdly, The gate being so strait and the way so narrow, it is not strange that there are but few that find it, and choose it. Many pass it by, through carelessness; they will not be at the pains to find it; they are well as they are, and see no need to change their way. Others look upon it, but shun it; they like not to be so limited and restrained. Those that are going to heaven are but few. This discourages many: they are loth to be singular, to be solitary. However, instead of stumbling at this, say rather, If so few are going to heaven, there shall be more room for me. Let us see what there is in this way, which, notwithstanding this, should invite us all to it; it leads to life, to present comfort in the favour of God, which is the life of the soul; to eternal bliss, the hope of which, at the end of our way, should reconcile us to all the difficulties and inconveniences of the road. The gate is strait and the way narrow and uphill, but one hour in heaven will make amends for all.

2. The great concern and duty of every one of us, in consideration of all this; Enter ye in at the strait gate. The matter is fairly stated; life and death, good and evil, are set before us; both the ways, and both the ends. Choose you this day which you will walk in; nay, the matter determines itself, and will not admit of a debate. Delay not, therefore; deliberate not any longer, but enter ye in at the strait gate; knock at it by sincere and constant prayers and endeavours, and it shall be opened. It is true, we can neither go in, or go on, without the assistance of divine grace; but it is as true, that grace is freely offered, and shall not be wanting to those that seek it, and submit to it.

We have here a caution against false prophets, to take heed that we be not deceived and imposed upon by them. Prophets are properly such as foretell things to come; there are some mentioned in the Old Testament, who pretended to that without warrant, and the event disproved their pretensions. But prophets did also teach the people their duty, so that false prophets here are false teachers.

They are false teachers and false prophets, 1. Who produce false commissions, who pretend to have immediate warrant and direction from God to set up for prophets, and to be divinely inspired, when they are not so. 2. Who preach false doctrine in those things that are essential to religion; who teach that which is contrary to the truth as it is in Jesus. Beware of them, suspect them, try them, and when you have discovered their falsehood, avoid them, having nothing to do with them.

I. A good reason for this caution, Beware of them, for they are wolves in sheep's clothing, v. 15.

1. We have need to be very cautious, because their pretences are very fair and plausible, and such as will deceive us, if we be not upon our guard. They come in sheep's clothing, in the habit of prophets. We must take heed of being imposed upon by men's dress and garb. Or it may be taken figuratively; they pretend to be sheep, and outwardly appear so innocent, harmless, meek, useful, and all that is good, as to be excelled by none. They and their errors are gilded with the specious pretences of sanctity and devotion. Satan turns himself into an angel of light, 2 Cor. xi. 13, 14.

2. Because under these pretensions their designs are very malicious and mischievous; inwardly they are ravening wolves. Every hypocrite is a goat in sheep's clothing; but a false prophet is a wolf in sheep's clothing. Those that would cheat us of any truth, and possess us with error, whatever they pretend, design mischief to our souls. Paul calls them grievous wolves, Acts xx. 29. Now since it is so easy a thing, and withal so dangerous, to be cheated, Beware of false prophets.

II. Here is a good rule to go by in this caution; we must prove all things (1 Thess. v. 21); ye shall know them by their fruits, v. 16–20. Observe,

1. The illustration of this comparison, of the fruit's being the discovery of the tree. You cannot always distinguish them by their bark and leaves, nor by the spreading of their boughs, but by their fruits ye shall know them. The fruit is according to the tree. Christ insists upon this, the agreeableness between the fruit and the tree. If you know what the tree is, you may know what fruit to expect. Never look to gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles; it is not in their nature to produce such fruits. [1] Corrupt, vicious, unsanctified hearts are like thorns and thistles, which came in with sin, are worthless, vexing, and for the fire at last. [2] Good works are good fruit, like grapes and figs, pleasing to God and profitable to men. [3] This good fruit is never to be expected from bad men, any more than a clean thing out of an unclean. On the other hand, if you know what the fruit is, you may, by that, perceive what the tree is. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit; and a corrupt tree cannot bring forth good fruit. But then that must be reckoned the fruit of the tree which it brings forth naturally, plentifully and constantly and which is its usual product. Men are known, not by particular acts, but by the course and tenor of their conversation, and by the more frequent acts.

2. The application of this to the false prophets.

(1) By way of terror and threatening (v. 19); Every tree that brings not forth good fruit is hewn down. This very saying John the Baptist had used, ch. iii. 10. Christ could have spoken the same sense in other words; but he thought it no disparagement to him to say the same that John had said before him. To write and speak the same things must not be grievous, for it is safe. Note the description of barren trees; they are trees that do not bring forth good fruit; though there be fruit, if it be not good fruit, the tree is accounted barren. Note also the doom of barren trees: they are, that is, certainly they shall be, hewn down, and cast into the fire; God will deal with them as men deal with dry trees that cumber the ground.

(2) By way of trial; By their fruits ye shall know them.

[1] By the fruits of their persons, their words and actions, and the course of their conversation. If you would know whether they be right or not, observe how they live; their works will testify for them or against them. Those are not taught nor sent of the holy God, whose lives evidence that they are led by the unclean spirit. God puts the treasure into earthen vessels, but not into such corrupt vessels.

[2] By the fruits of their doctrine; their fruits as prophets. What do they tend to? What affections and practices will they lead those into, that embrace them? If the doctrine be of God, it will tend to promote serious piety, humility, charity, holiness, and love, with other Christian graces; but if, on the contrary, the doctrines these prophets preach have a manifest tendency to make people proud, worldly, and contentious, unjust or uncharitable, and take people off from governing themselves and their families by the strict rules of the narrow way, we may conclude, that this persuasion comes not of him that calleth us, Gal. v. 8. This wisdom is not from above, James iii. 15. Faith and a good conscience are held together, 1 Tim. i. 19; iii. 9.

Verses 21–29

We have here the conclusion of this long and excellent sermon, the scope of which is to show the indispensable necessity of obedience to the commands of Christ.

I. He shows, by a plain remonstrance, that an outward profession of religion, however remarkable, will not bring us to heaven, unless there be a correspondent conversation, v. 21–23.

1. Christ's law laid down, v. 21. Not every one that saith, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, into the kingdom of grace and glory. Christ here shows, It will not suffice to say, Lord, Lord; in word and tongue to own Christ for our Master, and to make address to him, and professions of him accordingly. But can we imagine that this is enough to bring us to heaven, or that he who knows and requires the heart should be so put off with shows for substance? Compliments among men are pieces of civility that are returned with compliments, but they are never paid as real services: and can they then be of any account with Christ? This is not to take us off from saying, Lord, Lord; from professing Christ's name, and being bold in professing it, but from resting in these, in the form of godliness, without the power. It is necessary to our happiness that we do the will of Christ, which is indeed the will of his Father in heaven. Now this is his will, that we believe in Christ, that we repent of sin, that we live a holy life, that we love one another. This is his will, even our sanctification. Saying and doing are two things, often parted in the conversation of men: he that said, I go, sir, stirred never a step (ch. xxi. 30); but these two things God has joined in his command.

2. The hypocrite's plea against the strictness of this law, offering other things in lieu of obedience, v. 22. They put in their plea with great importunity, Lord, Lord; and with great confidence, appealing to Christ concerning it; Lord, dost not thou know, (1) That we have prophesied in thy name? Yes, it may be so; Balaam and Caiaphas were overruled to prophesy, and Saul was against his will among the prophets, yet that did not save them. These prophesied in his name, but he did not send them; they only made use of his name to serve a turn. (2) That in thy name we have cast out devils? That may be too; Judas cast out devils, and yet was a son of perdition. A man might cast devils out of others, and yet have a devil, nay, and be a devil himself. (3) That in thy name we have done many wonderful works. Gifts of tongues and healing would recommend men to the world, but it is real holiness or sanctification that is accepted of God. Grace and love are a more excellent way than removing mountains, or speaking with the tongues of men and of angels, 1 Cor. xiii. 1, 2. Grace will bring a man to heaven without working miracles, but working miracles will never bring a man to heaven without grace. They had not many good works to plead; they could not pretend to have done many gracious works of piety and charity; one such would have passed better in their account than many wonderful works. Miracles have now ceased, and with them this plea; but do not carnal hearts still encourage themselves in their groundless hopes, with the like vain supports? Let us take heed of resting in external privileges and performances, lest we deceive ourselves.

3. The rejection of this plea as frivolous. The same that is the Law-Maker (v. 21) is here the Judge according to that law (v. 23). I never knew you, and therefore depart from me, ye that work iniquity.— Observe, (1) Why, and upon what ground, he rejects them and their plea—because they were workers of iniquity. It is possible for men to have a great name for piety, and yet to be workers of iniquity; and those that are so will receive the greater damnation. (2) How it is expressed; I never knew you. This intimates, that if he had ever known them, as the Lord knows them that are his, had ever owned them and loved them as his, he would have known them, and owned them, and loved them, to the end; but he never did know them, for he always knew them to be hypocrites. Those that go no further in Christ's service than a bare profession, he does not accept, nor will he own them in the great day. See from what a height of hope men may fall into the depth of misery! How they may go to hell, by the gates of heaven! At God's bar, a profession of religion will not bear out any man in the practice and indulgence of sin; therefore let every one that names the name of Christ, depart from all iniquity.

II. He shows, by a parable, that hearing these sayings of Christ will not make us happy, if we do not make conscience of doing them; but that if we hear them and do them, we are blessed in our deed, v. 24–27.

1. The hearers of Christ's word are here divided into two sorts: some that hear, and do what they hear; others that hear and do not.

(1) Some that hear his sayings and do them: blessed be God that there are any such, though comparatively few. To hear Christ is not barely to give him the hearing, but to obey him. It is a mercy that we hear his sayings: Blessed are those ears, ch. xiii. 16, 17. But, if we practise not what we hear, we receive that grace in vain. All the sayings of Christ, not only the laws he has enacted, but the truths he has revealed, must be done by us. It is not enough to hear Christ's sayings, and understand them, hear them, and remember them, hear them, and talk of them, repeat them, dispute for them; but we must hear, and do them. This do, and thou shalt live. Those only that hear, and do, are blessed (Luke xi. 28; John xiii. 17), and are akin to Christ (ch. xii. 50).

(2) There are others who hear Christ's sayings and do them not; their religion rests in bare hearing, and goes no further. They hear God's words, as if they desired to know his ways, like a people that did righteousness, but they will not do them, Ezek. xxxiii. 30, 31; Isa. lviii. 2. The seed is sown, but it never comes up. Those who only hear Christ's sayings, and do them not, sit down in the midway to heaven, and that will never bring them to their journey's end.

2. These two sorts of hearers are here represented in their true characters, and the state of their case, under the comparison of two builders; one was wise, and built upon a rock, and his building stood in a storm; the other foolish, and built upon the sand, and his building fell. The general scope of this parable teaches us that the only way to make sure work for our souls and eternity, is to hear and do the sayings of the Lord Jesus. They make sure the good part, who, like Mary, when they hear the word of Christ, sit at his feet in subjection to it: Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth. The particular parts of it teach us divers good lessons. (1) That we have everyone a house to build, and that house is our hope for heaven. It ought to be our chief and constant care, to make our calling and election sure. Many never mind this: it is the furthest thing from their thoughts; they are building for this world, as if they were to be here always, but take no care to build for another world. All who take upon them a profession of religion, profess to enquire, what they shall do to be saved; how they may get to heaven at last, and may have a well-grounded hope of it in the meantime. (2) That there is a rock provided for us to build this house upon, and that rock is Christ. He is our Hope, 1 Tim. i, 1.

Christ in us is so; we must ground our hopes of heaven upon the fulness of Christ's merit, for the pardon of sin, the power of his Spirit, for the sanctification of our nature, and the prevalency of his intercession, for the conveyance of all that good which he has purchased for us. The church is built upon his Rock, and so is every believer. He is strong and immovable as a rock; we may venture our all upon him, and shall not be made ashamed of our hope. (3) That there is a remnant, who by hearing and doing the sayings of Christ, build their hopes upon this Rock. Those build upon Christ, who make it their constant care to conform to all the rules of his holy religion, and therein depend entirely upon him for assistance from God, and acceptance with him, and count every thing but loss and dung that they may win Christ, and be found in him. Building upon a rock requires care and pains: they that would make their calling and election sure, must give diligence. They are wise builders who begin to build so as they may be able to finish (Luke xiv. 30), and therefore lay a firm foundation. (4) That there are many who profess that they hope to go to heaven, but despise this Rock, and build their hopes upon the sand. Everything besides Christ is sand. Some build their hopes upon their worldly prosperity, as if that were a sure token of God's favour, Hos. xii. 8. Others upon their external profession of religion. They are called Christians, were baptized, go to church, hear Christ's word, say their prayers, and do nobody any harm; but it is all sand, too weak to bear such a fabric as our hopes of heaven. (5) That there is a storm coming, that will try what our hopes are bottomed on. Rain, and floods, and wind, will beat upon the house; the trial is sometimes in this world; when tribulation and persecution arise because of the word, then it will be seen, who only heard the word, and who heard and practised it. However, when death and judgment come, then the storm comes. Then everything else will fail us but these hopes, and then, if ever, they will be turned into everlasting fruition. (6) That those hopes which are built upon Christ the Rock will stand, and will stand the builder in stead when the storm comes. His comforts will not fail; they will be his strength and song, as an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast. When he comes to the last encounter, those hopes will take off the terror of death and the grave; will be approved by the Judge; will stand the test of the great day; and will be crowned with endless glory, 2 Cor. i. 12; 2 Tim. iv. 7, 8. (7) That those hopes which foolish builders ground upon anything but Christ, will certainly fail them on a stormy day. He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand, Job. viii. 14, 15. It fell in the storm, when the builder had most need of it, and expected it would be a shelter to him. It was a great disappointment to the builder; the shame and loss were great. The higher men's hopes have been raised, the lower they fall. It is the sorest ruin of all that attends formal professors.

III. In the two last verses, we are told what impressions Christ's discourse made upon the auditory. They were astonished at his doctrine; it is to be feared that few of them were brought by it to follow him: but for the present, they were filled with wonder. It is possible for people to admire good preaching, and yet to remain in ignorance and unbelief; to be astonished, and yet not sanctified. The reason was because he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes. The scribes pretended to as much authority as any teachers whatsoever, and were supported by all the external advantages that could be obtained. They spake as those that were not themselves masters of what they preached: the word did not come from them with any life or force; they delivered it as a schoolboy says his lesson; but Christ delivered his discourse, as a judge gives his charge. His lessons were laws; his word a word of command. Christ, upon the mountain, showed more true authority than the scribes in Moses' seat. Thus when Christ teaches by his Spirit in the soul, he teaches with authority. He says, Let there be light, and there is light.

CHAP. VIII

The evangelist proceeds now to give some instances of the miracles he wrought. I. Christ's cleansing of a leper, ver. 1–4. II. His curing a palsy and fever, ver. 5–18. III. His communing with two that were disposed to follow him, ver. 19–22. IV. His controlling the tempest, ver. 23–27. V. His casting out devils, ver. 28–34.

Verses 1–4

The people that heard him were astonished at his doctrine; and the effect was, that when he came down from the mountain, great multitudes followed him. They to whom Christ has manifested himself, cannot but desire to be better acquainted with him. They who know much of Christ should covet to know more. It is pleasing to see people so well affected to Christ, as to think they can never hear enough of him. Yet they who gathered to him did not cleave to him. They who followed him closely and constantly were but few, compared with the multitudes that were but followers at large.

In these verses we have an account of Christ's cleansing a leper. This is fitly recorded with the first of Christ's miracles, 1. Because the leprosy was looked upon, among the Jews, as a particular mark of God's displeasure; and therefore Christ, to show that he came to turn away the wrath of God, by taking away sin, began with the cure of a leper. 2. Because this disease, as it was supposed to come immediately from the hand of God, so also it was supposed to be removed immediately by his hand, and therefore it was not attempted to be cured by physicians, but was put under the inspection of the priests, the Lord's ministers, who waited to see what God would do. Christ proved himself God, by recovering many from the leprosy, and authorizing his disciples, in his name, to do so too (ch. x. 8), and it is put among the proofs of his being, the Messiah, ch. xi. 5. He also showed himself to be the Saviour of his people from their sins; for though every disease is both the fruit of sin, and a figure of it, as the disorder of the soul, yet the leprosy was in a special manner so. It is treated, not as a sickness, but as an uncleanness; the priest was to pronounce the party clean or unclean, according to the indications: but the honour of making the lepers clean was reserved for Christ. The law discovered sin (for by the law is the knowledge of sin), and pronounced sinners unclean; but could go no further; it could not make the comers thereunto perfect. But Christ takes away sin; cleanses us from it.

I. The leper's address to Christ. We may suppose that the leper, though shut out by his disease from the cities of Israel, yet got within hearing of Christ's sermon, and was encouraged by it to make his application to him; for he that taught as one having authority, could heal so. His address is, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean. The cleansing of him may be considered.

1. As a temporal mercy; a mercy to the body. And so it directs us, not only to apply ourselves to Christ, but it also teaches us in what manner to apply ourselves to him; with an assurance of his power, but with a submission to his will; Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst. His promise of them is limited by a regard to his glory and our good: when we cannot be sure of his will, we may be sure of his wisdom and mercy, to which we may cheerfully refer ourselves; Thy will be done.

2. As a typical mercy. Sin is the leprosy of the soul; it shuts us out from communion with God, it is necessary that we be cleansed from this leprosy. Now, observe, It is our comfort when we apply ourselves to Christ, as the great Physician, that if he will, he can make us clean; and we should, with an humble, believing boldness, go to him and tell him so. (1) We must rest ourselves upon his power; we must be confident of this, that Christ can make us clean. (2) We must recommend ourselves to his pity; we cannot demand it as a debt, but we must humbly request it as a favour; "Lord, if thou wilt. I throw myself at thy feet, and if I perish, I will perish there."

II. Christ's answer to this address, which was very kind, v. 3.

1. He put forth his hand and touched him. The leprosy was a noisome, loathsome disease, yet Christ touched him. There was a ceremonial pollution contracted by the touch of a leper; but Christ would show, that when he conversed with sinners, he was in no danger of being infected by them.

2. He said, I will, be thou clean. He did not put him upon a tedious, troublesome, chargeable course of physic, but spake the word and healed him. (1) Here is a word of kindness, I will; I am as willing to help thee, as thou art to be helped. Christ is a Physician, that does not need to be sought for, he is always in the way; does not need to be urged, while we are yet speaking, he hears; does not need to be paid, he heals, freely, not for price nor reward. He is as willing as he is able to save sinners. (2) A word of power, Be thou clean. Both a power of authority, and a power of energy, are exerted in this word. Christ heals by a word of command to us; Be thou clean. But there goes along with this a word of command concerning us, a word that does the work; I will that thou be clean. The Almighty grace which speaks it, shall not be wanting to those who truly desire it.

III. The happy change hereby wrought: Immediately his leprosy was cleansed. Nature works gradually, but the God of nature works immediately; he speaks, it is done.

IV. The after-directions Christ gave him. It is fit that they who are cured by Christ should ever after be ruled by him.

1. See thou tell no man; "Tell no man till thou hast shown thyself to the priest, and he has pronounced thee clean; and so thou hast a legal proof, both that thou wast before a leper, and art now thoroughly cleansed." Christ would have his miracles to appear in their full light and evidence, and not to be published till they could appear so.

2. Go show thyself to the priest, according to the law, Lev. xiv. 2. Christ took care to have the law observed, lest he should give offence, and to show that he will have order kept up, and good discipline and respect paid to those that are in office.

3. Offer the gift that Moses commanded, in token of thankfulness to God, and recompense to the priest for his pains; and this for a testimony unto them. It shall be a testimony, that there is one among them who does that which the high priest cannot do. Let it remain upon record as a witness of my power, and a testimony for me to them, if they will use it and improve it; but against them, if they will not.

Verses 5–13

We have here an account of Christ's curing the centurion's servant of a palsy. This was done at Capernaum, where Christ now dwelt, ch. iv. 13. Christ went about doing good, and came home to do good too; every place he came to was the better for him.

The persons Christ had now to do with were,

1. A centurion; he was a supplicant, a Gentile, a Roman, an officer of the army. Though he was a soldier (and a little piety commonly goes a great way with men of that profession), yet he was a godly man. God has his remnant among all sorts of people. No man's calling or place in the world will be an excuse for his unbelief and impiety. And sometimes where grace conquers the unlikely, it is more than a conqueror. Though he was a Roman soldier, and his very dwelling among the Jews was a badge of their subjection to the Roman yoke, yet Christ, who was King of the Jews, favoured him; and therein has taught us to do good to our enemies. Though he was a Gentile, yet Christ countenanced him. Now good old Simeon's word began to be fulfilled, that he should be a light to lighten the Gentiles, as well as the glory of his people Israel. The leprous Jews Christ touched and cured, for he preached personally to them; but the paralytic Gentiles he cured at a distance; for to them he did not go in person, but sent his word and healed them; yet in them he was more magnified.

2. The centurion's servant. He is as ready to heal the poorest servant, as the richest master; for himself took upon him the form of a servant, to show his regard to the meanest.

I. The grace of the centurion working towards Christ. Can any good thing come out of a Roman soldier? Come and see, and you will find abundance of good coming out of this centurion.

1. His affectionate address to Jesus Christ, which speaks,

(1) A pious regard to our great Master, as one able and willing to succour and relieve poor petitioners. He came to him beseeching him with cap in hand as a humble suitor. By this it seems that he saw more in Christ than appeared at first view; saw that which commanded respect. The greatest of men must turn beggars, when they have to do with Christ. He owns Christ's sovereignty, in calling him Lord, and referring the case to him, and to his will, and wisdom. He knew he had to do with a wise and gracious Physician, to whom the opening of the malady was equivalent to the most earnest request. A humble confession of our spiritual wants and diseases shall not fail of an answer of peace. Pour out thy complaint, and mercy shall be poured out.

(2) A charitable regard to his poor servant. We read of many that came to Christ for their children, but this is the only instance of one that came to him for a servant: Lord, my servant lieth at home sick. It is the duty of masters to concern themselves for their servants, when they are in affliction. The servant could not have done more for the master, than the master did here for the servant. The centurion's servants were very dutiful to him (v. 9), and here we see what made them so; he was very kind to them, and that made them the more cheerfully obedient to him. The palsy is a disease in which the physician's skill commonly fails; it was therefore a great evidence of his faith in the power of Christ, to come to him for a cure, which was above the power of natural means to effect. Observe, How pathetically he represents his servant's case as very sad; he is sick of the palsy, a disease which commonly makes the patient senseless of pain, but this person was grievously tormented. We should thus concern ourselves for the souls of our children, and servants, that are spiritually sick of the palsy, and bring them to Christ by faith and prayer, bring them to the means of healing and health.

2. Observe his great humility and self-abasement. After Christ had intimated his readiness to come and heal his servant (v. 7), he expressed himself with the more humbleness of mind. Humble souls are made more humble, by Christ's gracious condescensions to them. Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof (v. 8), which speaks mean thoughts of himself, and high thoughts of our Lord Jesus. He does not say, "My servant is not worthy that thou shouldst come into his chamber, because it is in the garret"; But I am not worthy that thou shouldst come into my house. The centurion was a great man, yet he owned his unworthiness before God. Humility very well becomes persons of quality. Christ now made but a mean figure in the world, yet the centurion paid him this respect. We should have a value and veneration for what we see of God, even in those who, in outward condition, are every way our inferiors. In all our approaches to Christ, and to God through Christ, it becomes us to abase ourselves, and to lie low in the sense of our own unworthiness.

3. Observe his great faith. The more humility the more faith. He had an assurance of faith not only that Christ could cure his servant, but,

(1) That he could cure him at a distance. There needed not any physical contact, as in natural operations, not any application to the part affected. We read afterwards of those, who brought the man sick of the palsy to Christ, through much difficulty, and set him before him; and Christ commended their faith for a working faith. This centurion did not bring his man sick of the palsy, and Christ commended his faith for a trusting faith: true faith is accepted of Christ, though variously appearing: Christ puts the best construction upon the different methods of religion that people take. Nearness and distance are alike to him. Distance of place cannot obstruct either the knowing or working of him that fills all places.

(2) That he could cure him with a word, not send him a medicine, much less a charm; but speak the word only, and I do not question but my servant shall be healed. Herein he owns him to have a divine power. With men, saying and doing are two things; but not so with Christ.

The centurion's faith in the power of Christ he here illustrates by the dominion he had, as a centurion, over his soldiers, as a master over his servants; he says to one, Go, and he goes, &c. They were all at his beck and command, so that he could by them execute things at a distance. Thus could Christ speak, and it is done. The centurion had this command over his soldiers, though he was himself a man under authority; much more had Christ this power, who is the supreme and sovereign Lord of all. Such servants we all should be to God: we must go and come at his bidding, according to the directions of his word, and the disposals of his providence. When his will crosses our own, his must take place, and our own be set aside. Such servants bodily diseases are to Christ. It is a matter of comfort to all that belong to Christ, that every disease is made to serve the intentions of his grace. They need not fear sickness, nor what it can do, who see it in the hand of so good a Friend.

II. Here is the grace of Christ appearing towards this centurion; for to the gracious he will show himself gracious.

1. He complies with his address at the first word. I will come and heal him (v. 7); not I will come and see him—that had evinced him a kind Saviour; but, I will come and heal him—that shows him a mighty, an almighty Saviour. He has healing under his wings; his coming is healing. The centurion desired he would heal his servant; he says, I will come and heal him; thus expressing more favour than he did either ask or think of. Christ often outdoes the expectations of poor supplicants. He would not go down to see a nobleman's sick child, who insisted upon his coming down (John iv. 47–49), but he proffers to go down to see a sick servant. Christ's humility in being willing to come, gave an example to him, and occasioned his humility, in owning himself unworthy to have him come. Christ's gracious condescensions to us, should make us the more humble and self-abasing before him.

2. He commends his faith, and takes occasion from it to speak a kind word of the poor Gentiles, v. 10–12.

(1) As to the centurion himself; he not only approved him and accepted him (that honour have all true believers), but he admired him and applauded him: that honour great believers have.

[1] Christ admired him, not for his greatness, but for his graces. When Jesus heard it, he marvelled; not as if it were to him new and surprising, but it was great and excellent, rare and uncommon, and Christ spoke of it as wonderful, to teach us what to admire; not worldly pomp and decorations, but the beauty of holiness. The wonders of grace should affect us more than the wonders of nature or providence, and spiritual attainments more than any achievements in this world.

[2] He applauded him in what he said to them that followed. Verily, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. Now this speaks, First, Honour to the centurion; who, though not a son of Abraham's loins, was an heir of Abraham's faith. The thing that Christ seeks is faith, and wherever it is, he finds it, though but as a grain of mustard seed. We must be forward, to give those their due praise, that are not within our denomination or pale. Secondly, It speaks shame to Israel. When the Son of man comes, he finds little faith, and, therefore, he finds so little fruit. Christ said this to those that followed him. They were Abraham's seed; in jealousy for that honour, let them not suffer themselves to be outstripped by a Gentile, especially in that grace for which Abraham was eminent.

(2) As to others. Christ tells them two things, which could not but be very surprising to them who had been taught that salvation was of the Jews.

[1] That a great many of the Gentiles should be saved, v. 11. The faith of the centurion was but a specimen of the conversion of the Gentiles. This was a topic our Lord Jesus touched often upon; he speaks with assurance; I say unto you, although an intimation of this kind enraged the Nazarenes against him, Luke iv. 27. Christ gives us here an idea, First, of the persons that shall be saved; many from the east and the west: he had said (ch. vii. 14), Few there be that find the way to life; and yet here many shall come. Few at one time, and in one place; yet, when they come altogether, they will be a great many. They shall come from the east and from the west; places far distant from each other; and yet they shall all meet at the right hand of Christ, the Centre of their unity. God has his remnant in all places. Though they were strangers to the covenant of promise now, and had been long, yet who knows what hidden ones God had among them then? When we come to heaven, as we shall miss a great many there, that we thought had been going thither, so we shall meet a great many there, that we did not expect. Secondly, Christ gives us an idea of the salvation itself. They shall come, shall come together, shall come together to Christ, 2 Thess. ii. 1. 1. They shall be admitted into the kingdom of grace on earth; they shall be blessed with faithful Abraham. This makes Zaccheus a son of Abraham, Luke xix. 9. 2. They shall be admitted into the kingdom of glory in heaven. They shall sit down to rest from their labours, as having done their day's work; sitting denotes continuance: while we stand, we are going; where we sit, we mean to stay; as at a table; that is the metaphor here; they shall sit down to be feasted; which denotes both fulness of communication, and freedom and familiarity of communion, Luke xxii. 30. They shall sit down with Abraham. They who in this world were ever so far distant from each other in time, place, or outward condition, shall all meet together in heaven. Holy society is a part of the felicity of heaven.

[2] That a great many of the Jews should perish, v. 12. Observe,

First, A strange sentence passed; The children of the kingdom shall be cast out; the kingdom of God, of which they boasted that they were the children, shall be taken from them. In the great day it will not avail men to have been children of the kingdom, either as Jews or as Christians; for men will then be judged, not by what they were called, but by what they were. Being born of professing parents denominates us children of the kingdom; but if we rest in that, and have nothing else to show for heaven but that, we shall be cast out.

Secondly, A strange punishment for the workers of iniquity described; They shall be cast into outer darkness, the darkness of those that are without. They shall be cast out from God, and all true comfort, and cast into darkness. It is utter darkness; without any remainder, or mixture, or hope, of light; not the least gleam or glimpse of it; it is darkness that results from their being shut out of heaven, the land of light.

3. He cures his servant. He grants him that for which he applied, which was a real answer, v. 13.

(1) What Christ said to him: he said that which made the cure as great a favour to him as it was to his servant, and much greater; As thou hast believed, so be it done to thee. The servant got a cure of his disease, but the master got the confirmation and approbation of his faith. Christ often gives encouraging answers to his praying people, when they are interceding for others. It is kindness to us, to be heard for others. Be it done as thou believest. What could he have more? Yet what was said to him is said to us all, Believe, and ye shall receive; only believe. See here the power of Christ, and the power of faith. As Christ can do what he will, so an active believer may have what he will from Christ.

(2) What was the effect of this saying: the prayer of faith was a prevailing prayer, it ever was so, and ever will be so; it appears, by the suddenness of the cure, that it was miraculous: he spake, and it was done; and this was a proof of his omnipotence, that he has a long arm.

I. A particular account of the cure of Peter's wife's mother, who was ill of a fever.

1. The case which was nothing extraordinary; it is recorded as an instance of Christ's peculiar care of, and kindness to, the families of his disciples. Here we find, (1) That Peter had a wife, and yet was called to be an apostle of Christ; and Christ countenanced the marriage state. (2) That Peter had a house, though Christ had not, v. 20. Thus was the disciple better provided for than his Lord. (3) That he had a house at Capernaum, though he was originally of Bethsaida; it is probable, he removed to Capernaum, when Christ removed thither, and made that his principal residence. It is worth while to change our quarters, that we may be near to Christ. (4) That he had his wife's mother with him in his family, which is an example to yoke-fellows to be kind to one another's relations as their own. Probably, this good woman was old, and yet was respected and taken care of, as old people ought to be, with all possible tenderness. (5) That she lay ill of a fever. The palsy was a chronic disease, the fever an acute disease, but both were brought to Christ.

2. The cure, v. 15. (1) How it was effected; He touched her hand; not to know the disease, as the physicians do, by the pulse, but to heal it. This was an intimation of his kindness and tenderness. The scripture speaks the word, the Spirit gives the touch, touches the heart, touches the hand. (2) How it was evidenced: this showed that the fever left her, she arose, and ministered to them. By this it appears, [1] That the mercy was perfected. They that recover from fevers by the power of nature are commonly weak and feeble. She was immediately so well as to go about the business of the house. [2] That the mercy was sanctified. Though she was thus dignified by a peculiar favour, yet she does not assume importance, but is as ready to wait at table, if there be occasion, as any servant. They must be humble whom Christ has honoured; being thus delivered, she studies what she shall render. It is very fit that they whom Christ hath healed should minister unto him, as his humble servants, all their days.

II. Here is a general account of the many cures that Christ wrought. This cure of Peter's mother-in-law brought him abundance of patients. "He healed such a one; why not me? Such a one's friend, why not mine?" Now we are here told,

1. What he did, v. 16. (1) He cast out devils; cast out the evil spirits with his word. About the time of Christ's being in the world, there seems to have been more than ordinary letting loose of the devil, to possess and vex the bodies of people; and God wisely ordered it so, that Christ might have the fairer and more frequent opportunities of showing his power over Satan. (2) He healed all that were sick; all without exception, though the patient was ever so mean, and the case ever so bad.

2. How the scripture was herein fulfilled, v. 17. Among other things, it was written of him (Isa. liii. 4), Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: it is referred to, 1 Peter ii. 24, and there it is construed, he hath borne our sins; here it is referred to, and is construed, he hath borne our sicknesses; our sins make our sicknesses our griefs; Christ bore away sin by the merit of his death, and bore away sickness by the miracles of his life. Many are the diseases and calamities to which we are liable in the body: and there is more, in this one line of the gospels, to support and comfort us under them, than in all the writings of the philosophers. He bore them for us in his passion, and bears them with us in compassion, being touched with the feeling of our infirmities: and thus he bears them off from us. Observe how emphatically it is expressed here: Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses; he was both able and willing to interpose in that matter, and concerned to deal with our infirmities and sicknesses, as our Physician.

Verses 18–22

I. Christ's removing to the other side of the sea of Tiberias, and his ordering his disciples, whose boats attended him, to get their transport-vessels ready, in order to it, v. 18. He must go about to do good; the necessities of souls called to him, Come over, and help us (Acts xvi. 9); he removed when he saw great multitudes about him. Though by this it appeared that they were desirous to have him there, he knew there were others as desirous to have him with them, and they must have their share of him: his being acceptable and useful in one place was no objection against, but a reason for, his going to another. Many would be glad of such helps, if they could have them at next door, who will not be at pains to follow them to the other side.

II. Christ's communication with two, who, upon his remove to the other side, were loth to stay behind, and had a mind to follow him, not as others, who were his followers at large, but to come into close discipleship, which the most were shy of.

We have here Christ's managing of two different tempers, one quick and eager, the other dull and heavy; and his instructions are adapted to each of them, and designed for our use.

1. Here is one that was too hasty in promising; and he was a certain scribe (v. 19), a scholar, a learned man, one of those that studied and expounded the law; generally we find them in the gospels to be men of no good character. They were very seldom following Christ; yet here was one that bid pretty fair for discipleship.

(1) How he expressed his forwardness; Master, I will follow thee, whithersoever thou goest. I know not how any man could have spoken better. His profession of a self-dedication to Christ is, [1] Very ready inclination: he is not called to it by Christ, of his own accord, he proffers himself to be a close follower of Christ; he is not a pressed man, but a volunteer. [2] Very resolute; he seems to be at a point in this matter. "I am determined, I will do it." [3] It was unlimited and without reserve. "I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest." Yet it appears, by Christ's answer, that his resolution was rash. There are many resolutions for religion, produced by some sudden pangs of conviction, and taken up without due consideration, that prove abortive, and come to nothing: soon ripe, soon rotten.

(2) How Christ tried his forwardness, whether it was sincere or not, v. 20. He let him know that this Son of man, whom he is so eager to follow, has not where to lay his head, v. 20. It is strange in itself, that the Son of God, when he came into the world, should put himself into such a very low condition, as to want the convenience of a certain resting-place. See here, First, How well provided for the inferior creatures are: The foxes have holes; their holes are their castles. The birds of the air, though they take no care for themselves, yet are taken care of, and have nests (Ps. civ. 17). Secondly, How poorly the Lord Jesus was provided for. He had not a settlement, had not a place of repose, not a house of his own, to put his head in, not a pillow of his own, to lay his head on. He and his disciples lived upon the charity of well-disposed people, that ministered to him of their substance, Luke viii. 2. Christ submitted to this that he might show us the vanity of worldly wealth, and teach us to look upon it with a holy contempt; that he might purchase better things for us, and so make us rich, 2 Cor. viii. 9. It is strange that such a declaration should be made on this occasion. One scribe might be capable of doing him more credit and service than twelve fishermen: but Christ saw his heart, and answered to the thoughts of that, and therein teaches us all how to come to Christ. First, The scribe's resolve seems to have been sudden; and Christ would have us, when we take upon us a profession of religion, to sit down and count the cost (Luke xiv. 28). It is no advantage to religion, to take men by surprise, ere they are aware. They that take up a profession in a pang, will throw it off again in a fret; let him that will follow Christ know the worst of it, and expect to lie hard, and fare hard. Secondly, His resolve seems to have been from a worldly, covetous principle. He saw what abundance of cures Christ wrought, and concluded that he had large fees, and would get an estate quickly. He is not for following Christ, unless he can get by him.

2. Here is another that was too slow in performing. Delay in execution is as bad, on the one hand, as precipitancy in resolution is on the other hand; let it never be said, we left that to be done tomorrow, which we could do today.

(1) The excuse that this disciple made, to defer an immediate attendance on Christ (v. 21); "Lord, suffer me first to go and bury my father." His father (some think) was now sick, or dying, or dead; others think, he was only aged, and not likely in a course of nature, to continue long. This seemed a reasonable request, and yet it was not right. He had not the zeal he should have had for the work, and therefore pleaded this, because it seemed a plausible plea. An unwilling mind never wants an excuse. The preference should have been given to Christ.

(2) Christ's disallowing of this excuse (v. 22); Jesus said to him, Follow me; and, no doubt, power accompanied this word to him, as to others, and he did follow Christ. We are brought to Christ by the force of his call to us, not of our promises to him. When Christ calls, he will overcome, and make the call effectual, 1 Sam. iii. 10. His excuse is laid aside as insufficient; Let the dead bury their dead. Let the dead spiritually bury the dead corporally; let worldly offices be left to worldly people; do not thou encumber thyself with them. Burying the dead, and especially a dead father, is a good work, but it is not thy work, at this time: thou hast something else to do, and must not defer that. Piety to God must be preferred before piety of parents, though that is a great and needful part of our religion. We must comparatively neglect and disesteem our nearest relations, when they come in competition with Christ, and either our doing for him, or our suffering for him.

Verses 23–27

Christ had given sailing orders to his disciples (v. 18), that they should depart to the other side of the sea of Tiberias. He chose to go by water. It had not been much about, if he had gone by land; but he chose to cross the lake. It is a comfort to those who go down to the sea in ships, and are often in perils there, to reflect that they have a Saviour to trust in and pray to, who knows what it is to be at sea, and to be in storms there. 2. His disciples followed him; the twelve kept close to him. They, and they only, will be found the true disciples of Christ, that are willing to go to sea with him, to follow him into dangers and difficulties. Many would be content to go the land-way to heaven, but those that would rest with Christ hereafter must follow him now wherever he leads them, into a ship or into a prison, as well as into a palace.

I. The peril and perplexity of the disciples in this voyage. Those who follow him must count upon difficulties, v. 20.

1. There arose a very great storm, v. 24. This storm was for their sakes, as John xi. 4. Christ would show that they who are passing with him over the ocean of this world to the other side, must expect storms by the way. It is only the upper region that enjoys a perpetual calm, this lower one is ever and anon disturbed and disturbing.

2. Jesus Christ was asleep in this storm. We never read of Christ's sleeping but at this time; this was a sleep, not of security, like Jonah's in a storm, but of holy serenity, and dependence upon his Father. He had no guilt, no fear within to disturb his repose. Those that can lay their heads upon the pillow of a clear conscience, may sleep quietly and sweetly in a storm (Ps. iv. 8), as Peter, Acts xii. 6. He slept at this time, to try the faith of his disciples, whether they could trust him when he seemed to slight them.

3. The poor disciples, though used to the sea, were in a great fright, and in their fear came to their Master, v. 25. Whither else should they go? It was well they had him so near them. They awoke him with their prayers; Lord, save us, we perish. They who would learn to pray must go to sea. Imminent and sensible dangers will drive people to him who alone can help in time of need. Their petition is, Lord, save us. They believed he could save them; they begged he would. Christ's errand into the world was to save, but those only shall be saved that call on the name of the Lord, Acts ii. 21. They call him, Lord, and then pray, Save us. Christ will save none but those that are willing to take him for their Lord. Their plea is, We perish; which was the language of their fear; they had received a sentence of death within themselves, and this they plead, "We perish, if thou dost not save us; look upon us therefore with pity." It was the language of their fervency. It becomes us thus to strive and wrestle in prayer; therefore Christ slept, that he might draw out this importunity.

II. The power and grace of Jesus Christ put forth for their succour. Christ may sleep when his church is in a storm, but he will not outsleep himself.

1. He rebuked the disciples (v. 26); Why are ye fearful, O ye of little faith? He does not chide them for disturbing him with their prayers, but for disturbing themselves with their fears. Christ reproved them first, and then delivered them. His dislike of their fears; "Why are ye fearful? Ye, my disciples?" His discovery of the cause and spring of their fears; O ye of little faith. Many that have true faith are weak in it, and it does but little. By faith we might see through the storm to the quiet shore, and encourage ourselves with hope that we shall weather our point.

2. He rebukes the wind. See, (1) How easily this was done, with a word's speaking. (2) How effectually it was done. There was a great calm, all of a sudden. Ordinarily, after a storm, there is such a fret of the waters, that it is a good while ere they can settle; but if Christ speak the word, not only the storm ceases, but all the effects of it, all the remains of it. Great storms of doubt, and fear in the soul sometimes end in a wonderful calm.

3. This excited their astonishment (v. 27); The men marvelled. They had been long acquainted with the sea, and never saw a storm so immediately turned into a perfect calm, in all their lives. Observe, (1) Their admiration of Christ; What manner of man is this! Christ is a Nonsuch; everything in him is admirable: none so wise, so mighty, so amiable, as he. (2) The reason of it; Even the winds and the sea obey him. Upon this account, Christ is to be admired, that he has a commanding power even over winds and seas. He that can do this, can do anything, can do enough to encourage our confidence and comfort in him, in the most stormy day, within or without, Isa. xxvi. 4.

We have here the story of Christ's casting the devils out of two men that were possessed. The scope of this chapter is to show the divine power of Christ. Christ has not only all power in heaven and earth and all deep places, but has the keys of hell too. It was observed in general (v. 16), that Christ cast out the spirits with his word; here we have a particular instance of it. Though Christ was sent chiefly to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, yet some sallies he made among the borderers, as here, to gain this victory over Satan. Observe, concerning this legion of devils, What work they made where they were, and where they went.

I. What work they made where they were; which appears in the miserable condition of these two that were possessed by them.

1. They dwelt among the tombs; thence they came when they met Christ. Conversing among the graves increased the melancholy and frenzy of the poor possessed creatures, and also made them more formidable to other people, who generally startle at anything that stirs among the tombs.

2. They were exceeding fierce; not only ungovernable themselves, but mischievous to others, frightening many, having hurt some; so that no man durst pass that way. The devil bears malice to mankind, and shows it by making men spiteful and malicious one to another. Mutual enmities, where there should be mutual endearments and assistances, those lusts that war in the members, pride, envy, malice, revenge, make him as unfit for human society, as unworthy of it, and as much an enemy to the comfort of it, as these poor possessed creatures were.

3. They bid defiance to Jesus Christ, and disclaimed all interest in him, v. 29. It is an instance of the power of God over the devils, that they could not keep them from meeting Jesus Christ. His chains could hold them, when the chains that men made for them could not. But being brought before him, they protested against his jurisdiction, and broke out into a rage, What have we to do with thee, Jesus, thou Son of God? Here is,

(1) One word that the devil spoke like a saint; he addressed himself to Christ as Jesus the Son of God; a good word, and at this time, when it was a truth but in the proving, it was a great word too. Even the devils know, and believe, and confess Christ to be the Son of God, and yet they are devils still. It is not knowledge, but love, that distinguishes saints from devils.

(2) Two words that he said like a devil, like himself.

[1] A word of defiance; What have we to do with thee? It is true that the devils have nothing to do with Christ as a Saviour. O the depth of this mystery of divine love, that fallen man hath so much to do with Christ, when fallen angels have nothing to do with him! It is possible for men to call Jesus the Son of God, and yet have nothing to do with him. It is as true, that the devils desire not to have anything to do with Christ as a Ruler; they hate him, they are filled with enmity against him. But it is not true, that the devils have nothing to do with Christ as a Judge, for they have, and they know it.

[2] A word of dread and deprecation; "Art thou come hither to torment us—to cast us out from these men, and to restrain us from doing the hurt we would do?" To be turned out, and tied up, from doing mischief, is a torment to the devil. Should not we then count it our heaven to be doing well, and reckon that our torment, whether within or without, that hinders us from well-doing?

II. Let us now see what work they made where they went, when they were turned out of the men possessed, and that was into a herd of swine, which was a good way off, v. 30. These Gergesenes, though living on the other side Jordan, were Jews. What had they to do with swine?

1. How the devils seized the swine. Though they were a good way off, yet the devils had an eye upon them.

(1) They asked leave to enter into the swine (v. 31); they besought him, with all earnestness, If thou cast us out, suffer us to go away into the herd of swine. Hereby, [1] They discover their own inclination to do mischief, and what a pleasure it is to them. If they might not be suffered to hurt men in their bodies, they would hurt them in their goods, and in that too they intend hurt to their souls, by making Christ a burthen to them. [2] They own Christ's power over them; that, without his sufferance and permission, they could not so much as hurt a swine. This is comfortable to all the Lord's people, that, though the devil's power be very great, yet it is limited, and not equal to his malice (what would become of us, if it were?) especially that it is under the control of our Lord Jesus.

(2) They had leave. Christ said unto them, Go (v. 32), as God did to Satan, when he desired leave to afflict Job. God does often, for wise and holy ends, permit the efforts of Satan's rage, and suffer him to do the mischief he would. Christ permitted this for the punishment of the Gadarenes, who perhaps, though Jews, took a liberty to eat swine's flesh, contrary to the law: however, their keeping swine bordered upon evil. The devils, in obedience to Christ's command, came out of the men, and having permission, when they were come out, immediately they went into the herd of swine. See what an industrious enemy Satan is, and how expeditious; he will lose no time in doing mischief.

2. Whither they hurried them, when they had seized them. They were made to run violently down a steep place into the sea, where they all perished, to the number of about two thousand, Mark v. 13. The possession which the devil gets is for destruction. Thus the devil hurries people to sin, hurries them to that which they have resolved against, and which they know will be shame and grief to them. Thus likewise, he hurries them to ruin.

3. What effect this had upon the owners. The report of it was soon brought them by the swine-herds, who seemed to be more concerned for the loss of the swine than anything else, for they went not to tell what was befallen to the possessed of the devils, till the swine were lost, v. 33. Christ went not into the city, but the news of his being there did.

Now, (1) Their curiosity brought them out to see Jesus. The whole city came out to meet him. Thus many go out, in profession, to meet Christ for company, that have no real affection for him, nor desire to know him.

(2) Their covetousness made them willing to be rid of him. Instead of inviting him into their city, or bringing their sick to him to be healed, they desired him to depart out of their coasts. And now the devils had what they aimed at in drowning the swine; they did it, and then made the people believe that Christ had done it, and so prejudiced them against him. Thus the devil sows tares in God's fields. There are a great many who prefer their swine before their Saviour, and so come short of Christ, and salvation by him.

CHAP. IX

We have in this chapter remarkable instances of the power and pity of the Lord Jesus. His power and pity appear here in the good offices he did, I. To the bodies of people, in curing the palsy (ver. 2–8); raising to life the ruler's daughter, and healing the bloody issue (ver. 18–26); giving sight to two blind men (ver. 27–31); casting the devil out of one possessed (ver. 32–34); and healing all manner of sickness, ver. 35. II. To the souls of people; in forgiving sins (ver. 2); calling Matthew, and conversing freely with publicans and sinners (ver. 9–13); considering the frame of his disciples, with reference to the duty of fasting (ver. 14–17); preaching the gospel, and, in compassion to the multitude, providing preachers for them (ver. 35–38). Thus did he prove himself to be, as undoubtedly he is, the skilful, faithful Physician, both of soul and body, who has sufficient remedies for all the maladies of both.

The first words of this chapter oblige us to look back to the close of that which precedes it, where we find the Gadarenes so resenting the loss of their swine, that they were disgusted with Christ's company, and besought him to depart out of their coasts. Now here it follows, He entered into a ship, and passed over. They bid him begone, and he took them at their word. Christ will not tarry long where he is not welcome, but abides with those that covet and court his stay. He did not leave some destroying judgment behind him, to punish them, as they deserved, for their contempt and contumacy. He entered into a ship, and passed over. This was the day of his patience; he came not to destroy men's lives, but to save them; not to kill, but to cure.

He came into his own city, Capernaum, the principal place of his residence at present (Mark ii. 1), and therefore called his own city. When the Gadarenes desired Christ to depart, they of Capernaum received him. If Christ be affronted by some, there are others in whom he will be glorious; if one will not, another will.

Now the first occurrence was the cure of the man sick of the palsy.

I. The faith of his friends in bringing him to Christ. His distemper was such, that he could not come to Christ himself, but as he was carried. Even the halt and the lame may be brought to Christ, and they shall not be rejected by him. Little children cannot go to Christ themselves, but he will have an eye to the faith of those that bring them, and it shall not be in vain. Jesus saw their faith, the faith of the paralytic himself, as well as of them that brought him. Now their faith was, 1. A strong faith; they firmly believed that Jesus Christ both could and would heal him. 2. A humble faith; though the sick man was unable to stir a step, they would not ask Christ to make him a visit, but brought him to attend on Christ. It is fitter that we should wait on Christ, than he on us. 3. An active faith: in the belief of Christ's power and goodness, they brought the sick man to him, lying on a bed, which could not be done without a deal of pains. Note, a strong faith regards no obstacles in pressing after Christ.

II. The favour of Christ, in what he said to him; Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee. This was a sovereign cordial to a sick man. We read not of anything said to Christ. They set him before Christ; that was enough. It is not in vain to present ourselves and our friends to Christ, as the objects of his pity. Misery cries as well as sin, and mercy is no less quick of hearing than justice. Here is, in what Christ said, 1. A kind compellation; Son. 2. A gracious encouragement; "Be of good cheer." Probably the poor man was afraid of a rebuke for being brought in so rudely: but Christ does not stand upon ceremony; he bids him be of good cheer. 3. A good reason for that encouragement; Thy sins are forgiven thee. Now this may be considered as an introduction to the cure of his bodily distemper; "Thy sins are pardoned, and therefore thou shalt be healed." If we have the comfort of our reconciliation to God, with the comfort of our recovery from sickness, this makes it a mercy indeed to us, as to Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 17. As a reason of the command to be of good cheer, whether he were cured of his disease or not; "Though I should not heal thee, wilt thou not say thou hast not sought in vain, if I assure thee that thy sins are pardoned." They who, through grace, have some evidence of the forgiveness of their sins, have reason to be of good cheer, whatever outward troubles or afflictions they are under.

III. The cavil of the scribes at that which Christ said (v. 3); They said within themselves, in their hearts, among themselves, in their secret whisperings, This man blasphemeth. See how the greatest instance of heaven's power and grace is branded with the blackest note of hell's enmity.

IV. The conviction which Christ gave them of the unreasonableness of this cavil, before he proceeded.

1. He charged them with it. Though they did but say it within themselves he knew their thoughts. Note, Our Lord Jesus has the perfect knowledge of all that we say within ourselves. Thoughts are secret and sudden, yet naked and open before Christ. The sins that begin and end in the heart, and go no further, are as dangerous as any other.

2. He argued them out of it, v. 5, 6. Where observe,

(1) How he asserts his authority in the kingdom of grace. He undertakes to make out, that the Son of Man, the Mediator, has power on earth to forgive sins. What an encouragement is this to poor sinners to repent, that the power of pardoning sin is put into the hands of the Son of Man, who is bone of our bone! And if he had this power on earth, much more now that he is exalted to the Father's right hand.

(2) How he proves it, by his power in the kingdom of nature. Is it not as easy to say, Thy sins are forgiven thee, as to say, Arise and walk? He that can cure the disease can, in like manner, forgive the sin. This is a general argument to prove that Christ had a divine mission. The power that appeared in his cures proved him sent of God; and the pity that appeared in them proved him sent of God to heal and save. The palsy was but a symptom of the disease of sin; now he made it to appear, that he could effectually cure the original disease, by the immediate removal of that symptom. He that had power to remove the punishment, no doubt, had power to remit the sin. His great errand to the world was, to save his people from their sins.

V. The immediate cure of the sick man. Christ turned from disputing with them, and spake healing to him. The most necessary arguings must not divert us from doing the good that our hand finds to do. He saith to the sick of the palsy, Arise, take up thy bed, and go to thine house; and a healing, quickening, strengthening power accompanied this word (v. 7): he arose and departed to his house. He sent him to his house, to be a blessing to his family, where he had been so long a burthen.

VI. The impression which this made upon the multitude (v. 8); they marvelled, and glorified God. They glorified God, for what he had done for this poor man. Others' mercies should be our praises, and we should give him thanks for them. They admired him, not as God, or the Son of God, but as a man to whom God had given such power. God must be glorified in all the power that is given to men to do good. For all power is originally his; it is in him, as the Fountain, in men, as the cisterns.

Verses 9–13

In these verses we have an account of the grace and favour of Christ to poor publicans, particularly to Matthew.

I. The call of Matthew, the penman, of this gospel. Mark and Luke call him Levi. Some think Christ gave him the name of Matthew when he called him to be an apostle; as Simon, he surnamed Peter. Matthew signifies, the gift of God.

1. The posture that Christ's call found Matthew in. He was sitting at the receipt of custom, for he was a publican, Luke v. 27. He was in his calling, as the rest of them whom Christ called, ch. iv. 18. As Satan chooses to come, with his temptations, to those that are idle, so Christ chooses to come, with his calls, to those that are employed. It was a calling of ill fame among serious people; because it was attended with so much corruption and temptation, and there were so few in that business that were honest men. God has his remnant among all sorts of people. None can justify themselves in their unbelief, by their calling in the world; for there is no sinful calling, but some have been saved out of it, and no lawful calling, but some have been saved in it.

2. The preventing power of his call. We find not that Matthew looked after Christ, or had any inclination to follow him. He is found of those that seek him not. Christ spoke first; we have not chosen him, but he hath chosen us. He said, Follow me. The call was effectual, for he came at the call; he arose, and followed him immediately; neither denied, nor deferred his obedience. The power of divine grace soon answers and overcomes all objections. He quitted his post, and his hopes of preferment in that way; and, though we find the disciples that were fishers occasionally fishing again afterwards, we never find Matthew at the receipt of custom again.

II. Christ's converse with publicans and sinners upon this occasion; Jesus sat at meat in the house, v. 10. The other evangelists tell us, that Matthew made a great feast, which the poor fishermen, when they were called, were not able to do. But when he comes to speak of this himself, he neither tells us that it was his own house, nor that it was a feast, but only that he sat at meat in the house. It well becomes us to speak sparingly of our own good deeds.

When Matthew invited Christ, he invited his disciples to come along with him. Note, They that welcome Christ, must welcome all that are his, for his sake, and let them have a room in their hearts. He invited many publicans and sinners to meet him. This was the chief thing Matthew aimed at in this treat, that he might have an opportunity of bringing his old associates acquainted with Christ. They who are effectually brought to Christ themselves, cannot but be desirous that others also may be brought to him, and ambitious of contributing something towards it. True grace will not contentedly eat its morsels alone, but will invite others. And surely some of them will follow him, as he followed Christ. Thus did Andrew and Philip, John i. 41, 45; iv. 29.

III. The displeasure of the Pharisees at this, v. 11. They cavilled at it; why eateth your Master with publicans and sinners? Christ was quarrelled with. It was not the least of his sufferings, that he endured the contradiction of sinners against himself. Though he never spoke or did anything amiss, everything he said and did was found fault with. Thus he taught us to expect and prepare for reproach, and to bear it patiently. They that quarrelled with him were the Pharisees. They were very strict in avoiding sinners, but not in avoiding sin; none greater zealots than they for the form of godliness, nor greater enemies to the power of it. They brought their cavil, not to Christ himself; they had not the courage to face him with it, but to his disciples. Being offended at the Master, they quarrel with the disciples. It concerns Christians to be able to vindicate and justify Christ, and his doctrines and laws, and to be ready always to give an answer to those that ask them a reason of the hope that is in them, 1 Peter iii. 15. While he is an Advocate for us in heaven, let us be advocates for him on earth, and make his reproach our own. The complaint was his eating with publicans and sinners: to be intimate with wicked people is against the law of God (Ps. cxix. 115; i. 1); and perhaps by accusing Christ of this to his disciples, they hoped to tempt them from him. To be intimate with publicans was against the tradition of the elders, and, therefore, they looked upon it as a heinous thing. They were angry with Christ for this, (1) Because they wished ill to him. It is an easy and very common thing to put the worst constructions upon the best words and actions. (2) Because they wished no good to publicans and sinners, but envied Christ's favour to them. It may justly be suspected, that they have not the grace of God themselves, who grudge others a share in that grace.

IV. The defence that Christ made for himself and his disciples, in justification of their converse with publicans and sinners. Let him alone to vindicate himself and to plead his own cause, to answer for himself, and for us too. Two things he urges in his defence,

1. The necessity and exigence of the case of the publicans, which called aloud for his help. It was the extreme necessity of poor, lost sinners, that brought Christ from the pure regions above, to these impure ones; and the same was it, that brought him into this company which was thought impure. He proves the necessity of the case of the publicans: they that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick. The publicans are sick, and they need one to help and heal them, which the Pharisees think they do not. Note, Sin is the sickness of the soul. It is deforming, weakening, disquieting, wasting, killing, but, blessed be God, not incurable. Jesus Christ is the great Physician of souls. Wise and good men should be as physicians to all about them; Christ was so. Sin-sick souls have need of this Physician, for their disease is dangerous; nature will not help itself; no man can help us; such need have we of Christ, that we are undone, eternally undone, without him. There are multitudes who fancy themselves to be sound and whole, who think they have no need of Christ, but that they can shift for themselves well enough without him, as Laodicea, Rev. iii. 17. See John ix. 40, 41. He proves, that their necessity did sufficiently justify his conduct, for that necessity made it an act of charity, which ought always to be preferred before the formalities of a religious profession, in which *bene*ficence and *muni*ficence are far better than *magni*ficence, as much as substance is better than shows or shadows. If to do well ourselves is better than sacrifice, as Samuel shows (1 Sam. xv. 22, 23), much more to do good to others. To promote the conversion of souls is the greatest act of mercy imaginable; it is saving a soul from death, James v. 20. Observe how Christ quotes this, Go ye and learn what that meaneth. It is not enough to be acquainted with the letter of scripture, but we must learn to understand the meaning of it. And they have best learned the meaning of the scriptures, that have learned how to apply them as a reproof to their own faults, and a rule for their own practice. This scripture which Christ quoted, served not only to vindicate him, but, [1] To show wherein true religion consists; not in external observances: but in doing all the good we can to the bodies and souls of others; in righteousness and peace. [2] To condemn the Pharisaical hypocrisy of those who place religion in rituals, more than in morals, ch. xxiii. 23.

2. The nature and end of his own commission. "I am not come to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, and therefore must converse with publicans." (1) What his errand was; it was to call to repentance. A call to us to change our mind and to change our way. (2) With whom his errand lay; not with the righteous, but with sinners. If the children of men had not been sinners, there had been no occasion for Christ's coming among them. Therefore his greatest business lies with the greatest sinners; the more dangerous the sick man's case is, the more occasion there is for the physician's help. Christ came into the world to save sinners, but especially the chief (1 Tim. i. 15). Christ came not with an expectation of succeeding among the righteous, those who conceit themselves so, and therefore will sooner be sick of their Saviour, than sick of their sins, but among the convinced humble sinners; to them Christ will come, for to them he will be welcome.

Verses 14–17

The objections which were made against Christ and his disciples gave occasion to some of the most profitable of his discourses; and thus the wisdom of Christ brings good out of evil. So here, from a reflection upon the conduct of his family, arose a discourse concerning his tenderness for it.

I. The objection which the disciples of John made against Christ's disciples, for not fasting so often as they did; which they are charged with, as another instance of the looseness of their profession, besides that of eating with publicans and sinners. It appears by the other evangelists (Mark ii. 18 and Luke v. 33) that the disciples of the Pharisees joined with them because they, being more in favour with Christ and his disciples, could do it more plausibly. It is no new thing for bad men to set good men together by the ears: if the people of God differ in their sentiments, designing men will take that occasion to sow discord. Now the complaint is, Why do we and the Pharisees fast often, but thy disciples fast not? It is a pity the duties of religion, which ought to be the confirmations of holy love, should be made the occasions of strife and contention.

1. How they boasted of their own fasting. We and the Pharisees fast often. Fasting has in all ages of the church been consecrated, upon special occasions, to the service of religion; the Pharisees were much in it. The disciples of John fasted often. The severer part of religion is often most minded by those that are yet under the discipline of the Spirit, as a Spirit of bondage, whereas, though these are good in their place, we must pass through them to that life of delight in God and dependence on him, to which these should lead. There is a proneness in professors to brag of their own performances in religion, and not only to boast of them before men, but to plead them before God, and confide in them as a righteousness.

2. How they blamed Christ's disciples for not fasting so often as they did. Thy disciples fast not. They could not but know, that Christ had instructed his disciples to keep their fasts private, and to manage themselves so as that they might not appear unto men to fast. We must not judge of people's religion by that which falls under the eye and observation of the world. It is common for vain professors to make themselves a standard in religion as if all that did less than they, did too little, and all that did more than they, did too much.

3. How they brought this complaint to Christ. If Christ's disciples, either by omission or commission, give offence, Christ himself will be sure to hear of it, and be reflected upon for it. O Jesus, are these thy Christians? The quarrel with Christ was brought to the disciples (v. 11), the quarrel with the disciples was brought to Christ (v. 14), this is the way of sowing discord and killing love, to set people against ministers, ministers against people, and one friend against another.

II. The apology which Christ made for his disciples in this matter. When they had nothing to say for themselves, he had something ready to say for them. What we do according to the precept and pattern of Christ, he will be sure to bear us out in.

Two things Christ pleads in defence of their not fasting.

1. That it was not a season proper for that duty (v. 15): Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? Christ's answer is so framed, as that it might sufficiently justify the practice of his own disciples, and yet not condemn the institution of John, or the practice of his disciples. When at any time we are unjustly censured, our care must be only to clear ourselves, not to recriminate, or throw dirt upon others.

Now his argument is taken from the common usage of joy and rejoicing during the continuance of marriage solemnities, when all instances of melancholy and sorrow are looked upon as improper and absurd. The disciples of Christ were the children of the bride-chamber, invited to the wedding-feast, and welcome there. The faithful followers of Christ, who have the Spirit of adoption, have a continual feast, while they who have the spirit of bondage and fear, cannot rejoice for joy, as other people. The disciples of Christ had the bridegroom with them, which the disciples of John had not; their master was now cast into prison and therefore it was seasonable for them to fast often. Such a day would come upon the disciples of Christ, when the bridegroom should be taken from them, and then should they fast. The thoughts of parting grieved them when he was going, John xvi. 6. Tribulation and affliction befell them when he was gone, and gave them occasion of mourning and praying, that is, of religious fasting. It is merry or melancholy with the children of the bride-chamber, according as they have more or less of the bridegroom's presence. The presence and nearness of the sun makes day and summer, his absence and distance, night and winter. Christ is all in all to the church's joy. Every duty is to be done in its proper season. See Eccles. vii. 14; James v. 13. There is a time to mourn and a time to laugh, to each of which we should accommodate ourselves, and bring forth fruit in due season.

2. That they had not strength sufficient for that duty. This is set forth in two similitudes, one of putting new cloth into an old garment, which does but pull the old to pieces (v. 16); the other of putting new wine into old bottles, which does but burst the bottles, v. 17. Christ's disciples were not able to bear these severe exercises so well as those of John and of the Pharisees. They, being taken immediately from their callings, had not been used to such religious austerities, and were unfit for them, and would by them be rather unfitted for their other work. Some duties of religion are harder and more difficult than others, such as religious fasting and the duties that attend it. The best of Christ's disciples pass through a state of infancy; all the trees in Christ's garden are not of a growth, nor all his scholars in the same form; there are babes in Christ and grown men. The weakness and infirmity of young Christians ought to be considered: as the food provided for them must be such as is proper for their age (1 Cor. iii. 2; Heb. v. 12), so must the work be that is cut out for them. Christ would not speak to his disciples that which they could not then bear, John xvi. 12. Young beginners in religion must not be put upon the hardest duties at first, lest they be discouraged. Such as was Jacob's care of his children and cattle, not to overdrive them (Gen. xxxiii. 13), such is Christ's care of the little ones of his family, and the lambs of his flock: he gently leads them. There may be over-doing even in well-doing, a being righteous over-much; and such an over-doing as may prove an *un*doing through the subtlety of Satan.

Verses 18–26

We have here two passages of history put together; that of the raising of Jairus's daughter to life, and that of the curing of the woman that had the bloody issue, as he was going to Jairus's house, which is introduced in a parenthesis, in the midst of the other; for Christ's miracles were thick sown, and interwoven. He was called to do these good works from speaking the things foregoing, in answer to the cavils of the Pharisees, v. 18: While he spake these things; and we may suppose it a pleasing interruption given to that unpleasant work of disputation, which, though sometimes needful, a good man will gladly leave, to go about a work of devotion or charity.

I. The ruler's address to Christ, v. 18. A certain ruler, a ruler of the synagogue, came and worshipped him. Have any of the rulers believed on him? Yes, here was one. This ruler had a little daughter, of twelve years old, just dead, and this breach made upon his family comforts was the occasion of his coming to Christ. In trouble we should visit God: the death of our relations should drive us to Christ, who is our life. Now observe,

1. His humility in this address to Christ. He came with his errand to Christ himself. It is no disparagement to the greatest rulers, personally to attend on the Lord Jesus. He worshipped him. They that would receive mercy from Christ must give honour to Christ.

2. His faith in this address; "My daughter is even now dead," and though any other physician would now come too late, yet Christ comes not too late; he is a Physician after death, for he is the resurrection and the life; "O come then, and lay thy hand upon her, and she shall live." This was quite above the power of nature, yet within the power of Christ, who has life in himself, and quickeneth whom he will. We cannot in faith bring him such a request as this; while there is life, there is hope, and room for prayer; but when our friends are dead, the case is determined. But while Christ was here upon earth working miracles, such a confidence as this was not only allowable but very commendable.

II. The readiness of Christ to comply with his address, v. 19. Jesus immediately arose, left his company, and followed him; he was not only willing to grant him what he desired, in raising his daughter to life, but to gratify him so far as to come to his house to do it. Surely he never said to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain. And observe, when Jesus followed him, so did his disciples, whom he had chosen for his constant companions; it was not for state, or that he might come with observation, that he took his attendants with him, but that they might be the witnesses of his miracles, who were hereafter to be the preachers of his doctrine.

III. The healing of the poor woman's bloody issue. I call her a poor woman, not only because her case was piteous, but because, though she had had something in the world, she had spent it all upon physicians, for the cure of her distemper, and was never the better; which was a double aggravation of the misery of her condition, that she had impoverished herself for the recovery of her health, and yet had not her health either. This woman was diseased with a constant issue of blood twelve years (v. 20); a disease, which was not only weakening and wasting, but which also rendered her ceremonially unclean, and shut her out from the courts of the Lord's house; but it did not cut her off from approaching to Christ. She applied herself to Christ, and received mercy from him, by the way.

1. The woman's great faith in Christ, and in his power. Her disease was of such a nature, that her modesty would not suffer her to speak openly to Christ for a cure, as others did, but she believed him to have such an overflowing fulness of healing virtue, that the very touch of his garment would be her cure. This, perhaps, had something of fancy mixed with faith; for she had no precedent for this way of application to Christ. But what weakness of understanding there was in it, Christ was pleased to overlook, and to accept the sincerity and strength of her faith. She believed she should be healed if she did but touch the very hem of his garment, the very extremity of it. There is virtue in everything that belongs to Christ. Such a fulness of grace is there in Christ, that from it we may all receive, John i. 16.

2. Christ's great favour to this woman. He did not suspend his healing influences, but suffered this bashful patient to steal a cure unknown to any one else, though she could not think to do it unknown to him. And now she was well content to be gone, for she had what she came for, but Christ was not willing to let her go so: the triumphs of her faith must be to her praise and honour. He turned about to see her (v. 22), and soon discovered her. It is great encouragement to humble Christians, that they who hide themselves from men are known to Christ, who sees in secret their applications to heaven when most private.

(1) He puts gladness into her heart, by that word, Daughter, be of good comfort. She feared being chidden for coming clandestinely, but she is encouraged. He calls her daughter, for he spoke to her with the tenderness of a father, as he did to the man sick of the palsy (v. 2), whom he called son. He bids her be of good comfort. His bidding her be comforted, brought comfort with it, as his saying, Be ye whole, brought health with it.

(2) He puts honour upon her faith. That grace of all others gives most honour to Christ, and therefore he puts most honour upon it; Thy faith has made thee whole. This woman had more faith than she thought she had. She was spiritually healed; that cure was wrought in her which is the proper fruit and effect of faith, the pardon of sin and the work of grace. Her bodily cure was the fruit of faith, of her faith, and that made it a happy, comfortable cure indeed. They out of whom the devils were cast, were helped by Christ's sovereign power; some by the faith of others (as v. 2); but it is thy faith that has made thee whole.

IV. The posture in which he found the ruler's house, v. 23.—He saw the people and the minstrels, or musicians, making a noise. The house was in a hurry: such work does death make, when it comes into a family; and, perhaps, the necessary cares that arise at such a time, when our dead is to be decently buried out of our sight, give some useful diversion to that grief which is apt to prevail and play the tyrant. The people in the neighbourhood came together to condole on account of the loss, to comfort the parents, to prepare for, and attend on, the funeral, which the Jews were not wont to defer long. The musicians were among them, according to the custom of the Gentiles, with their doleful, melancholy tunes, to increase the grief, and stir up the lamentations of those that attended on this occasion. Thus they indulged a passion that is apt enough of itself to grow intemperate, and affected to sorrow as those that had no hope. See how religion provides cordials, where irreligion administers corrosives. Heathenism aggravates that grief which Christianity studies to assuage. The parents, who were immediately touched with the affliction, were silent, while the people and minstrels, whose lamentations were forced, made such a noise. The loudest grief is not always the greatest; rivers are most noisy where they run shallow. That grief is most sincere, which shuns observation.

V. The rebuke that Christ gave to this hurry and noise, v. 24. He said, Give place. Note, Sometimes, when the sorrow of the world prevails, it is difficult for Christ and his comforts to enter. They that harden themselves in sorrow, and, like Rachel, refuse to be comforted, should think they hear Christ saying to their disquieting thoughts, Give place. He gives a good reason why they should not thus disquiet themselves and one another; The maid is not dead but sleepeth. 1. This was eminently true of this maid, that was immediately to be raised to life; she was really dead, but not so to Christ, who knew within himself what he would do, and could do. This death must be but of short continuance, and therefore is but a sleep, like one night's rest. 2. It is in a sense true of all that die, chiefly of them that die in the Lord. (1) Death is a sleep. All nations and languages, for the softening of that which is so dreadful, and withal so unavoidable, and the reconciling of themselves to it, have agreed to call it so. It is not the sleep of the soul; its activity ceases not; but the sleep of the body, which lies down in the grave, still and silent. Sleep is a short death, and death a long sleep. But the death of the righteous is in a special manner to be looked upon as a sleep, Isa. lvii. 2. They sleep in Jesus (1 Thess. iv. 14); they not only rest from the toils and labours of the day, but rest in hope of a joyful waking again in the morning of the resurrection, when they shall wake refreshed, wake to a new life, wake to sleep no more. (2) The consideration of this should moderate our grief at the death of our dear relations: say not, They are lost; no, they are but gone before. The apostle speaks of it as an absurd thing to imagine that they that are fallen asleep in Christ are perished (1 Cor. xv. 18).

Now could it be thought that such a comfortable word as this, from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, should be ridiculed as it was? They laughed him to scorn. The words and works of Christ which cannot be understood, yet are not therefore to be despised. We must adore the mystery of divine sayings, even when they seem to contradict what we think ourselves most confident of. Yet even this tended to the confirmation of the miracle: for it seems she was so apparently dead, that it was thought a very ridiculous thing to say otherwise.

VI. The raising of the damsel to life by the power of Christ, v. 25. The people were put forth. Scorners that laugh at what they see and hear that is above their capacity, are not proper witnesses of the wonderful works of Christ, the glory of which lies not in pomp, but in power.

Christ went in and took her by the hand, as it were to awake her, and to help her up. The high priest, that typified Christ, was not to come near the dead (Lev. xxi. 10, 11), but Christ touched the dead. Christ, having power to raise the dead, is above the infection, and therefore is not shy of touching them. He took her by the hand, and the maid arose. So easily, so effectually was the miracle wrought; by a touch. Dead souls are not raised to spiritual life, unless Christ take them by the hand. He helps us up, or we lie still.

VII. The general notice that was taken of this miracle, though it was wrought privately; v. 26, the fame thereof went abroad into all that land: it was the common subject of discourse. Christ's works are more talked of than considered and improved. Though we at this distance have not seen Christ's miracles, yet blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed, John xx. 29.

Verses 27–34

In these verses we have an account of two more miracles wrought together by our Saviour.

I. The giving of sight to two blind men, v. 27–31. Christ is the Fountain of light as well as life.

1. The importunate address of the blind men to Christ. He was returning from the ruler's house to his own lodgings, and these blind men followed him, as beggars do, with their incessant cries, v. 27. He that cured diseases so easily, so effectually, and, withal, at so cheap a rate, shall have patients enough.

(1) The title which these blind men gave to Christ; Thou Son of David, have mercy on us. The promise made to David, that of his loins the Messiah should come, was well known. At this time there was a general expectation of his appearing; these blind men know, and own, and proclaim it in the streets of Capernaum, that he is come, and that this is he. They who, by the providence of God, are deprived of bodily sight, may yet, by the grace of God, have the eyes of their understanding so enlightened, as to discern those great things of God, which are hid from the wise and prudent.

(2) Their petition, Have mercy on us. Whatever our necessities and burthens are, we need no more for supply and support, than a share in the mercy of our Lord Jesus. Whether he heal us or no, if he have mercy on us, we have enough. They did not each of them say for himself, Have mercy on me, but both for one another, Have mercy on us. Fellow-sufferers should be joint-petitioners. In Christ there is enough for all.

(3) Their importunity in this request; they followed him, crying. It seems, he did not take notice of them at first, for he would try their faith, which he knew to be strong; would quicken their prayers, and make his cures the more valued, when they did not always come at the first word; and would teach us to continue instant in prayer, always to pray, and not to faint. When he came into the house, they followed him thither, and came to him. Christ's doors are always open to believing and importunate petitioners; it seemed rude in them to rush into the house after him, when he desired to retire; but, such is the tenderness of our Lord Jesus, that they were not more bold than welcome.

2. The confession of faith, which Christ drew from them upon this occasion. When they came to him for mercy, he asked them, Believe ye that I am able to do this? Faith is the great condition of Christ's favours. They who would receive the mercy of Christ, must firmly believe the power of Christ. What we would have him do for us, we must be fully assured that he is able to do. Nature may work fervency, but it is only grace that can work faith. They had intimated their faith in the office of Christ as Son of David, and in his mercy; but Christ demands likewise a profession of faith in his power. Believe ye that I am able? This will amount to their belief of his being not only the Son of David, but the Son of God; for it is God's prerogative to open the eyes of the blind (Ps. cxlvi. 8). Still it is put to us, Believe we that Christ is able to do for us. To believe the power of Christ is not only to assure ourselves of it, but to commit ourselves to it, and encourage ourselves in it.

To this question they give an immediate answer, without hesitation: they said, Yea, Lord.

3. The cure that Christ wrought on them; he touched their eyes, v. 29. He put the cure upon their faith, According to your faith be it unto you. When they begged for a cure, he enquired into their faith (v. 28), Believe ye that I am able? He did not enquire into their wealth, whether they were able to pay him for a cure; but into their faith; and now they had professed their faith he referred the matter to that: "The power you believe in shall be exerted for you; According to your faith be it unto you." It is a great comfort to true believers that Jesus Christ knows their faith, and is well pleased with it. Though it be weak, though others do not discern it, though they themselves are ready to question it, it is known to him. They who apply themselves to Jesus Christ, shall be dealt with according to their faith; not according to their fancies, nor according to their profession. True believers may be sure to find all that favour which is offered in the gospel; and our comforts ebb or flow, according as our faith is stronger or weaker; we are not straitened in Christ, let us not then be straighted in ourselves.

4. The charge he gave them to keep it private (v. 30), See that no man know it. In the good we do, we must not seek our own praise, but only the glory of God. It must be more our care and endeavour to be useful, than to be known and observed to be so. Some think that Christ, in keeping it private, showed his displeasure against the people of Capernaum, who had seen so many miracles, and yet believed not. It is just in Christ to deny the means of conviction to those that are obstinate in their infidelity; and to shroud the light from those that shut their eyes against it. He did it in discretion, for his own preservation; because the more he was proclaimed, the more jealous would the rulers of the Jews be of his growing interest among the people.

But honour is like the shadow, which, as it flees from those that follow it, so it follows those that flee from it (v. 21); They spread abroad his fame. Though it may be excused as honestly meant for the honour of Christ, yet it cannot be justified, being done against a particular charge. Whenever we profess to direct our intention to the glory of God, we must see to it that the action be according to the will of God.

II. The healing of a dumb man, that was possessed with a devil.

1. His case, which was very sad. He was under the power of the devil in this particular instance, that he was disabled from speaking, v. 32. See the calamitous state of this world, and how various the afflictions of the afflicted are! We have no sooner dismissed two blind men, but we meet with a dumb man. How thankful should we be to God for our sight and speech! When the devil gets possession of a soul, it is made silent as to anything that is good; dumb in prayers and praises. This poor creature they brought to Christ, who entertained not only those that came of themselves in their own faith, but those that were brought to him by their friends in the faith of others. They brought him in just as the blind man went out. See how unwearied Christ was in doing good; how closely one good work followed another! Treasures of mercy, wondrous mercy, are hid in him; which may be continually communicated, but can never be exhausted.

2. His cure, which was very sudden (v. 33), When the devil was cast out, the dumb spake. Christ's cures strike at the root, and remove the effect by taking away the cause; they open the lips, by breaking Satan's power in the soul.

3. The consequences of this cure.

(1) The multitudes marvelled; and well they might; though few believed, many wondered. The admiration of the common people is sooner raised than any other affection.

(2) The Pharisees blasphemed, v. 34. When they could not gainsay the convincing evidence of these miracles, they fathered them upon the devil, as if they had been wrought by compact and collusion: he casteth out devils (say they) by the prince of the devils. This breathes nothing but malice and falsehood, and hellish enmity in the highest degree; it is diabolism all over. Because the people marvelled, they must say something to diminish the miracle, and this was all they could say.

Verses 35–38

I. A conclusion of the foregoing account of Christ's preaching and miracles (v. 35); He went about all the cities teaching and healing. This is the same we had before, iv. 23. There it ushers in the more particular record of Christ's preaching (ch. v. vi. and vii) and of his cures (ch. viii and ix), and here it is elegantly repeated in the close of these instances, as the quod erat demonstrandum—the point to be proved; as if the evangelist should say, "Now I hope I have made it out that Christ preached and healed."

Observe how Christ in his preaching had respect,

1. To the private towns. He visited not only the great and wealthy cities, but the poor, obscure villages; there he preached, there he healed. The souls of those that are meanest in the world are as precious to Christ, and should be to us, as the souls of those that make the greatest figure.

2. To the public worship. He taught in their synagogues, (1) That he might bear a testimony to solemn assemblies. (2) That he might have an opportunity of preaching there, where people were gathered together, with an expectation to hear.

II. A preface, or introduction, to the account in the following chapter, of his sending forth his apostles. He took notice of the multitude (v. 36); not only of the crowds that followed him, but of the vast numbers of people with whom (as he passed along) he observed the country to be replenished: so very populous was that nation now grown; and it was the effect of God's blessing on Abraham.

1. He pitied them, and was concerned for them (v. 36); He was moved with compassion on them; not upon a temporal account, as he pitied the blind, and lame, and sick; but upon a spiritual account; he was concerned to see them ignorant and careless, and ready to perish for lack of vision. It was pity to souls that brought him from heaven to earth, and there to the cross. Christ pities those most that pity themselves least; so should we.

See what moved this pity. (1) They fainted: they were destitute, vexed, wearied. They wanted help for their souls, and had none at hand that was good for anything. The scribes and Pharisees filled them with vain notions, therefore they fainted; for what spiritual health, and life, and vigour can there be in those souls, that are fed with husks and ashes, instead of the bread of life? (2) They were scattered abroad, as sheep having no shepherd. No creature is more apt to go astray than a sheep, and when gone astray more helpless, shiftless, and exposed, or more unapt to find the way home again: sinful souls are as lost sheep; they need the care of shepherds to bring them back. The case of those people is very pitiable, who either have no ministers at all, or those that are as bad as none; that seek their own things, not the things of Christ.

2. He excited his disciples to pray for them. It appears (Luke vi. 12, 13) that upon this occasion, before he sent out his apostles, he did himself spend a great deal of time in prayer. Those we pity we should pray for.

(1) How the case stood; The harvest truly is plenteous, but the labourers are few. There was a great deal of work to be done, and a great deal of good likely to be done, but there wanted hands to do it. It was an encouragement, that the harvest was so plenteous. It was not strange, that there were multitudes that needed instruction, but it was what does not often happen, that they who needed it, desired it. It is a blessed thing, to see people in love with good preaching. The valleys are then covered over with corn, and there are hopes it may be well gathered in. A harvest-day should be a busy day. It was a pity when it was so that the labourers should be so few; that the corn should shed and spoil, and rot upon the ground for want of reapers; loiterers many, but labourers very few.

(2) What was their duty in this case (v. 38); Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest. When things look discouraging, we should pray more and then we should complain and fear less. [1] God is the Lord of the harvest; my Father is the Husbandman, John xv. 1. It is for him and to him, and to his service and honour that the harvest is gathered in. It is very comfortable to those who wish well to the harvest-work, that God himself presides in it, who will be sure to order all for the best. [2] Ministers are and should be labourers in God's harvest; the ministry is a work and must be attended to accordingly; it is harvest-work, which is needful work; work that requires everything to be done in its season, and diligence to do it thoroughly; but it is pleasant work; they reap in joy, and the joy of the preachers of the gospel is likened to the joy of harvest (Isa. ix. 2, 3); and he that reapeth receiveth wages; the hire of the labourers that reap down God's field, shall not be kept back, as theirs was, James v. 4. It is God's work to send forth labourers; Christ makes ministers (Eph. iv. 11); the office is of his appointing, the qualifications of his working, the call of his giving. All that love Christ and souls, should show it by their earnest prayers to God, especially when the harvest is plenteous, that he would send forth more skilful, faithful, wise, and industrious labourers into his harvest. Christ puts his friends upon praying this, just before he sends apostles forth to labour in the harvest. Further observe, that Christ said this to his disciples, who were to be employed as labourers. They must pray, First, That God would send them forth. Here am I, send me, Isa. vi. 8. Commissions, given in answer to prayer, are most likely to be successful; Paul is a chosen vessel, for behold he prays, Acts ix. 11, 15.

CHAP. X

This chapter is an ordination sermon, which our Lord Jesus preached, when he advanced his twelve disciples to the degree and dignity of apostles. I. The general commission that was given them, ver. 1. II. The names of the persons to whom this commission was given, ver. 2–4. III. The instructions that were given them. 1. Concerning the services they were to do; their preaching; their working miracles; to whom they must apply themselves; how they must behave themselves; and in what method they must proceed, ver. 5–15. 2. Concerning the sufferings they were to undergo. They are told what they should suffer, and from whom; counsels are given them what course to take when persecuted, and encouragements to bear up cheerfully under their sufferings, ver. 16–42.

Verses 1–4

I. Who they were that Christ ordained to be his apostles or ambassadors; they were his disciples, v. 1. He had called them sometime before to be disciples, and he then told them that they should be made fishers of men, which promise he now performed. Christ commonly confers honours and graces by degrees. All this while Christ had kept these twelve,

1. In a state of probation. Though he knows what is in man, though he knew from the first what was in them (John vi. 70), yet he took this method to give an example to his church. The ministry being a great trust, it is fit that men should be tried for a time, before they are entrusted with it.

2. In a state of preparation. All this while he had been fitting them for this great work. He prepared them by taking them to be with him. The best preparative for the work of the ministry, is an acquaintance and communion with Jesus Christ. They that would serve Christ, must first be with him (John xii. 26). Paul had Christ revealed, not only to him, but in him, before he went to preach him among the Gentiles, Gal. i. 16. By teaching them; they were with him as scholars or pupils, he opened the scriptures to them, and opened their understandings to understand the scriptures: to them it was given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, and to them they were made plain. They that design to be teachers must first be learners; they must receive, that they may give. Christ taught his disciples before he sent them forth (ch. v. 2), and afterwards, when he enlarged their commission, he gave them more ample instructions, Acts i. 3.

II. What the commission was that he gave them.

1. He called them to him, v. 1. He had called them to come after him before; now he calls them to come to him, admits them to a greater familiarity. The priests under the law were said to draw near and approach God, nearer than the people; the same may be said of gospel ministers; they are called to draw near to Christ. It is observable, that when the disciples were to be instructed, they came unto him of their own accord, ch. v. 1. But now they were to be ordained, he called them. It well becomes the disciples of Christ to be more forward to learn than to teach. We must wait for a call, a clear call, ere we take upon us to teach others.

2. He gave them power, ἐξουσίαν, authority in his name, to command men to obedience, and for the confirmation of that authority, to command devils too into a subjection. All rightful authority is derived from Jesus Christ. All power is given to him without limitation. Some of his honour he put on his ministers, as Moses put some of his on Joshua. He gave them power over unclean spirits, and over all manner of sickness. The design of the gospel was to conquer the devil and to cure the world.

(1) He gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out. The power that is committed to the ministers of Christ, is directly levelled against the devil and his kingdom. Christ gave them power to cast him out of the bodies of people; but that was to signify the destruction of his spiritual kingdom, and all the works of the devil; for which purpose the Son of God was manifested.

(2) He gave them power to heal all manner of sickness. He authorised them to work miracles for the confirmation of their doctrine, to prove that it was of God; to prove that it is not only faithful, but well worthy of all acceptation; that the design of the gospel is to heal and save; but the miracles Christ wrought, and appointed his apostles to work, evince him to be, not only the great Teacher and Ruler, but the Redeemer, of the world. They were to heal all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease, without exception even of those that are reckoned incurable, and the reproach of physicians. In the grace of the gospel there is a salve for every sore, a remedy for every malady. There is no spiritual disease so malignant, so inveterate, but there is a sufficiency of power in Christ for the cure of it. Let none therefore say there is no hope, or that the breach is wide as the sea, that cannot be healed.

III. The number and names of those that were commissioned; they are made apostles, that is, messengers. An angel, and an apostle, both signify the same thing—one sent on an errand, an ambassador. All faithful ministers are sent of Christ, but they that were first, and immediately, sent by him, are eminently called apostles, the prime ministers of state in his kingdom. Christ himself is called an apostle (Heb. iii. 1), for he was sent by the Father, and so sent them, John xx. 21. The prophets were called God's messengers.

1. Their number was twelve, referring to the number of the tribes of Israel. The gospel church must be the Israel of God; the Jews must be first invited into it; the apostles must be spiritual fathers, to beget a seed to Christ. Israel after the flesh is to be rejected for their infidelity; these twelve, therefore, are appointed to be the fathers of another Israel. These twelve, by their doctrine, were to judge the twelve tribes of Israel, Luke xxii. 30. This was that famous jury (and to make it a grand jury, Paul was added to it) that was impanelled to enquire between the King of kings, and the body of mankind.

2. Their names are here left upon record, and it is their honour; yet in this they had more reason to rejoice, that their names were written in heaven (Luke x. 20).

(1) There are some of these twelve apostles, of whom we know no more, from the scripture, than their names; as Bartholomew, and Simon the Canaanite. All the good ministers of Christ are not alike famous, nor their actions alike celebrated.

(2) They are named by couples; for at first they were sent forth two and two, because two are better than one; they would be serviceable to each other, and the more serviceable jointly to Christ and souls; what one forgot the other would remember. Three couples of them were brethren; Peter and Andrew, James and John, and the other James and Lebbeus. It is an excellent thing, when brethren by nature are brethren by grace, and those two bonds strengthen each other.

(3) Peter is named first, because he was first called; or because he was the most forward man among them, and upon all occasions made himself the mouth of the rest; but that gave him no power over the rest of the apostles, nor is there the least mark of any supremacy that was given to him, or ever claimed by him, in this sacred college.

(4) Matthew, the penman of this gospel, is here joined with Thomas (v. 3), but in two things there is a variation from the accounts of Mark and Luke, Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15. There, Matthew is put first, but here, in his own catalogue, Thomas is put first. It well becomes the disciples of Christ in honour to prefer one another. There he is only called Matthew, here Matthew the publican. It is good for those who are advanced to honour with Christ, to look unto the rock whence they were hewn; often to remember what they were before Christ called them, that thereby divine grace may be the more glorified. Matthew the apostle was Matthew the publican.

(5) Simon is called the Canaanite, or Simon the Zealot.

(6) Judas Iscariot is always named last, and with that black brand upon his name, who also betrayed him. Such spots there have been in our feasts of charity; tares among the wheat, wolves among the sheep; but there is a day of discovery and separation coming, when hypocrites shall be unmasked and discarded.

Verses 5–15

We have here the instructions that Christ gave to his disciples, when he gave them their commission. In this he commanded them. With these commands Christ commanded a blessing.

I. The people to whom he sent them.

1. Not to the Gentiles nor the Samaritans. They must not go into the way of the Gentiles. As to the Samaritans, their country lay between Judæa and Galilee, so that they could not avoid going into the way of the Samaritans, but they must not enter into any of their cities. This restraint was upon them only in their first mission, afterwards, they were appointed to go into all the world, and teach all nations.

2. But to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. The first offer of salvation must be made to the Jews, Acts iii. 26. Christ had a particular and very tender concern for the house of Israel. He looked with compassion upon them as lost sheep, whom he, as a shepherd, was to gather out of the by-paths of sin and error, into which they were gone astray, and in which, if not brought back, they would wander endlessly. Christ gives this description of those to whom they were sent, to quicken them to diligence in their work. They were sent to the house of Israel (of which number they themselves lately were), whom they could not but pity, and be desirous to help.

II. The preaching work which he appointed them. He did not send them forth without an errand; no, As ye go, preach, v. 7. They must proclaim the beginning of the gospel, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Not that they must say nothing else, but this must be their text; on this subject they must enlarge. It is said (Mark vi. 12), they went out, and preached that men should repent; which was the proper use and application of this doctrine concerning the approach of the kingdom of heaven. The preaching of this was like the morning light, to give notice of the approach of the rising sun. This proclaims salvation at hand, nigh them that fear God; mercy and truth meet together (Ps. lxxxv. 9, 10), that is, the kingdom of heaven at hand: not so much the personal presence of the king; that must not be doated upon; but a spiritual kingdom which is to be set up, when his bodily presence is removed, in the hearts of men.

Now this was the same that John the Baptist and Christ had preached before. People need to have good truths pressed again and again upon them, and if they be preached and heard with new affections, they are as if they were fresh to us. And there is a kingdom of glory yet to come, which we must speak of as at hand, and quicken people to diligence from the consideration of that.

III. The power he gave them to work miracles for the confirmation of their doctrine, v. 8. When he sent them to preach the same doctrine that he had preached, he empowered them to confirm it, by the same divine seals, which could never be set to a lie. This is not necessary now the kingdom of God is come; to call for miracles now is to lay again the foundation when the building is reared. They are directed here,

1. To use their power in doing good: Heal the sick, cleanse the lepers. They are sent abroad as public blessings, to intimate to the world, that love and goodness were the spirit and genius of that gospel which they came to preach, and of that kingdom which they were employed to set up. By this it would appear, that they were the servants of that God who is good and does good, and whose mercy is over all his works. We read not of their raising any to life before the resurrection of Christ, yet they were instrumental to raise many to spiritual life.

2. In doing good freely; Freely ye have received, freely give. They must cure gratis, further to exemplify the nature and complexion of the gospel kingdom, which is made up, not only of grace, but of free grace. And the reason is, because freely you have received. The consideration of Christ's freeness in doing good to us, should make us free in doing good to others.

IV. The provision that must be made for them in this expedition. As to that,

1. They must make no provision for it themselves, v. 9, 10. Provide neither gold nor silver. As, on the one hand, they shall not raise estates by their work, so, on the other hand, they shall not spend what little they have of their own upon it. Christ would teach them, (1) To act under the conduct of human prudence. They were now to make but a short excursion, therefore, why should they burthen themselves with that which they would have no occasion for? (2) To act in dependence upon Divine Providence. They must be taught to live, without taking thought for life, ch. vi. 25, &c. They who go upon Christ's errand, have, of all people, most reason to trust him for food convenient. Christ's hired servants shall have bread enough and to spare; while we abide faithful to God and our duty, and are in care to do our work well, we may cast all our other care upon God.

2. They might expect that those to whom they were sent would provide for them what was necessary, v. 10. They must not expect to be fed by miracles, as Elijah was: but they might depend upon God to incline the hearts of those they went among, to be kind to them, and provide for them. Ministers are, and must be, workmen, labourers, and they that are so are worthy of their meat. Christ would have his disciples, as not to distrust their God, so not to distrust their countrymen, so far as to doubt of a comfortable subsistence among them. If you preach to them, and endeavour to do good among them, surely they will give you meat and drink enough for your necessities; and if they do, never desire dainties; God will pay you your wages hereafter, and it will be running on in the mean time.

V. The proceedings they were to observe in dealing with any place, v. 11–15.

1. They are here directed how to conduct themselves toward those that were strangers to them.

(1) In strange towns and cities: when you come to a town, enquire who in it is worthy. It is supposed that there were some such in every place, as were better disposed than others to receive the gospel, and the preachers of it. In the worst of times and places, we may charitably hope that there are some who swim against the stream, and are as wheat among the chaff. There were saints in Nero's household. Enquire who is worthy, who there are that have some fear of God before their eyes. Previous dispositions to that which is good, are both directions and encouragements to ministers, in dealing with people. There is most hope of the word being profitable to those who are already so well inclined, as that it is acceptable to them; and there is here and there one such. They must enquire out such; not enquire for the best inns; public houses were no proper places for them that neither took money with them (v. 9), nor expected to receive any (v. 8); but they must look out for accommodations in private houses, with those that would entertain them well, and expect no other recompence for it but a prophet's reward, an apostle's reward, their praying and preaching. They that entertain the gospel, must neither grudge the expense of it, nor promise themselves to get by it in this world. Christ's disciples, wherever they come, should ask for the good people of the place, and be acquainted with them; when we took God for our God, we took his people for our people, and like will rejoice in its like. It is implied, that if they did enquire who was worthy, they might discover them. Anyone could tell them, there lives an honest, sober, good man; for this is a character which, like the ointment of the right hand, betrays itself, and fills the house with its odours. In the house of those they found worthy, they must continue. They are justly suspected, as having no good design, that are often changing their quarters. It becomes the disciples of Christ to make the best of that which is, to abide by it, and not be for shifting upon every dislike or inconvenience.

(2) In strange houses. When they had found the house of one they thought worthy, they must at their entrance salute it. "In those common civilities, be beforehand with people. Salute the family, [1] To draw on further discourse, and so to introduce your message." (From matters of common conversation, we may insensibly pass into that communication which is good to the use of edifying.) [2] To try whether you are welcome or not. He that will not receive your salutation kindly, will not receive your message kindly. [3] To insinuate yourselves into their good opinion. Salute the family, that they may see that though you are serious, you are not morose. Religion teaches us to be courteous and civil, and obliging to all with whom we have to do. Their instructions were, when they came into a house, not to command it, but to salute it; for love's sake rather to beseech, is the evangelical way, Philemon 8, 9. Souls are first drawn to Christ with the cords of a man, and kept to him by the bands of love, Hos. xi. 4.

When they had saluted the family after a godly sort, they must, by the return, judge concerning the family; if the house be worthy, let your peace come and rest upon it; if not, let it return to you, v. 13. It seems then, that after they had enquired for the most worthy (v. 11), it was possible they might light upon those that were unworthy. Though it is wisdom to hearken to, yet it is folly to rely upon, common report and opinion; we ought to use a judgment of discretion, and to see with our own eyes. Now this rule is intended,

First, For satisfaction to the apostles. The common salutation was, Peace be unto you. Christ tells them that this gospel prayer (for so it was now become) should be put up for all, as the gospel proffer was made to all indefinitely, and that they should leave it to God to determine the issue of it. If the house be worthy, it will reap the benefit of your blessing; if not, there is no harm done, you will not lose the benefit of it; it shall return to you. It becomes us to judge charitably of all, to pray heartily for all, and to conduct ourselves courteously to all, for that is our part.

Secondly, For direction to them. "If, upon your salutation, it appear that they are indeed worthy, let them have more of your company, and so let your peace come upon them; preach the gospel to them, peace by Jesus Christ; but if otherwise, if they carry it rudely to you, and shut their doors against you, let your peace, as much as in you lies, return to you. Retract what you have said, and turn your backs upon them. Great blessings are often lost by a neglect seemingly small and inconsiderable.

2. They are here directed how to carry it towards those that were refusers of them. The case is put (v. 14) of those that would not receive them, nor hear their words. There would be those that would slight them, and put contempt on them and their message. The best and most powerful preachers of the gospel must expect to meet with some, that will not so much as give them the hearing, nor show them any token of respect. Many turn a deaf ear, even to the joyful sound. Contempt of the gospel, and contempt of gospel ministers, commonly go together, and they will either of them be construed into a contempt of Christ, and will be reckoned for accordingly. Note.

(1) The directions given to the apostles what to do. They must depart out of that house or city. The gospel will not tarry long with those that put it away from them. At their departure they must shake off the dust of their feet in detestation of their wickedness. The apostles must not so much as carry away the dust of their city with them, as a denunciation of wrath against them. It was to signify that God would shake them off. They who despise God and his gospel shall be lightly esteemed.

(2) The doom passed upon such wilful recusants, v. 15. It shall be more tolerable, in the day of judgment, for the land of Sodom, as wicked a place as it was. They that would not hear the doctrine that would save them, shall be made to hear the sentence that will ruin them. There are different degrees of punishment in that day. Sodom and Gomorrah were exceedingly wicked (Gen. xiii. 13), and that which filled up the measure of their iniquity, was that they received not the angels that were sent to them, but abused them (Gen. xix. 4, 5), and hearkened not to their words, v. 14. And yet it will be more tolerable for them than for those who receive not Christ's ministers and hearken not to their words. Son, remember! will sound most dreadfully in the ears of such as had a fair offer made them of eternal life, and chose death rather.

Verses 16–42

All these verses relate to the sufferings of Christ's ministers in their work, which they are here taught to expect, and prepare for; they are directed also how to bear them, and how to go on with their work in the midst of them. This part of the sermon looks further than to their present mission. They are here forewarned of the troubles they should meet with, when, after Christ's resurrection, their commission should be enlarged. Christ tells them, they must expect greater sufferings than they were yet called to. It is good to be told what troubles we may hereafter meet with, that we may provide accordingly, and may not boast, as if we had put off the harness, when we are yet but girding it on.

We have here intermixed, I. Predictions of trouble: and, II. Prescriptions of counsel and comfort, with reference to it.

I. We have here predictions of trouble: which the disciples should meet with in their work: Christ foresaw their sufferings as well as his own, and yet will have them go on, as he went on himself; and he foretold them, not only that the troubles might not be a surprise to them, and so a shock to their faith, but that, being the accomplishment of a prediction, they might be a confirmation to their faith.

He tells them what they should suffer, and from whom.

1. What they should suffer: hard things to be sure; for, Behold, I send you forth as sheep in the midst of wolves, v. 16. And what may a flock of poor, helpless, unguarded sheep expect, in the midst of a herd of ravenous wolves, but to be worried and torn? They are as sheep among wolves, that is frightful; but Christ sends them forth, that is comfortable; for he that sends them forth will protect them, and bear them out.

(1) They must expect to be hated, v. 22. Ye shall be hated for my name's sake: that is the root of all the rest, and a bitter root it is. Those whom Christ loves, the world hates. If the world hated Christ without a cause (John xv. 25), no marvel if it hated those that bore his image and served his interests. It is grievous to be hated, and to be the object of so much ill-will, but it is for thy name's sake; which, as it speaks the true reason of the hatred, whatever is pretended, so it speaks comfort to them who are thus hated; it is for a good cause, and they have a good friend that shares with them in it, and takes it to himself.

(2) They must expect to be apprehended and arraigned as malefactors. Their restless malice is resistless malice, and they will not only attempt, but will prevail, to deliver you up to the councils (v. 17, 18). A deal of mischief is often done to good men, under colour of law and justice. They must look for trouble, not only from inferior magistrates in the councils, but from governors and kings, the supreme magistrates. We find this often fulfilled in the acts of the apostles.

(3) They must expect to be put to death (v. 21); They shall deliver them to death. The malice of the enemies rages so high as to inflict this; the faith and patience of the saints stand so firm as to expect this; the wisdom of Christ permits it, knowing how to make the blood of the martyrs the seal of the truth, and the seed of the church. By this noble army's not loving their lives to the death, Satan has been vanquished, and the kingdom of Christ and its interests greatly advanced.

(4) They must expect, in the midst of these sufferings, to be branded with the most odious and ignominious names and characters that could be. Persecutors would be ashamed in this world, if they did not first dress up those in bear-skins whom they thus bait, and represent them in such colours as may serve to justify such cruelties. The blackest of all the ill characters they give them is here stated; they call them Beelzebub, the name of the prince of the devils, v. 25. Since every one thinks he hates the devil, thus they endeavour to make them odious to all mankind. Satan's sworn enemies are represented as his friends; the apostles, who pulled down the devil's kingdom, were called devils. Satan's sworn servants would be thought to be his enemies, and they never more effectually do his work, than when they pretend to be fighting against him. Many times they who themselves are nearest akin to the devil, are most apt to father others upon him.

(5) These sufferings are here represented by a sword and division, v. 34, 35. Think not that I am come to send peace, temporal peace and outward prosperity. Christ came to give us peace with God, peace in our consciences, peace with our brethren, but in the world ye shall have tribulation. If all the world would receive Christ, there would then follow a universal peace, but while there are and will be so many that reject him, the children of God, that are called out of the world, must expect to feel the fruits of their enmity.

[1] Look not for peace, but a sword. Christ came to give the sword of the word, with which his disciples fight against the world, and the sword of persecution, with which the world fights against the disciples, being cut to the heart with the sword of the word (Acts vii. 54), and cruel work this sword made. Christ sent that gospel, which gives occasion for the drawing of this sword, and so may be said to send this sword.

[2] Look not for peace, but division (v. 35), I am come to set men at variance. This effect of the preaching of the gospel is not the fault of the gospel, but of those who do not receive it. The faith of those that believe condemns those that believe not, and, therefore, they have an enmity against them that believe. The most violent and implacable feuds have ever been those that have arisen from difference in religion; no enmity like that of the persecutors, no resolution like that of the persecuted. Christ has dealt fairly and faithfully with us, in telling us the worst we can meet with in his service; and he would have us deal so with ourselves, in sitting down and counting the cost.

2. We are here told from whom, and by whom, they should suffer these hard things. Surely hell itself must be let loose, and devils must become incarnate, ere such spiteful enemies could be found to a doctrine, the substance of which was goodwill toward men. No, would you think it? all this mischief arises to the preachers of the gospel from those to whom they came to preach salvation.

These hard things Christ's disciples must suffer,

(1) From men (v. 17). "Beware of men; you will have need to stand upon your guard." Persecuting rage and enmity turn men into brutes, into devils. It is a sad pass that the world is come to, when the best friends it has, have need to beware of men. It aggravates the troubles of Christ's suffering servants, that they arise from those who are bone of their bone, made of the same blood. The nature of man, if it be not sanctified, is the worst nature in the world next to that of devils.

(2) From professing men, men that have a form of godliness, and make a show of religion. They will scourge you in their synagogues, their places of meeting for the worship of God, and for the exercise of their church-discipline: so that they looked upon the scourging of Christ's ministers to be a branch of their religion. Paul was five times scourged in the synagogues, 2 Cor. xi. 24. Christ's disciples have suffered much from conscientious persecutors, that scourge them in their synagogues, cast them out and kill them, and think they do God good service (John xvi. 2).

(3) From great men, and men in authority. The Jews did not only scourge them, which was the utmost their remaining power extended to, but they delivered them up to the Roman powers, as they did Christ, John xviii. 30. Ye shall be brought before governors and kings (v. 18), who, having more power, are in a capacity of doing the more mischief.

(4) From all men (v. 22). Ye shall be hated of all men, of all wicked men, and these are the generality of men. So few are there that love, and own, and countenance Christ's righteous cause, that we may say, the friends of it are hated of all men. As far as the apostasy from God goes, so far the enmity against the saints goes; sometimes it appears more general than at other times, but there is something of this poison lurking in the hearts of all the children of disobedience.

(5) From those of their own kindred. The brother shall deliver up the brother to death, v. 21. A man shall be, upon this account, at variance with his own father; the persecuting daughter will be against the believing mother, where natural affection and filial duty, one would think, should prevent or soon extinguish the quarrel; and then, no marvel if the daughter-in-law be against the mother-in-law. In general, a man's foes shall be they of his own household (v. 36). They who should be his friends will be incensed against him for embracing Christianity, and especially for adhering to it when it comes to be persecuted, and will join with his persecutors against him. The strongest bonds of relative love and duty have often been broken through, by an enmity against Christ and his doctrine. Sufferings from such are more grievous; nothing cuts more than this, It was thou, a man, mine equal (Ps. lv. 12, 13); and the enmity of such is commonly most implacable; a brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city, Prov. xviii. 19.

II. With these predictions of trouble, we have here prescriptions of counsels and comforts for a time of trial. Let us gather up what he says,

1. By way of counsel and direction in several things.

(1) Be ye wise as serpents, v. 16. A precept, recommending to us that wisdom of the prudent, which is to understand his way, as useful at all times, but especially in suffering times. It is the will of Christ that his people and ministers, being so much exposed to troubles in this world, as they usually are, should not needlessly expose themselves, but use all fair and lawful means for their own preservation. In the cause of Christ we must sit loose to life and all its comforts, but must not be prodigal of them. We must be wise, not to pull trouble upon our own heads.

(2) Be ye harmless as doves. "Be mild, and meek, and dispassionate; not only do nobody any hurt, but bear nobody any ill will." We must be wise, not to wrong ourselves, but rather so than wrong anyone else; must use the harmlessness of the dove to bear twenty injuries, rather than the subtlety of the serpent to offer or to return one. The Spirit descended on Christ as a dove, and all believers partake of the Spirit of Christ, a dove-like spirit, made for love, not for war.

(3) Beware of men, v. 17. "Be always upon your guard, and avoid dangerous company; take heed what you say and do." It becomes those who are gracious to be cautious. We know not whom to trust. Ever since our Master was betrayed with a kiss, by one of his own disciples, we have need to beware of men.

(4) Take no thought how or what ye shall speak, v. 19. "When you are brought before magistrates, conduct yourselves decently, but afflict not yourselves with care how you shall come off. A prudent thought there must be, but not an anxious, perplexing, disquieting thought; let this care be cast upon God. Affect not quaint expressions, flourishes of wit, and laboured periods, which only serve to gild a bad cause; the gold of a good one needs it not." The disciples of Christ must be more thoughtful how to do well than how to speak well; how to keep their integrity than how to vindicate it. Our lives, not boasting words, form the best apology.

(5) When they persecute you in this city, flee to another, v. 23. "Thus reject them who reject you and your doctrine, and try whether others will not receive you and it. Thus shift for your own safety." In case of imminent peril, the disciples of Christ may and must secure themselves by flight, when God, in his providence, opens to them a door of escape. He that flies may fight again. It is no inglorious thing for Christ's soldiers to quit their ground, provided they do not quit their colours: they may go out of the way of danger, though they must not go out of the way of duty.

(6) Fear them not (v. 26), because they can but kill the body (v. 28). They who truly fear God, need not fear man; and they who are afraid of the least sin, need not be afraid of the greatest trouble. Yet will we not fear, though the earth be removed, while we have so good a God, so good a cause, and so good a hope through grace.

[1] A good reason against this fear, taken from the limited power of the enemies; they kill the body, that is the utmost their rage can extend to; they are not able to kill the soul, nor to do it any hurt, and the soul is the man. The soul is killed when it is separated from God and his love, which is its life; now this is out of the reach of their power. Tribulation, distress, and persecution may separate us from all the world, but cannot part between us and God, cannot make us either not to love him, or not to be loved by him, Rom. viii. 35, 37. If, therefore, we were more concerned about our souls, as our jewels, we should be less afraid of men. They can but crush the cabinet.

[2] A good remedy against it, and that is, to fear God. Fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell. Hell is the destruction both of soul and body; not of the being of either, but the well-being of both. This destruction comes from the power of God: he is able to destroy. God is therefore to be feared, even by the best saints in this world. The fear of God, and of his power reigning in the soul, will be a sovereign antidote against the fear of man. It is better to fall under the frowns of all the world, than under God's frowns, and therefore, as it is most right in itself, so it is most safe for us, to obey God rather than men, Acts iv. 19.

(7) What I tell you in darkness, that speak ye in light (v. 27); "whatever hazards you run, go on with your work, publishing and proclaiming the everlasting gospel to all the world; that is your business, mind that. The design of the enemies is not merely to destroy you, but to suppress that, and, therefore, whatever be the consequence, publish that." What I tell you, that speak ye. Many things Christ spake openly, and nothing in secret varying from what he preached in public, John xviii. 20. But they must deliver their embassy publicly, in the light, and upon the house-tops; for the doctrine of the gospel is what all are concerned in. The first indication of the reception of the Gentiles into the church, was upon a house-top, Acts x. 9. There is no part of Christ's gospel that needs, upon any account, to be concealed; the whole counsel of God must be revealed. In never so mixed a multitude let it be plainly and fully delivered.

2. By way of comfort and encouragement. Here is very much said to that purpose, and all little enough, considering the many hardships they were to grapple with, throughout the course of their ministry, and their present weakness. Christ therefore shows them why they should be of good cheer.

(1) Here is one word peculiar to their present mission, v. 23. Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come. It was a comfort, [1] That what they said should be made good: they said the Son of man is coming, and behold, he comes. Christ will confirm the word of his messengers. [2] That it should be made good quickly. It is matter of comfort to Christ's labourers, that their working time will be short, and soon over; the work and warfare will in a little time be accomplished. [3] That then they should be advanced to a higher station. When the Son of man comes, they shall be endued with greater power from on high.

(2) Here are many words that relate to their work in general, and the troubles they were to meet with in it; and they are good words and comfortable words.

[1] That their sufferings were for a testimony against them and the Gentiles, v. 18. When the Jewish consistories transfer you to the Roman governors, that they may have you put to death, your being hurried thus from one judgment-seat to another, will help to make your testimony the more public, and will give you an opportunity of bringing the gospel to the Gentiles, as well as to the Jews. God's people, and especially God's ministers, are his witnesses not only in their doing work, but in their suffering work. Hence they are called martyrs—witnesses for Christ. Now if their sufferings be a testimony, how cheerfully should they be borne!

[2] That upon all occasions they should have God's special presence with them, and the immediate assistance of his Holy Spirit, it shall be given you (said Christ) in that same hour what ye shall speak. Christ's disciples were chosen from among the foolish of the world, unlearned and ignorant men, and, therefore, might justly distrust their own abilities, especially when they were called before great men. First, they are here promised that it should be given them, not sometime before, but in that same hour, what they should speak. They shall speak extempore, and yet shall speak as much to the purpose, as if it had been never so well studied. When God calls us out to speak for him, we may depend upon him to teach us what to say. Secondly, They are here assured, that the blessed Spirit should draw up their plea for them. It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father, which speaketh in you, v. 20. They were not left to themselves upon such an occasion, but God undertook for them; his Spirit of wisdom spoke in them. God gave them an ability, not only to speak to the purpose, but what they did say, to say it with holy zeal. The same Spirit that assisted them in the pulpit, assisted them at the bar. They cannot but come off well, who have such an advocate.

[3] That he that endures to the end shall be saved, v. 22. Here it is very comfortable to consider, First, that there will be an end of these troubles; they may last long, but will not last always. Christ comforted himself with this, and so may his followers; The things concerning me have an end, Luke xxii. 37. The troubles may seem tedious, but, blessed be God, they are not everlasting. Secondly, That while they continue, they may be endured; they may be borne, and borne to the end, because the sufferers shall be borne up under them, in everlasting arms: The strength shall be according to the day, 1 Cor. x. 13. Thirdly, Salvation will be the eternal recompence of all those that endure to the end. The weather stormy, and the way foul, but the pleasure of home will make amends for all. They who endure but awhile, and in time of temptation fall away, have run in vain, and lose all that they have attained; but they who persevere, are sure of the prize, and they only. Be faithful unto death, and then thou shalt have the crown of life.

[4] That whatever hard usage the disciples of Christ meet with, it is no more than what their Master met with before (v. 24, 25). The disciple is not above his master. Here it is given as a reason, why they should not stumble at the hardest sufferings. They are reminded of this saying, John xv. 20. It is a proverbial expression, The servant is not better than his master, and, therefore, let him not expect to fare better. Jesus Christ our Lord and Master met with very hard usage from the world; they called him Beelzebub, the god of flies, the name of the chief of the devils, with whom they said he was in league. It is hard to say which is here more to be wondered at, the wickedness of men who thus abused Christ, or the patience of Christ, who suffered himself to be thus abused; that Satan's greatest Enemy and Destroyer should be run down as his confederate, and yet endure such contradiction of sinners. The consideration of the ill treatment which Christ met with in the world, should engage us to expect and prepare for the like, and to bear it patiently; nor think it hard if they who are shortly to be made like him in glory, be now made like him in sufferings. Christ began in the bitter cup, let us be willing to pledge him; his bearing the cross made it easy for us.

[5] That there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed, v. 26. We understand this, First, Of the revealing of the gospel to all the world. "Do you publish it (v. 27), for it shall be published. The truths which are now, as mysteries, hid from the children of men, shall all be made known, to all nations, in their own language," Acts ii. 11. The ends of the earth must see this salvation. It is a great encouragement to those who are doing Christ's work, that it is a work which shall certainly be done. It is a plough which God will speed. Or, Secondly, Of the clearing up of the innocency of Christ's suffering servants. However their innocency and excellency are now covered, they shall be revealed. All their reproach shall be rolled away, and their graces and services, that are now covered, shall be revealed, 1 Cor. iv. 5. Let Christ's ministers faithfully reveal his truths, and then leave it to him, in due time, to reveal their integrity.

[6] That the providence of God is in a special manner conversant about the saints, in their suffering, v. 29–31. It is good to have recourse to our first principles, and particularly to the doctrine of God's universal providence, extending itself to all the creatures, and all their actions, even the smallest and most minute.

First, The general extent of providence to all the creatures, even the least, and least considerable, to the sparrows, v. 29. These little animals are of so small account, that one of them is not valued; there must go two to be worth a farthing (nay, you shall have five for a halfpenny, Luke xii. 6), and yet they are not shut out of the divine care; One of them shall not fall to the ground without your Father. They do not light on the ground for food, to pick up a grain of corn, but your heavenly Father, by his providence, laid it ready for them. Now he that feeds the sparrows, will not starve the saints. They do not fall to the ground by death, either a natural or a violent death, without the notice of God. Even their death comes within the notice of the divine providence; much more does the death of his disciples. Now this God, who has such an eye to the sparrows, because they are his creatures, much more will have an eye to you, who are his children. If a sparrow die not without your Father, surely a man does not,—a Christian,—a minister,—my friend, my child. There is enough in the doctrine of God's providence to silence all the fears of God's people: Ye are of more value than many sparrows.

Secondly, The particular cognizance which providence takes of the disciples of Christ, especially in their sufferings (v. 30), But the very hairs of your head are all numbered. This is a proverbial expression, denoting the account which God takes and keeps of all the concernments of his people, even of those that are most minute, and least regarded. If God numbers their hairs, much more does he number their heads, and take care of their lives, their comforts, their souls. It intimates, that God takes more care of them, than they do of themselves. God numbers the hairs of his people, and not a hair of their head shall perish (Luke xxi. 18); not the least hurt shall be done them so precious to God are his saints, and their lives and deaths!

[7] That he will shortly, in the day of triumph, own those who now own him, in the day of trial, when those who deny him shall be for ever disowned and rejected by him, v. 32, 33. It is our duty, and if we do it, it will hereafter be our unspeakable honour and happiness, to confess Christ before men. It is our duty, not only to believe in Christ, but to profess that faith, in suffering for him, when we are called to it, as well as in serving him. However this may expose us to reproach and trouble now, we shall be abundantly recompensed for that, in the resurrection of the just. "I will confess him before my Father, when it will do him the most service; I will present him, will represent him to my Father." Those who honour Christ he will thus honour. They honour him before men; that is a poor thing: he will honour them before his Father; that is a great thing. It is a dangerous thing for any to deny and disown Christ before men; for they who do so will be disowned by him in the great day, when they have most need of him: he will not own them for his servants who would not own him for their Master: I tell you, I know you not, ch. vii. 23.

[8] That the foundation of their discipleship was laid in such a temper and disposition, as would make sufferings very light and easy to them; and it was upon the condition of a preparedness for suffering, that Christ took them to be his followers, v. 37–39. He told them at first, that they were not worthy of him, if they were not willing to part with all for him. Now, in the Christian profession, they are reckoned unworthy the dignity and felicity of it, that put not such a value upon their interest in Christ, as to prefer that before any other interests. They cannot expect the gains of a bargain, who will not come up to the terms of it. If religion be worth *any*thing, it is worth *every*thing. They who like not Christ on these terms, may leave him at their peril. Whatever we part with for this pearl of price, we may comfort ourselves with this persuasion, that it is well worth what we give for it. The terms are, that we must prefer Christ.

(1) Before our nearest and dearest relations; father or mother, son or daughter. Children must love their parents, and parents must love their children; but if they love them better than Christ, they are unworthy of him. As we must not be deterred from Christ by the hatred of our relations which he spoke of (v. 21, 35, 36), so we must not be drawn from him, by their love.

(2) Before our ease and safety. We must take up our cross and follow him, else we are not worthy of him. Here observe, 1. They who would follow Christ, must expect their cross and take it up. 2. In taking up the cross, we must follow Christ's example, and bear it as he did. 3. It is a great encouragement to us, when we meet with crosses, that in bearing them we follow Christ, who has showed us the way, and that if we follow him faithfully, he will lead us through sufferings like him, to glory with him.

(3) Before life itself, v. 39. He that findeth his life shall lose it; he that thinks he has found it when he has saved it, and kept it, by denying Christ, shall lose it in an eternal death; but he that loseth his life for Christ's sake, that will part with it rather than deny Christ, shall find it, to his unspeakable advantage, an eternal life. They are best prepared for the life to come, that sit most loose to this present life.

[9] That Christ himself would so heartily espouse their cause, as to show himself a friend to all their friends, v. 40–42. He that receiveth you, receiveth me.

It is here implied, that though the generality would reject them, yet they should meet with some who would receive and entertain them, would bid the message welcome to their hearts, and the messengers to their houses, for the sake of it. Christ's ministers shall not labour in vain.

Jesus Christ takes what is done to his faithful ministers, whether in kindness or in unkindness, as done to himself, and reckons himself treated as they are treated. He that receiveth you, receiveth me. See how Christ may still be entertained by those who would testify their respects to him; his people and ministers we have always with us; and he is with them always, even to the end of the world. Nay, the honour rises higher, He that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me. By entertaining Christ's ministers, they entertain not angels unawares, but Christ, nay, and God himself, and unawares too, as appears, ch. xxv. 37. When saw we thee an hungered?

Though the kindness done to Christ's disciples be never so small, yet if there be occasion for it, and ability to do no more, it shall be accepted, though it be but a cup of cold water given to one of these little ones, v. 42. Kindnesses shown to Christ's disciples are valued in Christ's books, not according to the cost of the gift, but according to the love and affection of the giver. On that score the widow's mite not only passed current, but was stamped high, Luke xxi. 3, 4. Thus they who are truly rich in graces may be rich in good works, though poor in the world.

Kindness to Christ's disciples which he will accept, must be done with an eye to Christ, and for his sake. A prophet must be received in the name of a prophet, and a righteous man in the name of a righteous man, and one of those little ones in the name of a disciple; because they are righteous, and so bear Christ's image. Christ does not interest himself in the matter, unless we first interest him in it.

Kindnesses shown to Christ's people and ministers, shall not only be accepted, but richly and suitably rewarded. He does not say, that they deserve a reward; we cannot merit anything as wages, from the hand of God; but they shall receive a reward from the free gift of God; and they shall in no wise lose it. The reward may be deferred, but it shall in no wise be lost, nor shall they be any losers by the delay. 2. This is a prophet's reward, and a righteous man's. That is, either, (1) The reward that God gives to prophets and righteous men; the blessings conferred upon them shall distil upon their friends. Or, (2) The reward he gives by prophets and righteous men; in answer to their prayers (Gen. xx. 7), He is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, that is a prophet's reward. Prophets' rewards are spiritual blessings in heavenly things, and if we know how to value them, we shall reckon them good payment.

CHAP. XI

In this chapter we have, I. The constant and unwearied diligence of our Lord Jesus, ver. 1. II. His discourse with the disciples of John concerning his being the Messiah, 2–6. III. The honourable testimony that Christ bore to John Baptist, ver. 7–15. IV. The sad account he gives of that generation in general, and of some particular places with reference to the success, both of John's ministry and of his own, ver. 16–24. V. His thanksgiving to his Father for the wise and gracious method he had taken in revealing the great mysteries of the gospel, ver. 25, 26. VI. His gracious call and invitation of poor sinners to come to him, ver. 27–30.

Verses 1–6

The first verse of this chapter some join to the foregoing chapter, and make it (not unfitly) the close of that.

1. The ordination sermon which Christ preached to his disciples in the foregoing chapter is here called his commanding them. Their preaching of the gospel was not only permitted them, but it was enjoined them. Necessity was laid upon them, 1 Cor. ix. 16.

2. When Christ had said what he had to say to his disciples, he departed thence. It should seem they were very loth to leave their Master, till he departed and separated himself from them; as the nurse withdraws the hand, that the child may learn to go by itself. Christ would now teach them how to live, and how to work, without his bodily presence. It was expedient for them, that Christ should thus go away for awhile.

3. Christ departed, to teach and preach in the cities whither he sent his disciples before him to work miracles (ch. x. 1–8), and so to raise people's expectations, and to make way for his entertainment. Thus was the way of the Lord prepared. When Christ empowered them to work miracles, he employed himself in teaching and preaching, as if that were the more honourable of the two. That was but in order to do this. Healing the sick was the saving of bodies, but preaching the gospel was to the saving of souls. Christ had directed his disciples to preach (ch. x. 7), yet he did not leave off preaching himself. How unlike are they to Christ, who yoke others only that they may themselves be idle! The increase and multitude of labourers in the Lord's work should be made not an excuse for our negligence, but an encouragement to our diligence. The more busy others are, the more busy we should be, and all little enough, so much work is there to be done. He went to preach in their cities, which were populous places; he cast the net of the gospel where there were most fish to be enclosed.

Here is next recorded a message which John Baptist sent to Christ, and his return to it, v. 2–6. We heard before that Jesus heard of John's sufferings, ch. iv. 12. Now we are told that John, in prison, hears of Christ's doings. He heard in the prison the works of Christ; and no doubt he was glad to hear of them. Nothing is more comfortable to God's people in distress, than to hear of the works of Christ; especially to experience them in their own souls. This turns a prison into a palace. Some way or other Christ will convey the notices of his love to those that are in trouble for conscience' sake.

Now John Baptist hearing of Christ's works, sent two of his disciples to him; and what passed between them and him we have here an account of.

I. The question they had to propose to him: Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another? This was a serious and important question. It is taken for granted that the Messiah should come. They intimate, that if this be not he, they would look for another. We must not be weary of looking for him that is to come. Though he tarry, wait for him, for he that shall come will come, though not in our time. They intimate likewise, that if they be convinced that this is he, they will not be sceptics, they will be satisfied, and will look for no other. They therefore ask, Art thou he? John had said for his part, I am not the Christ, John i. 20. Some think that John sent this question for his own satisfaction. It is true he had borne a noble testimony to Christ; he had declared him to be the Son of God (John i. 34), the Lamb of God (v. 29), and he that should baptize with the Holy Ghost (v. 33), and sent of God (John iii. 34), which were great things. But he desired to be further and more fully assured. In matters relating to Christ and our salvation by him, it is good to be sure. Christ appeared not in that external pomp and power in which it was expected he should appear; his own disciples stumbled at this, and perhaps John did so; Christ saw something of this at the bottom of this enquiry, when he said, blessed is he who shall not be offended in me. It is hard, even for good men, to bear up against vulgar errors. John's doubt might arise from his own present circumstances. He was a prisoner, and might be tempted to think, if Jesus be indeed the Messiah, whence is it that I, his friend and forerunner, am brought into this trouble, and am left to be so long in it. Doubtless there was a good reason why our Lord Jesus did not go to John in prison, but John construed it into a neglect, and it was perhaps a shock to his faith in Christ. [1] Where there is true faith, yet there may be a mixture of unbelief. The best are not always alike strong. [2] Troubles for Christ, especially when they continue long unrelieved, are such trials of faith as sometimes prove too hard to be borne up against. [3] The remaining unbelief of good men may sometimes, in an hour of temptation, strike at the root, and call in question the most fundamental truths which were thought to be well settled. The best saints have need of the best helps they can get for the strengthening of their faith, and the arming of themselves against temptations to infidelity. Others think that John sent his disciples to Christ with this question, not so much for his own satisfaction as for theirs. Though he was a prisoner they adhered to him, attended on him; they loved him, and would not leave him. They were weak in knowledge, and wavering in their faith, and needed instruction and confirmation; and in this matter they were somewhat prejudiced; being jealous for their master, they were jealous of our Master; they were loth to acknowledge Jesus to be the Messiah, because he eclipsed John. Good men are apt to have their judgments biassed by their interest. Now John would have their mistakes rectified, and wished them to be as well satisfied as he himself was. John was all along industrious to turn over his disciples to Christ, as from the grammar-school to the academy. Ministers' business is to direct everybody to Christ. And those who would know the certainty of the doctrine of Christ, must apply themselves to him, who is come to give an understanding. They who would grow in grace must be inquisitive.

II. Here is Christ's answer to this question, v. 4–6. It was a real answer, an answer in fact. Christ will have us to spell out the convincing evidences of gospel truths, and to take pains in digging for knowledge.

1. He points them to what they heard and saw, which they must tell John. Christ refers us to the things we hear and see. Go and tell John.

(1) What you see of the power of Christ's miracles; you see how, by the word of Jesus, the blind receive their sight, the lame walk, &c. Christ's miracles were done openly, and in the view of all. Truth seeks not concealment. They are to be considered, [1] As the acts of a divine power. None but the God of nature could thus overrule and outdo the power of nature. It is particularly spoken of as God's prerogative to open the eyes of the blind, Ps. cxlvi. 8. Miracles are therefore the broad seal of heaven, and the doctrine they are affixed to must be of God. However lying wonders may be vouched for in proof of false doctrines, true miracles evince a divine commission; such Christ's were, and they leave no room to doubt that he was sent of God. [2] As the accomplishment of a divine prediction. It was foretold (Isa. xxxv. 5, 6), that our God should come, and that then the eyes of the blind should be opened.

(2) Tell him what you hear of the preaching of his gospel. Faith, though confirmed by seeing, comes by hearing. That the poor have the gospel preached to them. The Old Testament prophets were sent mostly to kings and princes, but Christ preached to the congregations of the poor. Christ's gracious condescensions and compassions to the poor, are an evidence that it was he that should bring to the world the tender mercies of our God. Or we may understand it, not so much of the poor of the world, as the poor in spirit, and so that scripture is fulfilled, Isa. lxi. 1, He hath anointed me to preach glad tidings to the meek. It is a proof of Christ's divine mission that his doctrine is gospel indeed; good news to those who are truly humble in the denial of self; to them it is accommodated, for whom God always declared he had mercy in store. That the poor receive the gospel, and are wrought upon by it, they receive and entertain the gospel. The wonderful efficacy of the gospel is a proof of its divine original. The poor are wrought upon by it. The gospel of Christ made its way into their untutored minds.

2. He pronounces a blessing on those that were not offended in him, v. 6. They who are not wilfully prejudiced against him, and scandalized in him (so the word is), cannot but receive his doctrine, and so be blessed in him. There are many things in Christ which they who are ignorant and unthinking are apt to be offended at. The meanness of his appearance, his education at Nazareth, the poverty of his life, the despicableness of his followers, the slights which the great men put upon him, the strictness of his doctrine, the contradiction it gives to flesh and blood, and the sufferings that attend the profession of his name; these are things that keep many from him, who otherwise cannot but see much of God in him. Thus he is set for the fall of many, even in Israel. They are happy who get over these offences. Blessed are they. The expression intimates, that it is a difficult thing to conquer these prejudices, and a dangerous thing not to conquer them.

Some of Christ's disciples might perhaps take occasion from the question John sent, to reflect upon him, as weak and wavering, and inconsistent with himself, to prevent which Christ gives him this character. We must take all occasions, especially such as discover anything of infirmity, to speak well of those who are praiseworthy. John the Baptist, when he was upon the stage, and Christ in privacy and retirement, bore testimony to Christ; and now that Christ appeared publicly, and John was under a cloud, he bore testimony to John. John had abased himself to honour Christ (John iii. 29, 30, ch. iii. 11), had made himself nothing, that Christ might be All, and now Christ dignifies him with this character. They who humble themselves shall be exalted, and those that honour Christ he will honour. John had now finished his testimony, and now Christ commends him. Christ reserves honour for his servants when they have done their work, John xii. 26.

I. Christ spoke thus honourably of John, not in the hearing of John's disciples, but as they departed, just after they were gone, Luke vii. 24. He would not so much as seem to flatter John, nor have these praises of him reported to him. Though we must be forward to give to all their due praise for their encouragement, yet we must avoid everything that looks like flattery. Pride is a corrupt humour, which we must not feed either in others or in ourselves.

II. What Christ said concerning John, was intended not only for his praise, but for the people's profit, to revive the remembrance of John's ministry. "Now, consider, what went ye out into the wilderness to see? Put this question to yourselves." 1. John preached in the wilderness. If teachers be removed into corners, it is better to go on after them than to be without them. Now if his preaching was worth taking so much pains to hear it, surely it was worth taking some care to recollect it. The greater the difficulties we have broken through to hear the word, the more we are concerned to profit by it. 2. They went out to him to see him; rather for curiosity than for conscience. Many that attend on the word come rather to see and be seen, than to learn and be taught, to have something to talk of, than to be made wise to salvation. Christ puts it to them, what went ye out to see? We think when the sermon is done, the care is over; no, then the greatest of the care begins. What brought you thither? Was it custom or company, or was it a desire to honour God and get good? What have you brought thence? What knowledge, and grace, and comfort? What went you to see?

III. Let us see what the commendation of John was. Well, says Christ, "I will tell you what a man John the Baptist was."

1. "He was a firm, resolute man, and not a reed shaken with the wind. He was not wavering in his principles, nor uneven in his conversation." When the wind of popular applause on the one hand blew fresh and fair, when the storm of Herod's rage on the other hand grew fierce and blustering, John was still the same, the same in all weathers. The testimony he had borne to Christ was not the testimony of a reed; it was not a weather-cock testimony. The people flocked to him, because he was not as a reed. There is nothing lost in the long run by an unshaken resolution, to go on with our work, neither courting the smiles, nor fearing the frowns of men.

2. He was a self-denying man. "Was he a man clothed in soft raiment? If so, you would not have gone into the wilderness to see him, but to the court. You went to see one that had his raiment of camel's hair, and a leathern girdle about his loins; his clothing agreed with the wilderness he lived in, and the doctrine he preached there, that of repentance. Now you cannot think that he who was such a stranger to the pleasures of a court, should be brought to change his mind by the terrors of a prison." They who have lived a life of mortification, are least likely to be driven off from their religion by persecution. He was not a man clothed in soft raiment; such there are, but they are in kings' houses. It becomes people in all their appearances to be consistent with their character and their situation. They who are preachers must not affect to look like courtiers. Prudence teaches us to be of a piece.

3. His greatest commendation of all was his office and ministry.

(1) He was a prophet, yea, and more than a prophet (v. 9). John said of himself, he was not that prophet, that great prophet, the Messiah himself; and now Christ (a very competent Judge) says of him, that he was more than a prophet. The forerunner of Christ was not a king, but a prophet, a transcendent prophet, more than an Old Testament prophet; they saw Christ's day at a distance; but John saw the day dawn, he saw the sun rise. They spake of Christ, but he pointed to him: he said, Behold the Lamb of God!

(2) He was the same that was predicted to be Christ's forerunner (v. 10); This is he of whom it is written. He was prophesied of by the other prophets, and therefore was greater than they. Malachi prophesied concerning John, Behold, I send my messenger before thy face. It was great preferment to John above all the prophets, that he was Christ's harbinger. He was a messenger sent on a great errand; he is my messenger sent of God, and sent before the Son of God. His business was to prepare Christ's way. This he had said of himself (John i. 23) and now Christ said it of him. Much of the beauty of God's dispensations lies in their mutual connection and coherence, and the reference they have one to another. That which advanced John above the Old Testament prophets was, that he went immediately before Christ. The nearer any are to Christ, the more truly honourable they are.

(3) There was not a greater born of women than John the Baptist, v. 11. Christ knew how to value persons according to the degrees of their worth, and he prefers John before all that went before him. Of all that God had raised up and called to any service in his church, John is the most eminent. Many had been born of women that made a great figure in the world, but Christ prefers John before them. Greatness is not to be measured by appearances and outward splendour, but they are the greatest men who are the greatest saints, and the greatest blessings, who are, as John was, great in the sight of the Lord, Luke i. 15.

Notwithstanding, he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he. There are degrees of glory in heaven, some that are less than others there; though every vessel is alike full, all are not alike large and capacious. The least saint in heaven is greater, and knows more, and loves more, and does more in praising God, and receives more from him, than the greatest in this world. By the kingdom of heaven here, is rather to be understood the kingdom of grace, the gospel dispensation in the perfection of its power and purity; and ὁ μικρότερος —he that is less in that is greater than John. So it agrees with what John the Baptist said (John i. 15), He that cometh after me is preferred before me. But it is rather to be understood of the apostles and ministers of the New Testament. John preached Christ coming, but they preached Christ not only come, but crucified and glorified. John came to the dawning of the gospel-day, but he was taken off before the noon of that day, before the rending of the veil, before Christ's death and resurrection, and the pouring out of the Spirit; so that the least of the apostles and evangelists, having greater discoveries made to them, and being employed in a greater embassy, is greater than John. All the true greatness of men is derived from, and denominated by, the gracious manifestation of Christ to them. What reason have we to be thankful that our lot is cast in the days of the kingdom of heaven, under such advantages of light and love! And the greater the advantages, the greater will the account be, if we receive the grace of God in vain.

(4) The great commendation of John the Baptist was, that God owned his ministry, and made it wonderfully successful for the breaking of the ice, and the preparing of people for the kingdom of heaven. From the days of the first appearing of John the Baptist, until now *the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence—Βιάζεται—vim patitur*, like the violence of an army taking a city by storm, or of a crowd bursting into a house, so the violent take it by force. Multitudes are wrought upon by the ministry of John, and become his disciples. And it is,

[1] An improbable multitude. Those strove for a place in this kingdom, that one would think had no right nor title to it, and so seemed to be intruders. When the children of the kingdom are excluded out of it, and many come into it from the east and the west, then it suffers violence. The publicans and harlots believed John, whom the scribes and Pharisees rejected, and so went into the kingdom of God before them. It is no breach of good manners to go to heaven before our betters: and it is a great commendation of the gospel from the days of its infancy, that it has brought many to holiness that were very unlikely.

[2] An importunate multitude. This violence denotes a strength, and vigour, and earnestness of desire and endeavour, in those who followed John's ministry. It shows us also, what fervency and zeal are required of all those who design to make heaven of their religion. They who would enter into the kingdom of heaven must strive to enter; that kingdom suffers a holy violence; we must run, and wrestle, and fight, and be in an agony, and all little enough to win such a prize, and to get over such opposition from without and from within. The violent take it by force. They who will have an interest in the great salvation are carried out towards it with a strong desire, will have it upon any terms, and not think them hard, nor quit their hold without a blessing, Gen. xxxii. 26. The kingdom of heaven was never intended to indulge the ease of triflers, but to be the rest of them that labour. Oh that we could see a greater number with a holy contention thrusting themselves into it!

(5) The ministry of John was the beginning of the gospel.

[1] In John the Old Testament dispensation began to die, v. 13. The discoveries of the Old Testament began to be superseded by the more clear manifestation of the kingdom of heaven as at hand. When Christ says, all the prophets and the law prophesied until John, he shows us, First, How the light of the Old Testament was set up; it was set up in the law and the prophets, who spoke, though darkly, of Christ and his kingdom. Blessed be God that we have both the New Testament doctrine to explain the Old Testament prophecies, and the Old Testament prophecies to confirm and illustrate the New Testament doctrine (Heb. i. 1); like the two cherubim, they look at each other. The scripture is teaching to this day, though the penmen of it are gone. Moses and the prophets are dead; the apostles and evangelists are dead (Zech. i. 5), but the word of the Lord endures for ever (1 Pet. i. 25). Secondly, How this light was laid aside. Even before the sun rises, the morning light makes candles to shine dim. Their prophecies of a Christ to come became out of date, when John said, He is come.

[2] In him the New Testament day began to dawn; for (v. 14) This is Elias, that was for to come. John was as the loop that coupled the two Testaments. The concluding prophecy of the Old Testament was, Behold, I will send you Elijah, Mal. iv. 5, 6. Those words prophesied until John, and then, being turned into a history, they ceased to prophesy. Christ speaks of it as a great truth, that John the Baptist is the Elias of the New Testament; one that should come in the spirit and power of Elias (Luke i. 17), and especially as it is in the prophecy, that should turn the hearts of the fathers to the children. Christ suspects the welcome of it, if ye will receive it. Not but that it was true, whether they would receive it or not, but he upbraids them with their prejudices. Or, "If you will receive him, or if you will receive the ministry of John as that of the promised Elias, he will be an Elias to you, to turn you and prepare you for the Lord." Christ is a Saviour, and John an Elias, to those who will receive the truth concerning them.

Lastly, Our Lord Jesus closes this discourse with a solemn demand of attention (v. 15): He that hath ears to hear, let him hear; which intimates, that those things were dark and hard to be understood, and therefore needed attention, but of great concern and consequence, and therefore well deserved it. The things of God are of great and common concern: everyone that has ears to hear anything, is concerned to hear this. It intimates that God requires no more from us but the right use and improvement of the faculties he has already given us. He requires those to hear that have ears. They do not hear, because, like the deaf adder, they stop their ears.

Christ was going on in the praise of John the Baptist and his ministry, but here stops on a sudden, and turns that to the reproach of those who enjoyed both that, and the ministry of Christ and his apostles, too, in vain. As to that generation, we may observe to whom he compares them (v. 16–19), and as to the particular places he instances, we may observe with whom he compares them, v. 20–24.

I. As to that generation. The generality continued in unbelief and obstinacy. John was a great and good man, but the generation in which his lot was cast was as barren and unprofitable as could be, and unworthy of him. The badness of the places where good ministers live serves for a foil to their beauty. Having commended John, he condemns those who had him among them, and did not profit by his ministry.

This our Lord Jesus here sets forth in a parable. Whereunto shall I liken this generation? The similitude is taken from some common custom among the Jewish children at their play, who, as is usual with children, imitated the fashions of grown people at their marriages and funerals, rejoicing and lamenting; but being all a jest, it made no impression; no more did the ministry either of John the Baptist or of Christ upon that generation.

The parable will be best explained by opening it and the illustration of it together in these five observations.

Note, 1. The God of heaven uses a variety of proper means and methods for the conversion and salvation of poor souls; he would have all men to be saved, and therefore leaves no stone unturned in order to it. In the parable, this is called his piping to us, and his mourning to us; he hath piped to us in the precious promises of the gospel, proper to work upon hope, and mourned to us in the dreadful threatenings of the law, proper to work upon fear. He has piped to us in gracious and merciful providences, mourned to us in calamitous, afflicting providences.

In the explanation of the parable is set forth the different temper of John's ministry and of Christ's. On the one hand, John came mourning to them, neither eating nor drinking. Now this, one would think, should work upon them; for such an austere, mortified life as this, was very agreeable to the doctrine he preached: and that minister is most likely to do good, whose conversation is according to his doctrine; and yet the preaching even of such a minister is not always effectual. On the other hand, the Son of man came eating and drinking, and so he piped unto them. Christ conversed familiarly with all sorts of people, not affecting any peculiar strictness or austerity. Those who were not awed by John's frowns, would be allured by Christ's smiles; from whom St. Paul learned to become all things to all men, 1 Cor. ix. 22. There may be a great diversity of operations, where it is the same God that worketh all in all (1 Cor. xii. 6), and this various manifestation of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal, v. 7. Observe especially that God's ministers are variously gifted. Some are Boanerges—sons of thunder; others, Barnabases—sons of consolation; yet all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit (1 Cor. xii. 11), and therefore we ought not to condemn either, but to praise both, and praise God for both.

Note, 2. The various methods which God takes for the conversion of sinners, are with many fruitless and ineffectual: "Ye have not danced, ye have not lamented." Now if people will neither be awakened by the greatest things, nor allured by the sweetest things, nor startled by the most terrible things, nor be made sensible by the plainest things; if they will hearken to the voice neither of scripture, nor reason, nor experience, nor providence, nor conscience, nor interest, what more can be done? It is some comfort to faithful ministers, when they see little success of their labours, that it is no new thing for the best preachers and the best preaching in the world to come short of the desired end. Who has believed our report?

Note, 3. That commonly those persons who do not profit by the means of grace, are perverse, they do all the hurt they can to others, by raising and propagating prejudices against the word, and the faithful preachers of it. So this generation did; because they were resolved not to believe Christ and John, they set themselves to abuse them, and to represent them as the worst. As for John the Baptist, they say, He has a devil. They imputed his strictness and reservedness to melancholy, and some kind or degree of a possession of Satan. As for Jesus Christ, they imputed his free and obliging conversation to the more vicious habit of luxury and flesh-pleasing: Behold a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber. No reflection could be more foul and invidious; yet none could be more false and unjust; for Christ pleased not himself (Rom. xv. 3), nor did ever any man live such a life of self-denial, mortification, and contempt of the world, as Christ lived. The most unspotted innocency, and the most unparalleled excellency, will not always be a fence against the reproach of tongues; nay, a man's best gifts and best actions may be made the matter of his reproach. The best of our actions may become the worst of our accusations. It was true in some sense, that Christ was a Friend to publicans and sinners, the best Friend they ever had, for he came into the world to save sinners; but this is, and will be to eternity, Christ's praise, and they forfeited the benefit of it who thus turned it to his reproach.

Note, 4. They are like children sitting in the markets; they are foolish as children, froward as children, mindless and playful as children; would they but show themselves men in understanding, there would be some hopes of them. The market-place they sit in is to some a place of idleness (ch. xx. 3); to others a place of worldly business (James iv. 13); to all a place of noise or diversion. Their heads, and hands, and hearts are full of the world, the cares of which choke the word, and choke their souls at last. Thus in the markets they are, and there they sit; in these things their hearts rest, and by them they resolve to abide.

Note, 5. Though the means of grace be thus slighted and abused by many, by the most, yet there is a remnant that through grace do improve them. But wisdom is justified of her children. Christ is Wisdom; in him are hid treasures of wisdom. The gospel is wisdom, it is the wisdom from above: true believers are begotten again by it, and born from above too: they are wise children. These children of wisdom justify wisdom; they comply with the designs of Christ's grace. The publicans justified God, being baptized with the baptism of John, and afterwards embracing the gospel of Christ. Paul is not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, because, whatever it is to others, to them that believe it is the power of God unto salvation, Rom. i. 16. When the cross of Christ, which to others is foolishness and a stumbling-block, is to them that are called the wisdom of God and the power of God (1 Cor. i. 23, 24), here is wisdom justified of her children. If the unbelief of some reproach Christ by giving him the lie, the faith of others shall honour him by setting to its seal that he is true, and that he also is wise, 1 Cor. i. 25. Whether we do it or not, it will be done. That generation is not passed away, but remains in a succession of the like; for as it was then, it has been since and is still; some believe the things which are spoken, and some believe not.

II. As to the particular places in which Christ was most conversant. Then began he to upbraid them, v. 20. He began to preach to them long before (ch. iv. 17), but he did not begin to upbraid till now. Rough and unpleasing methods must not be taken, till gentler means have first been used. Christ is not apt to upbraid. Wisdom first invites, but when her invitations are slighted, then she upbraids. Those do not go in Christ's method, who begin with upbraidings.

1. The sin charged upon them; the most shameful, ungrateful thing that could be, that they repented not. Wilful impenitency is the great damning sin of multitudes that enjoy the gospel. The great doctrine that both John the Baptist and Christ, and the apostles preached, was repentance; the great thing designed, both in the piping and in the mourning, was to prevail with people to change their minds and ways, to leave their sins and turn to God; and this they would not be brought to. Christ reproved them for their other sins, that he might lead them to repentance; but when they repented not, He upbraided them with it, that they might upbraid themselves, and might at length see the folly of it, as that which alone makes the sad case a desperate one, and the wound incurable.

2. The aggravation of the sin; they were the cities in which most of his mighty works were done. By Christ's mighty works they should have been prevailed with, not only to receive his doctrine, but to obey his law; the curing of bodily diseases should have been the healing of their souls, but it had not that effect. The stronger inducements we have to repent, the more heinous is the impenitency and the severer will the reckoning be.

(1) Chorazin and Bethsaida are here instanced (v. 21, 22), they have each of them their woe: Woe unto thee, Chorazin, woe unto thee, Bethsaida. Christ came into the world to bless us; but if that blessing be slighted, he has woes in reserve, and his woes are of all others the most terrible. These two cities were rich and populous places; Bethsaida was lately advanced to a city by Philip the tetrarch; out of it Christ took at least three of his apostles: thus highly were these places favoured! Soon after this they decayed, and dwindled into mean, obscure villages. So fatally does sin ruin cities, and so certainly does the word of Christ take place!

Now Chorazin and Bethsaida are here compared with Tyre and Sidon. Christ, to convince and humble them, here shows, [1] That Tyre and Sidon would not have been so bad as Chorazin and Bethsaida. If they had had the same word preached, and the same miracles wrought among them, they would have repented, and that long ago, as Nineveh did, in sackcloth and ashes. Christ, who knows the hearts of all, knew that if he had gone and lived among them, and preached among them, he should have done more good there than where he was; yet he continued where he was for some time, to encourage his ministers to do so, though they see not the success they desire. Our repentance is slow and delayed, but theirs would have been speedy; they would have repented long ago. Ours has been slight and superficial; theirs would have been deep and serious, in sackcloth and ashes.

[2] That therefore Tyre and Sidon shall not be so miserable as Chorazin and Bethsaida, but it shall be more tolerable for them in the day of judgment, v. 22. In that judgment, all the means of grace that were enjoyed in the state of probation will certainly come into the account, and it will be enquired, not only how bad we were, but how much better we might have been. If self-reproach be the torture of hell, it must needs be hell indeed to those who had such a fair opportunity of getting to heaven.

(2) Capernaum is here condemned with an emphasis (v. 23), "And thou, Capernaum." Christ's miracles here were daily bread, and therefore, as the manna of old, were despised and called light bread. Many a sweet and comfortable lecture of grace Christ had read them to little purpose, and therefore here he reads them a dreadful lecture of wrath.

We have here Capernaum's doom, Thou which are exalted to heaven shalt be brought down to hell. Those who enjoy the gospel in power and purity, are thereby exalted to heaven; they are lifted up toward heaven; but if, notwithstanding, they still cleave to the earth, they may thank themselves that they are not lifted up into heaven. Our external privileges will be so far from saving us, that if our hearts and lives be not agreeable to them, they will but inflame the reckoning: the higher the precipice is, the more fatal is the fall from it. We have it here put in comparison with the doom of Sodom. Christ here tells us, That Capernaum's means would have saved Sodom. If these miracles had been done among the Sodomites, as bad as they were, they would have repented, and their city would have remained unto this day a monument of sparing mercy. Upon true repentance through Christ, even the greatest sin shall be pardoned and the greatest ruin prevented. It shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom than for that city.

Verses 25–30

I. Christ here returns thanks to God for his favour to those babes who had the mysteries of the gospel revealed to them (v. 25, 26). Jesus answered and said. It is called an answer because it is so comfortable a reply to the melancholy considerations preceding. With this thought therefore he refreshes himself; and to make it the more refreshing, he puts it into a thanksgiving. We may take great encouragement in looking upward to God, when round about us we see nothing but what is discouraging. Jesus answered and said, I thank thee. Thanksgiving is a proper answer to dark and disquieting thoughts, and may be an effectual means to silence them. Songs of praise are sovereign cordials to drooping souls. When we have no other answer ready to the suggestions of grief and fear, we may have recourse to this, I thank thee, O Father; let us bless God that it is not worse with us than it is.

1. The titles he gives to God: O Father, Lord of heaven and earth. In all our approaches to God, by praise as well as by prayer, it is good for us to eye him as a Father. Mercies are then doubly sweet, and powerful to enlarge the heart in praise, when they are received as tokens of a Father's love. It becomes children to be grateful and to say, Thank you, father, as readily as, Pray, father. When we come to God as a Father, we must withal remember, that he is Lord of heaven and earth; which obliges us to come to him with reverence, and yet with confidence, as one able to defend us from all evil and to supply us with all good.

2. The thing he gives thanks for: Because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and yet revealed them to babes. These things; the things that belong to our peace, Luke xix. 42. The great things of the everlasting gospel have been and are hid from many that were wise and prudent, that were eminent for learning and worldly policy. The world by wisdom knew not God, 1 Cor. i. 21. Men may dive deeply into the mysteries of nature and into the mysteries of state, and yet be ignorant of, and mistaken about, the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, for want of an experience of the power of them. While the wise and prudent men of the world are in the dark about gospel mysteries, even the babes in Christ have the sanctifying saving knowledge of them: Thou hast revealed them unto babes. The learned men of the world were not made choice of to be the preachers of the gospel, but the foolish things of the world (1 Cor. ii. 6, 8, 10). This difference between the prudent and the babes is of God's own making. It is he that has hid these things from the wise and prudent; he gave them parts, and learning, and much of human understanding above others, and they were proud of that, and rested in it, and looked no further. Had they honoured God with the wisdom and prudence they had, he would have given them the knowledge of these better things. It is he that has revealed them unto babes. Thus he resists the proud, and gives grace to the humble, James iv. 6. This dispensation must be resolved into the divine sovereignty. Christ himself referred it to that; Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight. Christ here subscribes to the will of his Father in this matter; Even so. Let God take what way he pleases to glorify himself. We can give no reason why Peter, a fisherman, should be made an apostle, and not Nicodemus, a Pharisee, and a ruler of the Jews, though he also believed in Christ; but so it seemed good in God's sight. This way of dispensing divine grace is to be acknowledged by us with all thankfulness. We must thank God, That these things are revealed. That they are revealed to babes; and this honour put upon those whom the world pours contempt upon. It magnifies the mercy to them, that these things are hid from the wise and prudent, and divine power and wisdom made to shine the more bright. See 1 Cor. i. 27, 31.

II. Christ here makes a gracious offer of the benefits of the gospel to all.

1. The solemn preface which ushers in this call or invitation. Christ prefixes his authority, produces his credentials.

Two things he here lays before us, v. 27.

(1) His commission from the Father: All things are delivered unto me of my Father. He is authorised to settle a new covenant between God and man, and to offer peace and happiness to the apostate world, upon such terms as he should think fit. This encourages us to come to Christ, that he is commissioned to receive us, and to give us what we come for, and has all things delivered to him for that purpose, by him who is Lord of all. All powers, all treasures are in his hand. God has made him the great Referee, the blessed Daysman, to lay his hand upon us both; that which we have to do is to agree to the reference, to submit to the arbitration of the Lord Jesus, for the taking up of this unhappy controversy, and to enter into bonds to stand to his award.

(2) His intimacy with the Father: No man knoweth the Son but the Father, neither knoweth any man the Father save the Son. It must therefore be a great encouragement to us to be assured, that they understood one another very well in this affair; that the Father knew the Son, and the Son knew the Father, and both perfectly, so that there could be no mistake in the settling of this matter; as often there is among men, to the overthrow of contracts, and the breaking of the measures taken. None knows the Father save the Son, he adds, and he to whom the Son will reveal him. The happiness of men lies in an acquaintance with God; it is life eternal. Those who would have an acquaintance with God, must apply themselves to Jesus Christ; for the light of the knowledge of the glory of God shines in the face of Christ, 2 Cor. iv. 6.

2. Here is the offer itself that is made to us, and an invitation to accept of it. We are here invited to Christ, as our Priest, Prince, and Prophet, to be saved.

(1) We must come to Jesus Christ as our Rest, and repose ourselves in him (v. 28), Come unto me all ye that labour. The character of the persons invited; all that labour, and are heavy laden. This is a word in season to him that is weary. But it is rather to be understood of the burthen of sin, both the guilt and the power of it. All those, and those only, are invited to rest in Christ, that are sensible of sin as a burthen, and groan under it; that are not only convinced of the evil of sin, of their own sin, but are contrite in soul for it; that are really sick of their sins. This is a necessary preparative for pardon and peace. The Comforter must first convince (John xvi. 8). The invitation itself: Come unto me. See here how he holds out the golden sceptre, that we may touch the top of it and may live. It is the duty and interest of weary and heavy laden sinners to come to Jesus Christ. We must accept of him, as our Physician and Advocate, freely willing to be saved by him, in his own way, and upon his own terms. The blessing promised to those that do come: I will give you rest. Truly rest is good, especially to those that labour and are heavy laden. Jesus Christ will give assured rest to those weary souls, that by a lively faith come to him for it; a rest in God, in his love.

(2) We must come to Jesus Christ as our Ruler, and submit ourselves to him (v. 29). Take my yoke upon you. The rest he promises is a release from the drudgery of sin, not from the service of God. Christ has a yoke for our necks, as well as a crown for our heads. To call those who are weary and heavy laden, to take a yoke upon them, looks like adding affliction to the afflicted; but the pertinency of it lies in the word my: "You are under a yoke which makes you weary: shake that off and try mine, which will make you easy." It is Christ's yoke; the yoke he has appointed; a yoke he has himself drawn in before us, for he learned obedience, and which he does by his Spirit draw in with us, for he helpeth our infirmities, Rom. viii. 26. A yoke speaks some hardship, but if the beast must draw, the yoke helps him.

Now this is the hardest part of our lesson, and therefore it is qualified (v. 30). My yoke is easy and my burden is light; you need not be afraid of it. The yoke of Christ's commands is an easy yoke; there is nothing in it to gall the yielding neck, nothing to hurt us, but, on the contrary, much to refresh us. It is a yoke that is lined with love. Such is the nature of all Christ's commands, all summed up in one word, and that a sweet word, love. It may be a little hard at first, but it is easy afterwards; the love of God and the hope of heaven will make it easy. The burden of Christ's cross is a light burden, very light. This burden in itself is not joyous, but grievous; yet as it is Christ's, it is light. Paul knew as much of it as any man, and he calls it a light affliction, 2 Cor. iv. 17. As afflictions abound, and are prolonged, consolations abound, and are prolonged too.

(3) We must come to Jesus Christ as our Teacher, and set ourselves to learn of him, v. 29. Christ has erected a great school, and has invited us to be his scholars. We must enter ourselves, associate with his scholars, and daily attend the instructions he gives by his word and Spirit. We must so learn of Christ as to learn Christ (Eph. iv. 20), for he is both Teacher and Lesson, Guide and Way, and All in All.

Two reasons are given why we must learn of Christ. I am meek and lowly in heart. He is meek, and can have compassion on the ignorant. Many able teachers are hot and hasty, which is a great discouragement to those who are dull and slow; but Christ knows how to bear with such, and to open their understandings. He is lowly in heart. He condescends to teach poor scholars, to teach novices. He teaches the first principles, such things as are milk for babes; he stoops to the meanest capacities. It is an encouragement to us to put ourselves to school to such a Teacher. You shall find rest to your souls. Rest for the soul is the most desirable rest. The only way, and a sure way to find rest for our souls, is to sit at Christ's feet and hear his word. The understanding finds rest in the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ, and is there abundantly satisfied. The affections find rest in the love of God and Jesus Christ, and meet with that in them which gives them an abundant satisfaction; quietness and assurance for ever. This rest is to be had with Christ for all those who learn of him.

CHAP. XII

I. Christ's clearing of the law of the fourth commandment concerning the sabbath-day, ver. 1–13. II. The prudence, humility, and self-denial of our Lord Jesus in working his miracles, ver. 14–21. III. Christ's answer to the scribes and Pharisees, who imputed his casting out devils to a compact with the devil, ver. 22–27. IV. Christ's reply to the scribes and Pharisees, challenging him to show them a sign from heaven, ver. 38–45. V. Christ's judgment about his kindred and relations, ver. 46–50.

Verses 1–13

The Jewish teachers had corrupted many of the commandments, by interpreting them more loosely than they were intended; but concerning the fourth commandment, they had erred in the other extreme, and interpreted it too strictly.

Now that which our Lord Jesus here lays down is, that the works of necessity and mercy are lawful on the sabbath day.

It is usual to settle the meaning of a law by judgments given upon cases that happen in fact, and in like manner is the meaning of this law settled.

I. Christ, by justifying his disciples in plucking the ears of corn on the sabbath day, shows that works of necessity are lawful on that day. Now here observe,

1. What it was that the disciples did. They were following their Master one sabbath day through a cornfield and they were hungry. Providence ordered it that they went through the corn, and there they were supplied. God has many ways of bringing suitable provision to his people when they need it. Being in the cornfields, they began to pluck the ears of corn; the law of God allowed this (Deut. xxiii. 25), to teach people to be neighbourly, and not to insist upon property in a small matter whereby another may be benefited. This was but slender provision for Christ and his disciples, but it was the best they had, and they were content with it.

2. What was the offence that the Pharisees took at this. It was but a dry breakfast, yet the Pharisees would not let them eat that in quietness. They did not quarrel with them for taking another man's corn, but for doing it on the sabbath day; for plucking and rubbing the ears of corn on that day was expressly forbidden, because it was a kind of reaping.

3. What was Christ's answer to this cavil of the Pharisees. The disciples could say little for themselves. But Christ has something to say for them, and justifies what they did.

(1) He justifies them by precedents, which were allowed to be good by the Pharisees themselves. He urges an ancient instance of David: "Have ye not read the story (1 Sam. xxi. 6) of David's eating the show-bread, which by the law was appropriated to the priest?" That which bore out David in eating the show-bread was not his dignity but his hunger. The greatest shall not have their lusts indulged, but the meanest shall have their wants considered. That may be done in a case of necessity which may not be done at another time; there are laws which necessity has not, but it is a law to itself. He urges a daily instance of the priests, which they likewise read in the law. The priests in the temple did a great deal of servile work on the sabbath day, which in a common case would have been profaning the sabbath, because the temple-service required and justified it. This intimates, that those labours are lawful on the sabbath day which are necessary, not only to the support of life, but to the service of the day; as tolling a bell to call the congregation together, travelling to church, and the like. Sabbath rest is to promote, not to hinder, sabbath worship.

(2) He justifies them by arguments, three cogent ones.

[1] In this place is one greater than the temple, v. 6. If the temple-service would justify what the priests did in their ministration, the service of Christ would much more justify the disciples in what they did in their attendance upon him. Christ, in a cornfield, was greater than the temple.

[2] God will have mercy and not sacrifice, v. 7. This is quoted from Hos. vi. 6. It was used before, ch. ix. 13, in vindication of mercy to the souls of men; here, of mercy to their bodies. The rest of the sabbath was ordained for man's good. If you had known what this means, had known what it is to be of a merciful disposition, you would have been sorry that they were forced to do this to satisfy their hunger, and would not have condemned the guiltless. It is not enough for us to know the scriptures, but we must labour to know the meaning of them. Let him that readeth understand. Ignorance of the meaning of the scripture is especially shameful in those who take upon them to teach others.

[3] The Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath day, v. 8. That law, as all the rest, is put into the hand of Christ, to be altered, enforced, or dispensed with, as he sees good. He was authorised to make such an alteration of that day, as that it should become the Lord's day, the Lord Christ's day.

Christ having thus silenced the Pharisees, and got clear of them (v. 9), departed, and went into their synagogue, the synagogue of these Pharisees, in which they presided, and toward which he was going, when they picked this quarrel with him. We must take heed lest anything that occurs in our way to holy ordinances unfit us for, or divert us from, our due attendance on them. We must not, for the sake of private feuds and personal piques, draw back from public worship. Satan gains this point, if, by sowing discord among brethren, he prevail to drive them, or any of them, from the synagogue, and the communion of the faithful.

II. Christ, by healing the man that had the withered hand on the sabbath day, shows that works of mercy are lawful and proper to be done on that day.

Here is, 1. The affliction that this poor man was in. This poor man was in the synagogue. Those who can do but little, or have but little to do for the world, must do so much the more for their souls; as the rich, the aged, and the infirm.

2. A spiteful question which the Pharisees put to Christ upon the sight of this man. They asked him, saying, Is it lawful to heal? We read not here of any address this poor man made to Christ for a cure, but they observed Christ began to take notice of him, and knew it was usual for him to be found of those that sought him not, and therefore with their badness they anticipated his goodness. Did ever any ask, whether it is lawful for God to heal, to send his word and heal? Is it lawful to heal? To enquire into the lawfulness and unlawfulness of actions is very good, and we cannot apply ourselves to any with such enquiring more fitly than to Christ; but they asked here, not that they might be instructed by him, but that they might accuse him.

3. Christ's answer to this question, by way of appeal to themselves, and their own opinion and practice, v. 11, 12. In case a sheep should fall into a pit on the sabbath day, would they not lift it out? No doubt they might do it, the fourth commandment allows it; they must do it, for a merciful man regardeth the life of his beast, and for their parts they would do it, rather than lose a sheep; does Christ take care for sheep? Yes, he does; he preserves and provides for both man and beast. But here he says it for our sakes (1 Cor. ix. 9, 10), and hence argues, How much then is a man better than a sheep? Man, in respect of his being, is a great deal better, and more valuable, than the best of the brute creatures. They do not consider this, who are more solicitous for the education, preservation, and supply of their horses and dogs than of God's poor, or perhaps their own household.

Hence Christ infers a truth that it is lawful to do well on the sabbath days; they had asked, Is it lawful to heal? Christ proves it is lawful to do well. There are more ways of doing well upon sabbath days, than by the duties of God's immediate worship; this is doing good; and this must be done from a principle of love and charity, and this is doing well, and it shall be accepted.

4. Christ's curing of the man, notwithstanding the offence which he foresaw the Pharisees would take at it, v. 13. Duty is not to be left undone, nor opportunities of doing good neglected, for fear of giving offence. He said to the man, "Stretch forth thy hand, exert thyself as well as thou canst;" and he did so, and it was restored whole. In order to our cure, he commands us to stretch forth our hands, to improve our natural powers, and do as well as we can; to stretch them out in prayer to God, to stretch them out to lay hold on Christ by faith, to stretch them out in holy endeavours. Now this man could not stretch forth his withered hand of himself, yet Christ bid him do it. God's commands to us to do the duty which of ourselves we are not able to do are no more absurd or unjust, than this command to the man with the withered hand, to stretch it forth; for with the command, there is a promise of grace which is given by the word.

I. The cursed malice of the Pharisees against Christ (v. 14); being enraged at the convincing evidence of his miracles, they went out, and held a council against him, how they might destroy him. That which vexed them was, not only that by his miracles his honour eclipsed theirs, but that the doctrine he preached was directly opposite to their pride and hypocrisy, and worldly interest; but they pretended to be displeased at his breaking the sabbath day, which was by the law a capital crime. They took counsel, not to imprison nor banish him, but to destroy him, to be the death of him who came that we might have life. What an indignity was hereby put upon our Lord Jesus, to run him down as an outlaw, and the plague of his country, who was the greatest blessing of it, the Glory of his people Israel!

II. Christ's absconding upon this occasion, and the privacy he chose, to decline, not his work, but his danger; because his hour was not yet come (v. 15), he withdrew himself from thence. He could have secured himself by miracle, but chose to do it in the ordinary way of flight and retirement. Herein he humbled himself, that he was driven to the common shift of those who are most helpless; thus also he would give an example to his own rule, When they persecute you in one city, flee to another.

Christ did not retire for his own ease, nor seek an excuse to leave off his work. He was even then doing good, when he was forced to flee for the same. Thus he gave an example to his ministers, to do what they can, when they cannot do what they would. The common people crowded after him; great multitudes followed him and found him out. But it was really his honour, as it was also the honour of his grace, that the poor were evangelised; that when they received him, he received them and healed them all. Christ came into the world to be a Physician-general, as the sun to the lower world, with healing under his wings. Though the Pharisees persecuted Christ for doing good, yet he went on in it. He healed them all, and yet (v. 16), charged them that they should not make him known; which may be looked upon as an act of prudence. Christ though he would not omit doing good, yet would do it with as little noise as possible. Wise and good men, though they covet to do good, yet are far from coveting to have it talked of when it is done; because it is God's acceptance, not men's applause, that they aim at. His withdrawal was also an act of humility and self-denial, to set us an example of humility, and to teach us not to proclaim our own goodness or usefulness, or to desire to have it proclaimed. Christ would have his disciples to be the reverse of those who did all their works to be seen of men.

III. The fulfilling of the scriptures in all this, v. 17. The scripture here said to be fulfilled is Isa. xlii. 1-4, which is quoted at large, v. 18-21. The scope of it is to show how mild and quiet, and yet how successful, our Lord Jesus should be in his undertaking.

1. The pleasure of the Father in Christ (v. 18); Behold, my Servant whom I have chosen, my Beloved in whom my soul is well pleased. Hence we may learn,

(1) That our Saviour was God's Servant in the great work of our redemption. As a Servant, he had a great work appointed him, and a great trust reposed in him. In the work of our salvation he took upon him the form of a servant. The motto of this Prince is, Ich dien—I serve.

(2) That Jesus Christ was chosen of God, as the only fit and proper person for the management of the great work of our redemption. He is my Servant whom I have chosen. None but he was able to do the Redeemer's work, or fit to wear the Redeemer's crown. Christ did not thrust himself upon this work, but was duly chosen into it.

(3) That Jesus Christ is God's Beloved, his beloved Son.

(4) That Jesus Christ is one in whom the Father is well pleased. And he is well pleased with us in him; for he has made us accepted in the Beloved, Eph. i. 6. All the interest which fallen man has or can have in God is grounded upon and owing to God's well-pleasedness in Jesus Christ.

2. The promise of the Father to him in two things.

(1) That he should be every way well qualified for his undertaking; I will put my Spirit upon him, as a Spirit of wisdom and counsel, Isa. xi. 2, 3. Those whom God calls to any service, he will be sure to fit and qualify for it. He received the Spirit, not by measure, but without measure, John iii. 34. Whoever they be that God has chosen, and in whom he is well pleased, he will be sure to put his Spirit upon them. Wherever he confers his love, he confers somewhat of his likeness.

(2) That he should be abundantly successful in his undertaking. Those whom God sends he will certainly own.

[1] He shall show judgment to the Gentiles. Christ in his own person preached to those who bordered upon the heathen nations (see Mark iii. 6–8), and by his apostle showed his gospel, called here his judgment, to the Gentile world. The gospel, which has a direct tendency to the reforming and bettering of men's hearts, and lives, shall be showed to the Gentiles.

[2] In his name shall the Gentiles trust, v. 21. He shall so show judgment to them, that they shall heed and observe what he shows them, and be influenced by it to depend upon him. The great design of the gospel, is to bring people to trust in the name of Jesus Christ; his name Jesus, a Saviour. The law we wait for is the law of faith, the law of trusting in his name. This is now his great commandment, that we believe in Christ, 1 John iii. 23.

3. The prediction concerning him, and his mild and quiet management of his undertaking, v. 19, 20.

(1) That he should carry on his undertaking without noise or ostentation. He shall not strive, or make an outcry. Christ and his kingdom come not with observation, Luke xvii. 20, 21. He was in the world and the world knew him not. He spake in a still small voice, which was alluring to all, but terrifying to none; he did not affect to make a noise, but came down silently like the dew.

(2) That he should carry on his undertaking without severity and rigour (v. 20). A bruised reed shall he not break. Some understand this of his patience in bearing with the wicked. Others rather understand it of his power and grace in bearing up the weak. In general, the design of his gospel is to establish such a method of salvation as encourages sincerity, though there be much infirmity; it does not insist upon a sinless obedience, but accepts an upright, willing mind. As to particular persons, that follow Christ, observe, How their case is here described—they are like a bruised reed, and smoking flax. Young beginners in religion are weak as a bruised reed, and their weakness offensive like smoking flax. Christ's disciples were as yet but weak, and many are so that have a place in his family. He will not discourage them, much less reject them or cast them off; the reed that is bruised shall not be broken and trodden down, but shall be supported, and made as strong as a cedar or flourishing palm-tree. The candle newly lighted, though it only smokes and does not flame, shall not be blown out, but blown up. The day of small things is the day of precious things. The good issue and success of this, intimated in that, till he send forth judgment unto victory. Both the preaching of the gospel in the world, and the power of the gospel in the heart, shall prevail. Grace shall get the upper hand of corruption, and shall at length be perfected in glory. Truth and victory are much the same, for great is the truth, and will prevail.

I. Christ's glorious conquest of Satan, in the gracious cure of one under his power.

1. The man's case was very sad; he was possessed with a devil. This poor man that was possessed was blind and dumb; a miserable case! he could neither see to help himself, nor speak to others to help him. Satan blinds the eye of faith and seals up the lips of prayer.

2. His cure was very strange, and the more so, because sudden; he healed him. And the cause being removed, immediately the effect ceased; the blind and dumb both spake and saw. When Satan's power is broken in the soul, the eyes are opened to see God's glory, and the lips opened to speak his praise.

II. The conviction which this gave to the people, to all the people: they were amazed. They inferred from it, "Is not this the Son of David?" We may take this, 1. As an enquiring question. It was a good question that they started; but, it should seem, it was soon lost, and was not prosecuted. Such convictions as these should be brought to a head, and then they are likely to be brought to the heart. Or, 2. As an affirming question; Is not this the Son of David? "Yes, certainly it is, it can be no other." So plain and easy was the way made to this great truth of Christ being the Messiah and Saviour of the world, that the common people could not miss it; the wayfaring men, though fools, could not err therein. See Isa. xxxv. 8. The world by wisdom knew not God, and by the foolish things the wise were confounded.

III. The blasphemous cavil of the Pharisees, v. 24. They were proud of the reputation they had among the people; that fed their pride, supported their power, and filled their purses. Those who bind up their happiness in the praise and applause of men, expose themselves to a perpetual uneasiness upon every favourable word that they hear said of any other. The shadow of honour followed Christ, who fled from it, and fled from the Pharisees, who were eager in the pursuit of it. Observe,

1. How scornfully they speak of Christ, this fellow. It is a bad thing to speak of good men with disdain because they are poor.

2. How blasphemously they speak of his miracles; they could not deny the matter of fact; it was as plain as the sun, that devils were cast out by the word of Christ. They had no other way to avoid the conclusion, that this is the Son of David, than by suggesting that Christ cast out devils by Beelzebub; that there was a compact between Christ and the devil; pursuant to that, the devil was not cast out, but did voluntarily retire.

IV. Christ's reply to this base insinuation, v. 25–30. Jesus knew their thoughts. Jesus Christ knows what we are thinking at any time, knows what is in man; he understands our thoughts afar off. Christ's reply is said to be to their thoughts, because he knew that they did not say it in their haste, but that it was the product of a rooted malignity.

Christ's reply to this imputation is copious and cogent.

1. It would be very strange, and highly improbable, that Satan should be cast out by such a compact, because then Satan's kingdom would be divided against itself, v. 25, 26.

(1) Here is a known rule laid down, that in all societies a common ruin is the consequence of mutual quarrels: Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation. Divisions commonly end in desolations; if we clash, we break; if we divide one from another, we become an easy prey to a common enemy. Churches and nations have known this by sad experience.

(2) The application of it to the case in hand (v. 26), If Satan cast out Satan; if the prince of the devils should be at variance with the inferior devils, the whole kingdom and interest would soon be broken; nay, if Satan should come into a compact with Christ, it must be to his own ruin; for the manifest design and tendency of Christ's preaching and miracles was to overthrow the kingdom of Satan. If he should fall in with Christ, how should then his kingdom stand? He would himself contribute to the overthrow of it. This victory must be obtained by nobler methods. Let the prince of the devils muster up all his forces. Christ will be too hard for his united force, and his kingdom shall not stand.

2. It was not at all strange, or improbable, that devils should be cast out by the Spirit of God.

(1) How otherwise do your children cast them out? There were those among the Jews who, by invocation of the name of the most high God, or the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, did sometimes cast out devils. Josephus speaks of some in his time that did it; we read of Jewish exorcists (Acts xix. 13), and of some that in Christ's name cast out devils, though they did not follow him (Mark ix. 38). These the Pharisees condemned not, but imputed what they did to the Spirit of God. It was therefore merely from spite and envy to Christ, that they would own that others cast out devils by the Spirit of God, but suggest that he did it by compact with Beelzebub. The judgments of envy are made not by reason, but prejudice.

(2) This casting out of devils was a certain token and indication of the approach and appearance of the kingdom of God (v. 28); "But if it be indeed that I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, the kingdom of the Messiah is now about to be set up among you." Other miracles that Christ wrought proved him sent of God, but this proved him sent of God to destroy the devil's kingdom and his works. The destruction of the devil's power is wrought by the Spirit of God. If the devil's interest in a soul be sunk and broken by the Spirit of God, as a Sanctifier, no doubt but the kingdom of God is come to that soul, the kingdom of grace, a blessed earnest of the kingdom of the glory.

3. The comparing of Christ's miracles with his doctrine evidenced that he was so far from being in league with Satan, that he was at open enmity and hostility against him (v. 29); How can one enter into a strong man's house, and plunder his goods, and carry them away, except he first bind the strong man? And then he may do what he pleases with his goods. The world was in Satan's possession, and under his power, so is every unregenerate soul; there Satan resides, there he rules. The design of Christ's gospel was to spoil the devil's house, which, as a strong man, he kept in the world; to turn the people from darkness to light, from sin to holiness. Pursuant to this design, he bound the strong man, when he cast out unclean spirits by his word. When he showed how easily and effectually he could cast the devil out of people's bodies, he encouraged all believers to hope that, whatever power Satan might usurp and exercise in the souls of men, Christ by his grace would break it. When some of the worst of sinners were sanctified and justified, and became the best of saints, then Christ spoiled the devil's house, and will spoil it more and more.

4. This holy war, which Christ was carrying on with vigour against the devil and his kingdom, was such as would not admit of a neutrality (v. 30), He that is not with me is against me. In the little differences that may arise between the disciples of Christ among themselves, we are taught to seek peace, by accounting those who are not against us, to be with us (Luke ix. 50); but in the great quarrel between Christ and the devil, no peace is to be sought. He that is not hearty for Christ, will be reckoned with as really against him: he that is cold in the cause, is looked upon as an enemy. We must be entirely, faithfully, and immovably, on Christ's side: it is the right side, and will at last be the rising side.

The latter clause is to the same purport: He that gathereth not with me scattereth. Christ's errand into the world was to gather in his harvest, to gather in those whom the Father had given him, John xi. 52. Christ expects and requires from those who are with him, that they gather with him; gather others to him. If we gather not with Christ, we scatter; it is not enough, not to do hurt, but we must do good.

V. Here is a discourse of Christ's upon this occasion, concerning tongue-sins; Wherefore I say unto you. He warns the people concerning three sorts of tongue-sins.

1. Blasphemous words against the Holy Ghost are the worst kind of tongue-sins, and unpardonable, v. 31, 32.

(1) Here is a gracious assurance of the pardon of all sin upon gospel terms. The greatness of sin shall be no bar to our acceptance with God, if we truly repent and believe the gospel: All manner of sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men. Though it reach up to the heavens, yet with the Lord there is mercy, that reacheth beyond the heavens; mercy will be extended even to blasphemy, a sin immediately touching God's name and honour. Paul obtained mercy, who had been a blasphemer, 1 Tim. i. 13. Well may we say, Who is a God like unto thee, pardoning iniquity? Micah vii. 18. Even words spoken against the Son of man shall be forgiven, as theirs were who reviled him at his death, many of whom repented and found mercy.

(2) Here is an exception of the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, which is here declared to be the only unpardonable sin. What is this sin; it is speaking against the Holy Ghost. See what malignity there is in tongue-sins, when the only unpardonable sin is so. But Jesus knew their thoughts, v. 25. It is not all speaking against the person or essence of the Holy Ghost, or merely the resisting of his internal working in the sinner himself, that is here meant; for who then should be saved? None are excepted by name, nor any by description, but those only that blaspheme the Holy Ghost. This blasphemy is excepted, not for any defect of mercy in God, or merit in Christ, but because it inevitably leaves the sinner in infidelity and impenitency. Those who fear they have committed this sin, give a good sign that they have not. Those therefore who blaspheme this dispensation of the Spirit, cannot possibly be brought to believe in Christ; those who shall impute them to a collusion with Satan, as the Pharisees did the miracles, what can convince them? This is such a stronghold of infidelity as a man can never be beaten out of, and is therefore unpardonable, because hereby repentance is hid from the sinner's eyes. See the sentence that is passed upon it: It shall not be forgiven, neither in this world, nor in the world to come. There is no cure for a sin so directly against the remedy.

2. Christ speaks here concerning other wicked words, the products of corruption reigning in the heart, and breaking out thence, v. 33–35. Our Lord Jesus therefore points to the springs and heals them; let the heart be sanctified and it will appear in our words.

(1) The heart is the root, the language is the fruit

(v. 33); if the nature of the tree be good, it will bring forth fruit accordingly. Wherever lust reigns in the heart it will break out; diseased lungs make an offensive breath. Men's language discovers what country they are of. "Either make the tree good, and then the fruit will be good; get pure hearts and then you will have pure lips and pure lives; or else the tree will be corrupt, and the fruit accordingly." You may make a crab-stock to become a good tree, by grafting into it a shoot from a good tree, and then the fruit will be good; but if the tree be still the same, plant it where you will, and water it how you will, the fruit will be still corrupt. Unless the heart be *trans*formed, the life will never be thoroughly *re*formed. It should be more our care to be good really, than to seem good outwardly.

(2) The heart is the fountain, the words are the streams (v. 34); Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks, as the streams are the overflowings of the spring. Evil words are the natural, genuine product of an evil heart. Nothing but the salt of grace, cast into the spring, will heal the waters, season the speech, and purify the corrupt communication. This they wanted, they were evil; and how can ye, being evil, speak good things? The people looked upon the Pharisees as a generation of saints, but Christ calls them a generation of vipers. Now what could be expected from a generation of vipers, but that which is poisonous and malignant? Can the viper be otherwise than venomous? Bad things may be expected from bad people. Christ would have his disciples know what sort of men they were to live among, that they might know what to look for. They are as Ezekiel among scorpions (Ezek. ii. 6), and must not think it strange if they be stung and bitten.

(3) The heart is the treasury, the words are the things brought out of that treasury (v. 35). It is the character of a good man, that he has a good treasure in his heart, and from thence brings forth good things, as there is occasion. Graces, comforts, experiences, good knowledge, good affections, good resolutions, these are a good treasure in the heart; the word of God hidden there, the law of God written there, divine truths dwelling and ruling there, are a treasure there, valuable and suitable, kept safe and kept secret, as the stores of the good householder, but ready for use upon all occasions. Some pretend to good expenses that have not a good treasure—such will soon be bankrupts: some hope they have it in them; thank God, whatever their words and actions are, they have good hearts; but faith without works is dead: and some have a good treasure of wisdom and knowledge, but they are not communicative: they have a talent, but know not how to trade with it. The complete Christian in this bears the image of God, that he both is good, and does good. It is the character of an evil man, that he has an evil treasure in his heart, and out of it bringeth forth evil things.

3. Christ speaks here concerning idle words, and shows what evil there is in them (v. 36, 37). For every idle word, or discourse, that men speak, they shall give account. God takes notice of every word we say, even that which we ourselves do not notice. Vain, idle, impertinent talk is displeasing to God; it is the product of a vain and trifling heart. We must shortly account for these idle words; they will prove us unprofitable servants, that have not improved the faculties of reason and speech, which are part of the talents we are entrusted with. By thy words thou shalt be justified or condemned. The constant tenor of our discourse, according as it is gracious or not gracious, will be an evidence for us, or against us.

Verses 38–45

It is probable that these Pharisees were not the same that cavilled at him (v. 24), and would not credit the signs he gave: but another set of them, who would not content themselves with the signs he gave, unless he would give them such further proof as they should demand.

I. Their address to him, v. 38. They compliment him with the title of Master, pretending respect for him, when they intended to abuse him; all are not indeed Christ's servants, who call him Master. Their request is, We would see a sign from thee. It was highly reasonable that they should see a sign, that he should by miracles prove his divine mission. But it was highly unreasonable to demand a sign now, when he had given so many signs already. It is natural to proud men to *pre*scribe to God, and then to make that an excuse for not *sub*scribing to him; but a man's *of*fence will never be his *de*fence.

II. His answer to this insolent demand.

1. He condemns the demand, as the language of an evil and adulterous generation, v. 39. He fastens the charge, not only on the scribes and Pharisees, but the whole nation of the Jews. They were an evil generation indeed, that not only hardened themselves against the conviction of Christ's miracles, but set themselves to abuse him, and put contempt on his miracles. They were an adulterous generation. As an adulterous brood; so they degenerated from the faith and obedience of their ancestors, that Abraham and Israel acknowledged them not. As an adulterous wife they departed from that God, to whom by covenant they had been espoused: they were guilty of infidelity, they did not look after gods of their own making, but they looked for signs of their own devising; and that was adultery.

2. He refuses to give them any other sign than he has already given them, but that of the prophet Jonas. Though Christ is always ready to hear and answer holy desires and prayers, yet he will not gratify corrupt lusts and humours. Those who ask amiss, ask, and have not. Signs were granted to those who desired them for the confirmation of their faith, as to Abraham and Gideon; but were denied to those who demanded them for the excuse of their unbelief.

Justly might Christ have said, They shall never see another miracle: but note his wonderful goodness. They shall have one sign of a different kind from all these, and that is, the resurrection of Christ from the dead by his own power, called here the sign of the prophet Jonas. That was such a sign as surpassed all the rest, completed and crowned them. And yet the unbelief of the Jews found out an evasion to shift off that too, by saying, His disciples came and stole him away; for none are so incurably blind as those who are resolved they will not see.

Now this sign of the prophet Jonas he further explains here: (v. 40) As Jonas was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, Christ shall be so long in the grave, and then shall rise again. As Jonah on the third day was discharged from his prison, and came to the land of the living again, so Christ on the third day should return to life, and rise out of his grave to send abroad the gospel to the Gentiles.

3. Christ takes this occasion to represent the sad character and condition of that generation in which he lived, a generation that would not be reformed. Persons and things now appear under false colours; characters and conditions are here changeable. Things are really, what they are eternally.

Now Christ represents the people of the Jews,

(1) As a generation that would be condemned by the men of Nineveh, whose repenting at the preaching of Jonas would rise up in judgment against them, v. 41. Christ's resurrection will be the sign of the prophet Jonas to them: but it will not have so happy an effect upon them, as that of Jonas had upon the Ninevites, for they were by it brought to such a repentance as prevented their ruin; but the Jews will be hardened in an unbelief that shall hasten their ruin. Christ renews his calls, sat and taught, taught in the synagogues. Christ, besides the warning given us of our danger, has shown wherein we must repent, and assured us of acceptance upon our repentance. Christ wrought abundance of miracles, and all miracles of mercy: yet the Ninevites repented at the preaching of Jonas, but the Jews were not wrought upon by Christ's preaching. The goodness of some, who have less helps and advantages for their souls, will aggravate the badness of those who have much greater. Those who by the twilight discover the things that belong to their peace, will shame those who grope at noon-day.

(2) As a generation that would be condemned by the queen of the south, the queen of Sheba, v. 42. The Ninevites would shame them for not repenting, the queen of Sheba for not believing in Christ. She came from a far country to hear the wisdom of Solomon; yet people will not be persuaded to come and hear the wisdom of Christ. The queen of Sheba had no invitation to come to Solomon, nor any promise of being welcome; but we are invited to Christ, to sit at his feet and hear his word. She could not be sure that it would be worth her while to go so far on this errand; but we come not to Christ upon such uncertainties. She came from the uttermost parts of the earth, but we have Christ among us, and his word nigh us: Behold he stands at the door, and knocks. It should seem the wisdom the queen of Sheba came for was only philosophy and politics; but the wisdom that is to be had with Christ is wisdom to salvation. She could only hear Solomon's wisdom; he could not give her wisdom: but Christ will give wisdom to those who come to him.

(3) As a generation that were resolved to continue under the power of Satan. They are compared to one out of whom the devil is gone, but returns with double force, v. 43–45.

[1] The parable represents his possessing men's bodies: Christ having lately cast out a devil, and they having said he had a devil, gave occasion to show how much they were under the power of Satan. Christ's ejectment of him was final, and such as barred a re-rentry: we find him charging the evil spirit to go out, and enter no more, Mark ix. 25.

[2] The application of the parable makes it to represent the case of the body of the Jewish church and nation: So it shall be with this wicked generation, that now resist, and will finally reject, the gospel of Christ. Let this be a warning to all nations and churches, to take heed of leaving their first love, of letting fall a good work of reformation begun among them, and returning to that wickedness which they seemed to have forsaken; for the last state of such will be worse than the first.

Observe, I. How Christ was interrupted in his preaching by his mother and his brethren, that stood without, desiring to speak with him (v. 46, 47); which desire of theirs was conveyed to him through the crowd.

1. He was as yet talking to the people. Christ's preaching was talking; it was plain, easy, and familiar, and suited to their capacity and case. The opposition we meet with in our work, must not drive us from it. He left off talking with the Pharisees, for he saw he could do no good with them; but continued to talk to the common people.

2. His mother and brethren stood without, desiring to speak with him, when they should have been standing within, desiring to hear him. They had the advantage of his daily converse in private, and therefore were less mindful to attend upon his public preaching. Familiarity and easiness of access breed some degree of contempt. There is too much truth in that common proverb, "The nearer the church, the further from God"; it is a pity it should be so.

3. They not only would not hear him themselves, but they interrupted others that heard him gladly. We often meet with hindrances and obstructions in our work, by our friends that are about us, and are taken off by civil respects from our spiritual concerns. Those who really wish well to us and to our work, may sometimes, by their indiscretion, prove our backfriends, and impediments to us in our duty. Christ once said to his mother, How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not, that I must be about my Father's business? And it was then said, she laid up that saying in her heart (Luke ii. 49); but if she had remembered it now, she would not have given him this interruption when he was about his Father's business. There is many a good truth that we thought was well laid up when we heard it, which yet is out of the way when we have occasion to use it.

II. How he resented this interruption, v. 48–50.

1. He would not hearken to it. Who is my mother and who are my brethren? Not that natural affection is to be put off, but everything is beautiful in its season, and the less duty must stand by, while the greater is done. The nearest relations must be comparatively hated, that is, we must love them less than Christ (Luke xiv. 26), and our duty to God must have the preference. And we must not take it ill of our friends, nor put it upon the score of their wickedness, if they prefer the pleasing of God before the pleasing of us. Nay, we must deny ourselves and our own satisfaction, rather than do that which may any way divert our friends from, or distract them in, their duty to God.

2. He took that occasion to prefer his disciples, who were his spiritual kindred, before his natural relations as such. He would rather be profiting his disciples, than pleasing his relations.

(1) The description of Christ's disciples. They are such as do the will of his Father; not only hear it, and know it, and talk of it, but do it.

(2) The dignity of Christ's disciples: The same is my brother, and sister, and mother. His disciples, that had left all to follow him, and embraced his doctrine, were dearer to him than any that were akin to him according to the flesh. It was very endearing and very encouraging for Christ to say, Behold my mother and my brethren; yet it was not their privilege alone, this honour have all the saints. All obedient believers are near akin to Jesus Christ. He loves them, converses freely with them as his relations. He bids them welcome to his table, sees that they want nothing that is fit for them, nor will ever be ashamed of his poor relations, but will confess them before men, before the angels, and before his Father.

CHAP. XIII

I. The favour which Christ did to his countrymen in preaching the kingdom of heaven to them, ver. 1–2. He preached to them in parables, and here gives the reason why he chose that way of instructing, ver. 10–17. And the evangelist gives another reason, ver. 34, 35. 1. Here is one parable to show what are the great hindrances of people's profiting by the word of the gospel, and that is the parable of the four sorts of ground, delivered ver. 3–9, and expounded ver. 18–23. 2. Here are two parables intended to show that there would be a mixture of good and bad: the parable of the tares put forth (ver. 24–30), and expounded at the request of the disciples (ver. 36–43); and that of the net cast into the sea, ver. 47–50. 3. Here are two parables intended to show that the gospel church should be very small at first, but that in process of time it should become a considerable body: that of the grain of mustard-seed (ver. 31, 32), and that of the leaven, ver. 33. 4. Here are two parables intended to show that those who expect salvation by the gospel must be willing to venture all; that of the treasure hid in the field (ver. 44), and that of the pearl of great price, ver. 45, 46. 5. Here is one parable intended for direction to the disciples, to make use of the instructions he had given them for the benefit of others; and that is the parable of the good householder, ver. 51, 52. II. The contempt which his countrymen put upon him on account of the meanness of his parentage, ver. 53–58.

1. When Christ preached this sermon; it was the same day that he preached the sermon in the foregoing chapter: so unwearied was he in doing good. Christ was for preaching both ends of the day. An afternoon sermon well heard, will be so far from driving out the morning sermon, that it will rather clench it, and fasten the nail in a sure place. Though Christ had been in the morning opposed, disturbed and interrupted, yet he went on with his work; and in the latter part of the day, we do not find that he met with such discouragements. Those who with courage and zeal break through difficulties in God's service, will perhaps find them not so apt to recur as they fear. Resist them, and they will flee.

2. To whom he preached; there were great multitudes gathered together to him, and they were the auditors. Sometimes there is most of the power of religion where there is least of the pomp of it. When Christ went to the sea-side, multitudes were presently gathered together to him. Where the king is, there is the court; where Christ is, there is the church, though it be by the sea-side. Those who would get good by the word, must be willing to follow it in all its removes; when the ark shifts, shift after it.

3. Where he preached this sermon. His meeting-place was the sea-side. He went out of the house (because there was no room for the auditory) into the open air. As he had not a house of his own to live in, so he had not a chapel of his own to preach in. By this he teaches us in the external circumstances of worship not to covet that which is stately, but to make the best of the conveniences which God in his providence allots to us. When Christ was born, he was crowded into the stable, and now to the sea-side, upon the strand, where all persons might come to him with freedom. His pulpit was a ship. No place amiss for such a Preacher, whose presence dignified and consecrated any place: let not those who preach Christ be ashamed, though they have mean and inconvenient places to preach in.

4. What and how he preached. He spake many things unto them. Many more it is likely than are here recorded. They were not trifles, but things of everlasting consequence, that Christ spoke of. What he spake was in parables. It was a way of teaching used very much, and it was found very profitable, and the more so from its being pleasant. Our Saviour used it much, and in it condescended to the capacities of people, and lisped to them in their own language.

I. We have here the general reason why Christ taught in parables. The disciples were a little surprised at it, for hitherto, in his preaching, he had not much used them, and therefore they ask, Why speakest thou to them in parables? Because they were truly desirous that the people might hear with understanding. They do not say, Why speakest thou to us? (they knew how to get the parables explained) but to them.

To this question Christ answers largely, v. 11–17, where he tells them, that therefore he preached by parables, because thereby the things of God were made more plain and easy to them who were willing to be taught, and at the same time more difficult and obscure to those who were willingly ignorant. A parable, like the pillar of cloud and fire, turns a dark side towards Egyptians, which confounds them, but a light side towards Israelites, which comforts them.

1. This reason is laid down (v. 11): Because it is given unto you to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, but to them it is not given. That is, (1) The disciples had knowledge, but the people had not. The people are ignorant, are yet but babes, and must be taught as such by plain similitudes: for though they have eyes, they know not how to use them; so some. Or, (2) The disciples were well inclined to the knowledge of gospel mysteries, and would search into the parables, but the carnal hearers that rested in bare hearing, would be never the wiser, and so would justly suffer for their remissness. A parable is a shell that keeps good fruit for the diligent, but keeps it from the slothful. There are mysteries in the kingdom of heaven. It is graciously given to the disciples of Christ to be acquainted with these mysteries. Knowledge is the first gift of God, it was given to the apostles, because they were Christ's constant followers and attendants. The nearer we draw to Christ, and the more we converse with him, the better acquainted we shall be with gospel mysteries. It is given to all true believers, who have an experimental knowledge of the gospel mysteries, and that is without doubt the best knowledge.

2. This reason is further illustrated by the rule God observes in dispensing his gifts; he bestows them on those who improve them, but takes them away from those who bury them.

(1) Here is a promise to him that has and uses what he has; he shall have more abundance: God's favours are earnests of further favours: where he lays the foundation, he will build upon it.

(2) Here is a threatening to him that has not; that has, but uses not what he has; from him shall be taken away that which he has or seems to have. God will call in his talents out of their hands that are likely to become bankrupts quickly.

3. This reason is particularly explained, with reference to the two sorts of people Christ had to do with.

(1) Some were willingly ignorant; and such were amused by the parables (v. 13); because they seeing, see not. They had shut their eyes against the clear light of Christ's plainer preaching, and therefore were now left in the dark. It is just with God to take away the light from those who shut their eyes against it.

Now in this the scripture would be fulfilled, v. 14, 15. It is quoted from Isa. vi. 9, 10. It is referred to no less than six times in the New Testament. That which was spoken of the sinners in Isaiah's time was fulfilled in those in Christ's time, and it is still fulfilling every day. Here is,

First. A description of sinners' wilful blindness and darkness, which is their sin. This people's heart is waxed gross; it is fattened, so the word is; which denotes both sensuality and senselessness. And when the heart is thus heavy, no wonder that the ears are dull of hearing. They shut both the learning senses; for their eyes also they have closed, resolved that they would not see light come into the world, when the Sun of Righteousness arose.

Secondly, A description of that judicial blindness, which is the just punishment of this. "By hearing, ye shall hear, and shall not understand; what means of grace you have, shall be to no purpose to you; though in mercy to others, they are continued." The saddest condition a man can be in is to sit under the most lively ordinances with a dead, stupid, untouched heart.

Thirdly, The woeful effect and consequence of this; Lest at any time they should see. Lest they should be converted, and I should heal them.

Note, That seeing, hearing, and understanding, are necessary to conversion; for God, in working grace, deals with men as men, as rational agents; he draws with the cords of a man, changes the heart by opening the eyes, and turns from the power of Satan unto God, by turning first from darkness to light,

Acts xxvi. 18. All those who are truly converted to God, shall certainly be healed by him. "If they be converted I shall heal them, I shall save them."

(2) Others were effectually called to be the disciples of Christ, and were truly desirous to be taught of him. By these parables the things of God were made more plain and easy, more intelligible and familiar, and more apt to be remembered (v. 16, 17). Your eyes see, your ears hear. Now this Christ speaks of,

[1] As a blessing; "Blessed are your eyes for they see, and your ears for they hear; it is your happiness, and it is a happiness for which you are indebted to the peculiar favour and blessing of God." The hearing ear and the seeing eye are God's work. They are a blessed work, which shall be fulfilled with power, when those who now see through a glass darkly, shall see face to face. The apostles were to teach others, and therefore were themselves blessed with the clearest discoveries of divine truth.

[2] As a transcendent blessing, desired by, but not granted to, many prophets and righteous men, v. 17. The Old Testament saints, who had some glimpses, some glimmerings of gospel light, coveted earnestly further discoveries. Those who know something of Christ, cannot but covet to know more. There was then, as there is still, a glory to be revealed; something in reserve, that they without us should not be made perfect, Heb. xi. 40. It is good for us to consider what means we enjoy, and what discoveries are made to us, now under the gospel, above what they had, and enjoyed, who lived under the Old Testament dispensation.

II. One of the parables which our Saviour put forth; it is that of the sower and the seed. Christ's parables are borrowed from common, ordinary things, from the most obvious things, that are of every day's observation, and come within the reach of the meanest capacity. Christ chose to do thus, 1. That spiritual things might hereby be made more plain the more easy to slide into our understandings. 2. That we might take occasion from those things which fall so often under our view, to meditate with delight on the things of God; and thus, when our hands are busiest about the world, we may notwithstanding that, but even with the help of that, be led to have our hearts in heaven. Thus the word of God shall talk with us, talk familiarly with us.

The parable of the sower is plain enough, v. 3–9. The exposition of it we have from Christ himself, who knew best what was his own meaning. "Hear ye therefore the parable of the sower (v. 18); you have heard it, but let us go over it again." Then only we hear the word aright, and to good purpose, when we understand what we hear; it is no hearing at all, if it be not with understanding. It is God's grace indeed that gives the understanding, but it is our duty to give our minds to understand.

Let us therefore compare the parable and the exposition.

(1) The seed sown is the word of God, here called the word of the kingdom (v. 19): the kingdom of heaven. This word is the seed sown, which seems a dead, dry thing, but all the product is virtually in it. It is incorruptible seed (1 Pet. i. 23).

(2) The sower that scatters the seed is our Lord Jesus Christ, either by himself, or by his ministers; see v. 37. Preaching to a multitude is sowing the corn; we know not where it must light; only see that it be good, that it be clean, and be sure to give it seed enough.

(3) The ground in which this seed is sown is the hearts of the children of men, which are differently qualified and disposed. Man's heart is like soil, capable of improvement, of bearing good fruit; it is a pity it should lie fallow. As it is with the earth; some sort of ground, take ever so much pains with it, and throw ever so good seed into it, yet it brings forth no fruit to any purpose; while the good soil brings forth plentifully: so it is with the hearts of men, whose different characters are here represented by four sorts of ground, of which three are bad, and but one good. The number of fruitless hearers is very great, even of those who heard Christ himself.

[1] The highway ground, v. 4–19. They had pathways through their cornfields (ch. xii. 1), and the seed that fell on them never entered, and so the birds picked it up.

First, What kind of hearers are compared to the highway ground; such as hear the word and understand it not. They take no heed to it, take no hold of it; they do not come with any design to get good. They mind not what is said, it comes in at one ear and goes out at the other, and makes no impression.

Secondly, How they come to be unprofitable hearers. The wicked one, that is, the devil, cometh and catcheth away that which was sown.—Such mindless, careless, trifling hearers are an easy prey to Satan; who, as he is the great murderer of souls, so he is the great thief of sermons. If we break not up the fallow ground, by preparing our hearts for the word, and if we cover not the seed afterwards, by meditation and prayer; if we give not a more earnest heed to the things which we have heard, we are as the highway ground.

[2] The stony ground. Some fell upon stony places (v. 5, 6), which represents the case of hearers who receive some good impressions of the word, but they are not lasting, v. 20, 21. It is possible we may be a great deal better than some others, and yet not be so good as we should be.

First, How far they went. 1. They hear the word; they turn neither their backs upon it, nor a deaf ear to it. Hearing the word will never bring us to heaven. 2. They are quick in hearing, forthwith it sprung up (v. 5), it sooner appeared above ground than that which was sown in the good soil. Hypocrites often get the start of true Christians in the shows of profession, and are often too hot to hold. He receiveth it straightway, without trying it; swallows it without chewing, and then there can never be a good digestion. 3. They receive it with joy. There are many that are very glad to hear a good sermon, that yet do not profit by it. Many taste the good word of God (Heb. vi. 5), and say they find sweetness in it, but some beloved lust is rolled under the tongue, which it would not agree with, and so they spit it out again. 4. They endure for awhile. Many endure for awhile, that do not endure to the end, they did run well, but something hindered them, Gal. v. 7.

Secondly, How they fell away, so that no fruit was brought to perfection. They have no root in themselves, no settled, fixed principles in their judgments, no firm resolution in their wills. It is possible there may be the green blade of a profession, where yet there is not the root of grace. Where there is not a principle, though there be a profession, we cannot expect perseverance. Those who have no root will endure but awhile.

Times of trial come, and then they come to nothing. When tribulation and persecution arise because of the word, he is offended. After a fair gale of opportunity usually follows a storm of persecution, to try who have received the word in sincerity, and who have not. It is wisdom to prepare for such a day. When trying times come, those who have no root are soon offended; they first quarrel with their profession, and then quit it. Persecution is represented in the parable by the scorching sun (v. 6); the same sun which warms and cherishes that which was well rooted, withers and burns up that which wanted root. Trials which shake some, confirm others, Phil. i. 12. Observe how soon they fall away; a profession taken up without consideration is commonly let fall without it: "Lightly come, lightly go."

[3] The thorny ground, Some fell among thorns. This went further than the former, for it had root. Prosperity destroys the word in the heart, as much as persecution does; and more dangerously, because more silently: the stones spoiled the root, the thorns spoil the fruit.

Now what are these choking thorns?

The cares of this world. Care for another world would quicken the springing of this seed, but care for this world chokes it. Worldly cares are fitly compared to thorns. They are entangling, vexing, scratching, and their end is to be burned, Heb. vi. 8. These thorns choke the good seed. Worldly cares are great hindrances to our profiting by the word of God. They eat up that vigour of soul which should be spent in divine things. Those who are careful and cumbered about many things, commonly neglect the one thing needful.

The deceitfulness of riches. Those who, by their care and industry, have raised estates, and from whom the danger that arises from care seems to be over are apt to promise themselves that in riches which is not in them; to rely upon them, and this chokes the word as much as care did. It is not so much riches, as the deceitfulness of riches, that does the mischief. We put our confidence in them, and raise our expectations from them, and then it is that they choke the good seed.

[4] The good ground (v. 18); Others fell into good ground, and it is pity but that good seed should always meet with good soil, and then there is no loss; such are good hearers of the word, v. 23.

Now that which distinguished this good ground from the rest, was, in one word, fruitfulness. He does not say that this good ground has no stones in it, or no thorns; but there were none that prevailed to hinder its fruitfulness. Saints, in this world, are not perfectly free from the remains of sin; but happily freed from the reign of it.

The hearers represented by the good ground are,

First, Intelligent hearers; they hear the word and understand it; they understand not only the sense and meaning of the word, but their own concern in it; they understand it as a man of business understands his business.

Secondly, Fruitful hearers, which is an evidence of their good understanding: which also beareth fruit. We then bear fruit, when we practise according to the word, and we do as we are taught.

Thirdly, Not all alike fruitful; some a hundredfold, some sixty, some thirty. Among fruitful Christians, some are more fruitful than others: where there is true grace, yet there are degrees of it; all Christ's scholars are not in the same form. But if the ground be good, and the fruit right, those who bring forth but thirtyfold shall be graciously accepted of God, and it will be fruit abounding to their account.

Lastly, He closes the parable with a solemn call to attention (v. 9), Who hath ears to hear, let him hear. The sense of hearing cannot be better employed than in hearing the word of God. Some are for hearing sweet melody: there is no melody like that of the word of God; others are for hearing new things (Acts xvii. 21): no news like that.

Verses 24–43

I. Another reason given why Christ preached by parables, v. 34, 35. All these things he spoke in parables, because the time was not yet come for the more clear and plain discoveries of the mysteries of the kingdom. Christ tries all ways and methods to do good to the souls of men. If men will not be instructed and influenced by plain preaching, he will try them with parables. 1. The matter of Christ's preaching. The mystery of the gospel had been hid in God, in his councils and decrees, from the beginning of the world. Eph. iii. 9. 2. The manner of Christ's preaching; he preached by parables; wise sayings, but figurative, and which help to engage attention and a diligent search.

II. The parable of the tares, and the exposition of it.

1. The disciples' request to their Master to have this parable expounded to them (v. 36); Jesus sent the multitude away; and it is to be feared many of them went away no wiser than they came. It is sad to think how many go away from sermons with the word of grace in their ears, but not the work of grace in their hearts. Christ went into the house, not so much for his own repose, as for particular converse with his disciples. The disciples laid hold on the opportunity, and they came to him. Those who would be wise for everything else, must be wise to discern and improve their opportunities, especially of converse with Christ. We lose the benefit of many a sermon by vain and unprofitable discourse after it. See Luke xxiv. 32. Private conference would contribute much to our profiting by public preaching.

The disciples' request to their Master was, Declare unto us the parable of the tares. This implied an acknowledgment of their ignorance, which they were not ashamed to make. Those are rightly disposed for Christ's teaching, that are sensible of their ignorance, and sincerely desirous to be taught. Christ had expounded the foregoing parable unasked, but for the exposition of this they ask him. The first light and the first grace are given further degrees of both which must be daily prayed for.

2. The exposition Christ gave of the parable. Now the drift of the parable is, to represent to us the present and future state of the kingdom of heaven, the gospel church: Christ's care of it, the devil's enmity against it, the mixture that there is in it of good and bad in this world, and the separation between them in the other world.

Let us go over the particulars of the exposition of the parable.

(1) He that sows the good seed is the Son of man. Jesus Christ is the Lord of the field, the Lord of the harvest, the Sower of good seed. Whatever good seed there is in the world, it all comes from the hand of Christ, and is of his sowing: truths preached, graces planted, souls sanctified, are good seed, and all owing to Christ. Ministers are instruments in Christ's hand to sow good seed.

(2) The field is the world; the world of mankind, a large field, capable of bringing forth good fruit; the more is it to be lamented that it brings forth so much bad fruit. It is his field, and because it is his he took care to sow it with good seed.

(3) The good seed are the children of the kingdom, true saints. Not in profession only, as the Jews were (ch. viii. 12), but in sincerity. They are the good seed, precious as seed, Ps. cxxvi. 6. The seed is scattered, so are the saints; dispersed, here one and there another, though in some places thicker sown than in others.

(4) The tares are the children of the wicked one. They are the children of the devil. They are tares in the field of this world; they do no good, they do hurt. They are weeds in the garden, have the same rain, and sunshine, and soil, with the good plants, but are good for nothing.

(5) The enemy that sowed the tares is the devil. He is an enemy to the field of the world, which he endeavours to make his own, by sowing his tares in it. They were sown while men slept. Satan watches all opportunities. We have therefore need to be sober, and vigilant. The enemy, when he had sown the tares, went his way (v. 25), that it might not be known who did it. When Satan is doing the greatest mischief, he studies most to conceal himself. If the enemy sow the tares, he may even go his way, they will spring up of themselves and do hurt; whereas, when good seed is sown, it must be tended, watered, and fenced, or it will come to nothing. The tares appeared not till the blade sprung up, and brought forth fruit, v. 26. There is a great deal of secret wickedness in the hearts of men, which is long hid under the cloak of a plausible profession, but breaks out at last. When a trying time comes, when fruit is to be brought forth, then you will return and discern between the sincere and the hypocrite: then you may say, This is wheat, and that is tares. The servants, when they were aware of it, complained to their master (v. 27); Sir, didst thou not sow good seed in thy field? No doubt he did; considering the seed which Christ sows, we may well ask, with wonder, Whence should these tares come? It is sad to see such tares, such weeds, in the garden of the Lord; to see the good soil wasted, the good seed choked, and such a reflection cast on the name and honour of Christ. The Master was soon aware whence it was (v. 28); An enemy has done this. He does not lay the blame upon the servants; they could not help it. The ministers of Christ, that are faithful and diligent, shall not be judged of Christ, for the mixture of bad with good, hypocrites with the sincere, in the field of the church. It must needs be that such offences will come; and they shall not be laid to our charge, if we do our duty. The servants were very forward to have these tares rooted up. "Wilt thou that we go and do it presently?" The Master very wisely prevented this (v. 29); Nay, lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. It is not possible for any man infallibly to distinguish between tares and wheat. It is possible there may be a discipline, either so mistaken in its rules, or so overnice in the application of them, as may prove vexatious to many that are truly godly and conscientious. The tares, if continued under the means of grace, may become good corn; therefore have patience with them.

(6) The harvest is the end of the world, v. 39. This world will have an end. At harvest all is ripe and ready to be cut down: both good and bad are ripe at the great day. At harvest every man reaps as he sowed; every man's ground, and seed, and skill, and industry, will be manifested.

(7) The reapers are the angels. The angels are servants to Christ, holy enemies to the wicked, and faithful friends to all the saints, and therefore fit to be thus employed.

(8) The fire, into which the tares shall then be cast.

[1] The tares will then be gathered out: The reapers (whose primary work it is to gather in the corn) shall be charged first to gather out the tares. Though good and bad are together in this world undistinguished, yet at the great day they shall be parted.

[2] They will then be bound in bundles, v. 30. Those who have been associates in sin, will be so in shame and sorrow.

[3] They will be cast into a furnace of fire; they are fit for nothing but fire. There shall be weeping, and gnashing of teeth; comfortless sorrow, and an incurable indignation at God.

(9) Heaven is the barn. But gather the wheat into my barn: so it is in the parable, v. 30. All God's wheat shall be lodged together in God's barn. There will be sheaves of corn, as well as bundles of tares: they will then be secured, and no longer exposed to wind and weather, sin and sorrow: no longer afar off, and at a great distance, in the field, but near, in the barn.

In the explanation of the parable, this is gloriously represented (v. 43); Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. The honour in reserve for them is, that they shall shine forth as the sun in that kingdom. Here they are obscure and hidden (Col. iii. 3), their beauty is eclipsed by their poverty, and the meanness of their outward condition; but then they shall shine forth as the sun from behind a dark cloud. They shall shine as the sun, the most glorious of all visible beings. Those who shine as lights in this world, that God may be glorified, shall shine as the sun in the other world, that they may be glorified. Our Saviour concludes, as before, with a demand of attention; Who hath ears to hear, let him hear.

III. Here is the parable of the grain of mustard-seed, v. 31, 32. The scope of this parable is to show, that the beginnings of the gospel would be small, but that its latter end would greatly increase.

Now concerning the work of the gospel, observe,

1. That it is commonly very weak and small at first, like a grain of mustard-seed, which is one of the least of all seeds. In particular places, the first breaking out of the gospel light is but as the dawning of the day. Young converts are like lambs that must be carried in his arms, Isa. xl. 11.

2. That yet it is growing and coming on. A grain of mustard-seed is small, but however, it is seed, and has in it a disposition to grow. Gracious habits confirmed, actings quickened, and knowledge more clear, faith more confirmed, love more inflamed; here is the seed growing.

3. That it will at last come to a great degree of strength and usefulness; when it is grown to some maturity, it becomes a tree. The church is like a great tree, in which the fowls of the air do lodge; God's people have recourse to it for food and rest, shade and shelter. In particular persons, growing grace will be strong grace and will bring much to pass. Grown Christians must covet to be useful to others, as the mustard-seed when grown is to the birds.

IV. Here is the parable of the leaven, v. 33.

1. A woman took this leaven; it was her work. Ministers are employed in leavening places, in leavening souls, with the gospel.

2. The leaven was hid in three measures of meal. The heart is, as the meal, soft and pliable; it is the tender heart that is likely to profit by the word. It is three measures of meal, a great quantity, for a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. The leaven must be hid in the heart. We must lay it up, as Mary laid up the sayings of Christ, Luke ii. 51.

3. The leaven thus hid in the dough, works there. The leaven works speedily, so does the word, and yet gradually. It works silently and insensibly (Mark iv. 26), yet strongly and irresistibly. Hide but the leaven in the dough, and all the world cannot hinder it from communicating its taste and relish to it, and yet none sees how it is done, but by degrees the whole is leavened. Thus it was in the world. The apostles, by their preaching, hid a handful of leaven in the great mass of mankind, and it had a strange effect; it put the world into a ferment, and in a sense turned it upside down (Acts xvii. 6). It was thus effectual, not by outward force, and therefore not by any such force resistible and conquerable, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts, who works, and none can hinder. Thus it is in the heart. It works a change, not in the substance; the dough is the same, but in the quality. It works a universal change; it diffuses itself into all the powers and faculties of the soul. This change is such as makes the soul to partake of the nature of the word, as the dough does of the leaven. It is a word of faith and repentance, holiness and love, and these are wrought in the soul by it. When the dough is leavened, then to the oven with it; trials and afflictions commonly attend this change; but thus saints are fitted to be bread for our Master's table.

Verses 44–52

I. That of the treasure hid in the field. Hitherto he had compared the kingdom of heaven to small things. In this parable and the next he represents it as of great value in itself. It is here likened to a treasure hid in the field, which, if we will, we may make our own.

1. Jesus Christ is the true Treasure; in him there is an abundance of all that which is rich and useful, and if we have an interest in him, it is all our own.

2. The gospel is the field in which this treasure is hid. It is hid, not in a garden enclosed, but in a field, an open field. Whatever royal mines we find, they are all our own, if we take the right course.

3. It is a great thing to discover the treasure hid in this field, and the unspeakable value of it. The richest mines are often in grounds that appear most barren. What is the Bible more than other good books? But those who have searched the scriptures, so as in them to find Christ and eternal life (John v. 39), have discovered such a treasure in this field as makes it infinitely more valuable.

4. Those who discern this treasure in the field, and value it aright, will never be easy till they have made it their own upon any terms. He rejoices in it, though as yet the bargain be not made; he is glad there is such a bargain to be had. He resolves to buy this field: they who embrace gospel offers, upon gospel terms, buy this field; they make it their own, for the sake of the unseen treasure in it. And so intent he is upon it, that he sells all to buy this field: they who would have saving benefit by Christ, must count everything but loss, that they may win Christ, and be found in him.

II. That of the pearl of price (v. 45, 46).

1. All the children of men are busy, seeking goodly pearls: one would be rich, another would be honourable, another would be learned; but the most are imposed upon, and take up with counterfeits for pearls.

2. Jesus Christ is a Pearl of great price; in having him, we have enough to make us happy here and for ever.

3. A true Christian is a spiritual merchant, that seeks and finds this pearl of price; and, as one that is resolved to be spiritually rich, trades high: He went and bought that pearl; did not only bid for it, but purchased it.

4. Those who would have a saving interest in Christ, must be willing to part with all for him, leave all to follow him. A man may buy gold too dear, but not this pearl of price.

III. That of the net cast into the sea, v. 47–49.

1. Here is the parable itself. The world is a vast sea. The preaching of the gospel is the casting of a net into this sea, to catch something out of it. This net gathers of every kind, as large dragnets do. In the visible church there is a deal of trash and rubbish, dirt and weeds and vermin, as well as fish. There is a time coming when this net will be full, and drawn to the shore. The net is now filling; sometimes it fills faster than at other times, but still it fills. When the net is full and drawn to the shore, there shall be a separation between the good and bad that were gathered in it. The good shall be gathered into vessels, as valuable, and therefore to be carefully kept, but the bad shall be cast away. While the net is in the sea, it is not known what is in it, the fishermen themselves cannot distinguish; but they carefully draw it, and all that is in it, to the shore, for the sake of the good that is in it.

2. Here is the explanation of the latter part of the parable, the former is obvious and plain enough: but the latter part refers to that which is yet to come, and is therefore more particularly explained, v. 49, 50. So shall it be at the end of the world. We must not look for the net full of all good fish; the vessels will be so, but in the net they are mixed. (1) The distinguishing of the wicked from the righteous. (2) The doom of the wicked when they are thus severed. They shall be cast into the furnace.

IV. Here is the parable of the good householder, which is intended to rivet all the rest.

1. The occasion of it was the good proficiency which the disciples had made in learning, and their profiting by this sermon in particular. He asked them, Have ye understood all these things? He was ready to explain what they did not understand. It is the will of Christ, that all those who read and hear the word should understand it; for otherwise how should they get good by it? They answered him, Yea, Lord. When they did not understand, they asked for an explication, v. 36. And the exposition of that parable was a key to the rest. Good truths mutually explain and illustrate one another.

2. The scope of the parable itself was to give his approbation and commendation of their proficiency. Christ is ready to encourage willing learners in his school, though they are but weak; and to say, Well done, well said.

(1) He commends them as scribes instructed unto the kingdom of heaven. They were now learning that they might teach. Those who are to instruct others, have need to be well instructed themselves. The instruction of a gospel minister must be in the kingdom of heaven. Not instructed to the kingdom of heaven, he will make but a bad minister.

(2) He compares them to a good householder, who brings forth out of his treasure things new and old; fruits of last year's growth and this year's gathering, abundance and variety. What should be a minister's furniture, a treasure of things new and old. Old experiences, and new observations, all have their use; and we must not content ourselves with old discoveries, but must be adding new. Live and learn. What use he should make of this furniture; he should bring forth: laying up is in order to laying out, for the benefit of others. Christ himself received that he might give; so must we, and we shall have more. In bringing forth, things new and old do best together; old truths, but new methods and expressions.

Verses 53–58

We have here Christ in his own country. His own countrymen had rejected him once, yet he came to them again. Christ does not take refusers at their first word, but repeats his offers to those who have often repulsed them. He had a natural affection to his own country. His treatment this time was much the same as before, scornful and spiteful.

I. How they expressed their contempt of him. When he taught them in their synagogue, they were astonished that it should be so; looking upon him as unlikely to be such a teacher. Two things they upbraided him with.

1. His want of academical education. They owned that he had wisdom, and did mighty works; but the question was, Whence he had them. Note, Mean and prejudiced spirits are apt to judge of men by their education, and to enquire more into their rise than into their reasons. "Whence has this man these mighty works?" If they had not been wilfully blind, they must have concluded him to be divinely assisted and commissioned, who without the help of education gave such proofs of extraordinary wisdom and power.

2. The meanness and poverty of his relations, v. 55, 56. They upbraid him with his father. Is not this the carpenter's son? What harm in that? No disparagement to him to be the son of an honest tradesman. This carpenter was of the house of David (Luke i. 27), a son of David (ch. i. 20); though a carpenter, yet a person of honour. Some sordid spirits regard no branch, no not the Branch from the stem of Jesse (Isa. xi. 1), if it be not the top branch. They upbraid him with his mother. Why, truly, his mother is called Mary, and that was a very common name, and they all knew her, and knew her to be an ordinary person; and this is turned to his reproach, as if men had nothing to be valued by but splendid titles; poor things to measure worth by. They upbraid him with his brethren, whose names they knew, good men but poor men, and therefore despised; and Christ for their sakes. His sisters too are all with us; they should therefore have loved him and respected him the more, because he was one of themselves, but therefore they despised him. They were offended in him.

II. See how he resented this contempt, v. 57, 58.

1. It did not trouble his heart. He mildly imputes it to the common humour of the children of men, to undervalue excellences that are cheap, and common, and home-bred, It is usually so. A prophet is not without honour, save in his own country. Prophets should have honour paid them, and commonly have; men of God are great men, and men of honour, and challenge respect. Notwithstanding this, they are commonly least regarded and reverenced in their own country. Familiarity breeds contempt.

2. It did for the present (to speak with reverence), in effect, tie his hands: He did not many mighty works there, because of their unbelief. Unbelief is the great obstruction to Christ's favours. So that if mighty works be not wrought in us, it is not for want of power or grace in Christ, but for want of faith in us.

CHAP. XIV

Here is, I. The martyrdom of John; his imprisonment (ver. 1–5), and the beheading of him, ver. 6–12. II. The miracles of Christ. 1. His feeding five thousand men with five loaves and two fishes, ver. 13–21. 2. Christ's walking on the waves to his disciples in a storm, ver. 22–23. 3. His healing the sick with the touch of the hem of his garment, ver. 34–36.

Verses 1–12

We have here the story of John's martyrdom.

I. The occasion of relating this story here, v. 1, 2.

1. The account brought to Herod of the miracles which Christ wrought. Herod the tetrarch or chief governor of Galilee heard of the fame of Jesus. At that time, when his countrymen slighted him, upon the account of his meanness and obscurity, he began to be famous at court. The gospel, like the sea, gets in one place what it loses in another. It should seem, Herod had not heard of him till now, and now only heard the fame of him. It is the unhappiness of the great ones of the world, that they are most out of the way of hearing the best things (1 Cor. ii. 8).

2. The construction he puts upon this (v. 2); He said to his servants this is John the Baptist; he is risen from the dead. John, while he lived, did no miracle (John x. 41); but Herod concludes, that, being risen from the dead, he is clothed with a greater power than he had while he was living. Observe here concerning Herod,

(1) How he was disappointed in what he intended by beheading John. He thought if he could get that troublesome fellow out of the way, he might go on in his sins, undisturbed and uncontrolled; yet no sooner is that effected, than he hears of Jesus and his disciples preaching the same pure doctrine that John preached. Ministers may be silenced, and imprisoned, and banished, and slain, but the word of God cannot be run down. Sometimes God raises up many faithful ministers out of the ashes of one.

(2) How he was filled with causeless fears, merely from the guilt of his own conscience. A guilty conscience suggests everything that is frightful, and, like a whirlpool, gathers all to itself that comes near it. Thus the wicked flee when none pursue (Prov. xxviii. 1).

(3) How, notwithstanding this, he was hardened in his wickedness. He does not express the least remorse or sorrow for his sin in putting him to death. The devils believe and tremble, but they never believe and repent.

II. The story itself of the imprisonment and martyrdom of John. If Christ's forerunner was thus treated, let not his followers expect to be caressed by the world.

1. John's faithfulness in reproving Herod, v. 3, 4. Herod was one of John's hearers (Mark vi. 20), and therefore John might be the more bold with him.

The particular sin he reproved him for was, marrying his brother Philip's wife, not his widow (that had not been so criminal), but his wife. Philip was now living, and Herod inveigled his wife from him, and kept her for his own. For this sin John reproved him: It is not lawful for thee to have her. He charges it upon him as a sin: It is not lawful. That which by the law of God is unlawful to other people, is by the same law unlawful to princes and the greatest of men. There is no prerogative, no, not for the greatest and most arbitrary kings, to break the laws of God. If princes and great men break the law of God, it is very fit they should be told of it by proper persons, and in a proper manner.

2. The imprisonment of John for his faithfulness, v. 3. Herod laid hold on John, bound him, and put him in prison; partly to gratify his own revenge, and partly to please Herodias. Faithful reproofs, if they do not profit, usually provoke. It is no new thing for God's ministers to suffer ill for doing well. Troubles abide those most that are most diligent and faithful in doing their duty.

3. The restraint that Herod lay under from further venting of his rage against John, v. 5.

(1) He would have put him to death. Perhaps that was not intended at first when he imprisoned him, but his revenge by degrees boiled up to that height.

(2) That which hindered him was his fear of the multitude, because they counted John as a prophet. It was not because he feared God (if the fear of God had been before his eyes he would not have imprisoned him), nor because he feared John, but because he feared the people; he was afraid for himself, his own safety. Tyrants have their fears. Wicked men are restrained from the most wicked practices, merely by their secular interest, and not by any regard to God. The danger of sin that appears to sense, or to fancy only, influences men more than that which appears to faith. Men fear being hanged for that which they do not fear being damned for.

4. The contrivance of bringing John to his death. Now here we have an account of his release, not by any other discharge than death, the period of all a good man's troubles.

Herodias laid the plot; her implacable revenge thirsted after John's blood, and would be satisfied with nothing less. Cross the carnal appetites, and they turn into the most barbarous passions. Herodias contrived how to bring about the murder of John so artificially as to save Herod's credit, and so to pacify the people.

(1) The humouring of Herod by the damsel's dancing upon a birthday. In honour of the day, there must needs be, as usual, a ball at court; and, to grace the solemnity, the daughter of Herodias danced before them; who being the queen's daughter, it was more than she ordinarily condescended to do. This young lady's dancing pleased Herod.

(2) The rash and foolish promise which Herod made to this wanton girl, to give her whatsoever she would ask: and this promise confirmed with an oath, v. 7. It was a very extravagant obligation which Herod here entered into, and no way becoming a prudent man.

(3) The bloody demand the young lady made of John the Baptist's head, v. 8. She was before instructed of her mother. The case of those children is very sad, whose parents are their counsellors to do wickedly.

Herod having given her her commission, and Herodias her instructions, she requires John the Baptist's head in a charger. John must be beheaded then; that is the death by which he must glorify God. Yet this is not enough, the thing must be humoured too, and not only a revenge, but a fancy must be gratified; it must be given her here in a charger, served up in blood. It must be given her, and she will reckon it a recompence for her dancing, and desire no more.

(4) Herod's grant of this demand (v. 9); The king was sorry, at least took on him to be so, but, for the oath's sake, he commanded it to be given her. The king was sorry. Many a man sins with regret, that never has any true regret for his sin; sins with reluctancy, and yet goes on to sin. Here is a pretended conscience of his oath, with a specious show of honour and honesty; he must needs do something, for the oath's sake. It is a great mistake to think that a wicked oath will justify a wicked action. No man can lay himself under an obligation to sin, because God has already so strongly obliged every man against sin. Here is a real baseness in compliance with wicked companions. Herod yielded, not so much for the sake of the oath, but because it was public, and in compliment to them that sat at meat with him; he granted the demand that he might not seem, before them, to have broken his engagement. A point of honour goes much further with many than a point of conscience. Here is a real malice to John at the bottom of this concession, or else he might have found out evasions enough to have got clear of his promise. He commanded it to be given her.

(5) The execution of John, pursuant to this grant (v. 10); He sent and beheaded John in the prison. He must be beheaded with expedition, to gratify Herodias. It was done in the night. It was done in the prison, not at the usual place of execution, for fear of an uproar. A great deal of innocent blood, of martyr's blood, has thus been huddled up in corners.

Thus was that voice silenced, that burning and shining light extinguished; thus did that prophet, that Elias, of the New Testament, fall a sacrifice to the resentments of an imperious, whorish woman.

5. The disposal of the poor remains of this blessed saint and martyr.

(1) The damsel brought the head in triumph to her mother, as a trophy of the victories of her malice and revenge, v. 11.

(2) The disciples buried the body, and brought the news in tears to our Lord Jesus.

[1] They buried the body. There is a respect owing to the servants of Christ, not only while they live, but in their bodies and memories when they are dead.

[2] They went and told Jesus; not so much that he might shift for his own safety as that they might receive comfort from him, and be taken in among his disciples. When anything ails us at any time, it is our duty and privilege to make Christ acquainted with it. It will be a relief to our burthened spirits to unbosom ourselves to a friend we may be free with. When the shepherds are smitten, the sheep need not be scattered while they have the great Shepherd of the sheep to go to, who is still the same, Heb. xiii. 8, 20. Comforts otherwise highly valuable, are sometimes therefore taken from us, because they come between us and Christ, and are apt to carry away that love and esteem which are due to him only. It is better to be drawn to Christ by want and loss, than not to come to him at all.

Verses 13–21

This passage of story, concerning Christ's feeding five thousand men with five loves and two fishes, is recorded by all the four Evangelists.

I. The great resort of people to Christ, when he was retired into a desert place, v. 13. He withdrew into privacy when he heard, not of John's death, but of the thoughts Herod had concerning him, that he was John the Baptist risen from the dead, he departed further off, to get out of Herod's jurisdiction. In times of peril, when God opens a door of escape, it is lawful to flee for our own preservation, unless we have some special call to expose ourselves. He departed by ship. When the people heard it, they followed him on foot from all parts. Such an interest Christ had in the affections of the multitude, that his withdrawing from them did but draw them after him with so much the more eagerness. It should seem, there was more crowding to Christ after John's martyrdom than before. Sometimes the sufferings of the saints are made to further the gospel (Phil. i. 12). When Christ and his word withdraw from us, it is best for us (whatever flesh and blood may object to the contrary) to follow it. The presence of Christ and his gospel makes a desert place not only tolerable, but desirable; it makesthe wilderness an Eden.

II. The tender compassion of our Lord Jesus towards those who thus followed him, v. 14. He went forth, and appeared publicly among them. He went forth from his retirement, when he saw people desirous to hear him, as one willing both to toil himself, and to expose himself, for the good of souls. When he saw the multitude, he had compassion on them. The sight of a great multitude may justly move compassion. None like Christ for pity to souls; his compassions fail not. He did not only pity them, but he helped them; many of them were sick, and he, in compassion to them, healed them. After awhile, they were all hungry, and he, in compassion to them, fed them.

III. The motion which the disciples made for the dismissing of the congregation, and Christ's setting aside the motion. They thought there was a good day's work done, and it was time to disperse. Christ's disciples are often more careful to show their discretion, than to show their zeal. Christ would not dismiss them hungry as they were, but orders his disciples to provide for them. Christ all along expressed more tenderness toward the people than his disciples did. See how loth Christ is to part with those who are resolved to cleave to him! They need not depart.

But if they be hungry, they have need to depart, for that is a necessity which has no law, therefore give you them to eat. The Lord is for the body; it is the work of his hands, it is part of his purchase; he was himself clothed with a body, that he might encourage us to depend upon him for the supply of our bodily wants. If we seek first the kingdom of God, and make that our chief care, we may depend upon God to add other things to us, as far as he sees fit.

IV. The slender provision that was made for this great multitude; and here we must compare the number of invited guests with the bill of fare.

1. The number of the guests was five thousand of men, besides women and children. This was a vast auditory that Christ preached to, and we have reason to think an attentive auditory; and yet, it should seem, far the greater part came to nothing; they went off and followed him no more. We would rather perceive the acceptableness of the word by the conversion, than by the crowds, of its hearers; though that also is a good sight and a good sign.

2. The bill of fare was very disproportionable to the number of the guests, but five loaves and two fishes. This provision the disciples carried about with them for the use of the family, now they were retired into the desert. Here is neither plenty, nor variety, nor dainty; a dish of fish was no rarity to them that were fishermen, but it was food convenient for the twelve; here was no wine or strong drink; fair water from the rivers in the desert was the best they had to drink with their meat; and yet out of this Christ will have the multitude fed. Those who have but a little, yet when the necessity is urgent, must relieve others out of that little, and that is the way to make it more.

V. The liberal distribution of this provision among the multitude (v. 18, 19); Bring them hither to me. Note, The way to have our creature-comforts, comforts indeed to us, is to bring them to Christ. That is likely to prosper and do well with us, which we put into the hands of our Lord Jesus, that he may dispose of it as he pleases, and that we may take it back from his hand, and then it will be doubly sweet to us.

1. The seating of the guests (v. 19); He commanded them to sit down. But what shall we do for chairs for them all? Let them sit down on the grass. Here is not so much as a cloth spread, no plates or napkins laid, no knives or forks, nor so much as a bench to sit down on; but he commanded them to sit down on the grass. By doing everything thus, without any pomp or splendour, he plainly showed that his kingdom was not of this world.

2. The craving of a blessing. He himself looked up to heaven, and blessed, and gave thanks; he praised God for the provision they had, and prayed to God to bless it to them. Herein he has taught us that good duty of craving a blessing and giving thanks at our meals: God's good creatures must be received with thanksgiving. When Christ blessed, he looked up to heaven, to teach us in prayer, to eye God as a Father in heaven; and when we receive our creature-comforts to look thitherward, as taking them from God's hand, and depending on him for a blessing.

3. The carving of the meat. The Master of the feast was himself head-carver, for he brake, and gave the loaves to the disciples, and the disciples to the multitude. Ministers can never fill the people's hearts, unless Christ first fill their hands: and what he has given to the disciples, they must give to the multitude. And, blessed be God, be the multitude ever so great, there is enough for all, enough for each.

4. The increase of the meat. Here is no mention of any word that Christ spoke, by which the food was multiplied; the purposes and intentions of his mind and will shall take effect, though they be not spoken out: but this is observable, that the meat was multiplied, not in the heap at first, but in the distribution of it. Thus grace grows by being acted, and, while other things perish in the using, spiritual gifts increase in the using. Thus there is that scattereth, and yet increaseth.

VI. The plentiful satisfaction of all the guests with this provision.

1. There was enough: They did all eat, and were filled. Those whom Christ feeds, he fills. As there was enough for all, they did all eat, so there was enough for each, they were filled; though there was but a little, there was enough, and that is as good as a feast. The blessing of God can make a little go a great way.

2. There was to spare: They took up of the fragments that remained, twelve baskets full, one basket for each apostle: thus what they gave they had again, and a great deal more with it. This was to show that the provision Christ makes for those who are his is not bare and scanty, but rich and plenteous; an overflowing fulness.

It is the same divine power which multiplies the seed sown in the ground every year, and makes the earth yield her increase; so that what was brought out by handfuls, is brought home in sheaves. This is the Lord's doing.

Verses 22–33

We have here the story of another miracle which Christ wrought for the relief of his friends and followers, his walking upon the water to his disciples.

I. Christ's dismissing of his disciples and the multitude, after he had fed them miraculously. He constrained his disciples to get into a ship, and to go before him unto the other side, v. 22. St. John gives a particular reason for the hasty breaking up of this assembly, because the people were so affected with the miracle of the loaves, that they were about to take him by force, and make him a king (John vi. 15).

1. Christ sent the people away. He sent them away with a blessing, with some parting words of caution, counsel, and comfort.

2. He constrained the disciples to go into a ship first, for till they were gone the people would not stir. The disciples were loth to go, and would not have gone, if he had not constrained them.

II. Christ's retirement hereupon (v. 23); He went up into a mountain apart to pray. Observe here,

1. That he was alone; he went apart into a solitary place, and was there all alone. He chose sometimes to be alone, to set us an example. Those are not Christ's followers that do not care for being alone; that cannot enjoy themselves in solitude, when they have none else to converse with, none else to enjoy, but God and their own hearts.

2. That he was alone at prayer; that was his business in this solitude, to pray. Christ has herein set before us an example of secret prayer, and the performance of it secretly, according to the rule he gave, ch. vi. 6. When the disciples went to sea, their Master went to prayer.

3. That he was long alone; there he was when the evening was come, and, for aught that appears, there he was till towards morning, the fourth watch of the night. The night came on, and it was a stormy tempestuous night, yet he continued instant in prayer. It is good when we find our hearts enlarged, to continue long in secret prayer.

III. The condition that the poor disciples were in at this time: Their ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves, v. 24.

1. They were got into the midst of the sea when the storm rose. We may have fair weather at the beginning of our voyage, and yet meet with storms before we arrive at the port we are bound for. After a long calm expect some storm or other.

2. The disciples were now where Christ sent them, and yet met with this storm. It is no new thing for Christ's disciples to meet with storms in the way of their duty, and to be sent to sea then when their Master foresees a storm; but let them not take it unkindly. Christ designs hereby to manifest himself with the more wonderful grace to them and for them.

3. It was a great discouragement to them now that they had not Christ with them, as they had formerly when they were in a storm. Thus Christ used his disciples first to less difficulties, and then to greater, and so trains them up by degrees to live by faith.

4. Though the wind was contrary, and they were tossed with waves, yet being ordered by their Master to the other side, they did not tack about and come back again, but made the best of their way forward. Though troubles and difficulties may disturb us in our duty, they must not drive us from it.

IV. Christ's approach to them in this condition (v. 25); and in this we have an instance,

1. Of his goodness, that he went unto them, as one that took cognizance of their case, and was under a concern about them. The extremity of the church and people of God is Christ's opportunity to visit them and appear for them.

2. Of his power, that he went unto them, walking on the sea. This is a great instance of Christ's sovereign dominion over all the creatures. We need not enquire how this was done. It is sufficient that it proves his divine power. Christ can take what way he pleases to save his people.

V. Here is an account of what passed between Christ and his distressed friends upon his approach.

1. Between him and all the disciples. We are here told,

(1) How their fears were raised (v. 26); When they saw him walking on the sea, they were troubled, saying, It is a spirit. It is an apparition; so it might much better be rendered. These disciples said, It is a spirit; when they should have said, It is the Lord; it can be no other. Even the appearances and approaches of deliverance are sometimes the occasions of trouble and perplexity to God's people, who are sometimes most frightened when they are least hurt. The appearance of a spirit, or the fancy of it, cannot but be frightful. The more acquaintance we have with God, the Father of spirits, and the more careful we are to keep ourselves in his love, the better able we shall be to deal with those fears. A little thing frightens us in a storm. Most of our danger from outward troubles arises from the occasion they give for inward trouble.

(2) How these fears were silenced, v. 27. He delayed his succour for some time; but he hastened his succour against their fright, as much the more dangerous; he straightway laid that storm with his word, Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid. He rectified their mistake, by making himself known to them, It is I. He does not name himself to these disciples, it was enough to say, It is I; they knew his voice, as his sheep (John x. 4), as Mary Magdalene, John xx. 16. It was enough to make them easy, to understand who it was they saw. A right knowledge opens the door to true comfort, especially the knowledge of Christ. He encouraged them against their fright; It is I, and therefore, Be of good cheer. If Christ's disciples be not cheerful in a storm, it is their own fault, he would have them so. Be not afraid; 1. "Be not afraid of me, now that you know it is I." Christ will not be a terror to those to whom he manifests himself; when they come to understand him aright, the terror will be over. 2. "Be not afraid of the tempest, of the winds and waves; fear them not, while I am so near you. I am he that concerns himself for you, and will not stand by and see you perish." Nothing needs be a terror to those that have Christ near them, and know he is theirs; no, not death itself.

2. Between him and Peter, v. 28–31.

(1) Peter's courage, and Christ's countenancing that.

[1] It was very bold in Peter, that he would venture to come to Christ upon the water (v. 28); Lord, if it be thou, bid me come unto thee. Courage was Peter's master grace; and that made him so forward above the rest to express his love to Christ, though others perhaps loved him as well.

It is an instance of Peter's affection to Christ, that he desired to come to him. When he sees Christ he is impatient to be with him. He does not say, Bid me walk on the waters, as desiring it for the miracle sake; but, Bid me come to thee, as desiring it for Christ's sake. True love will break through fire and water to come to Christ. Those that would have benefit by Christ as a Saviour, must thus by faith come to him. When, for a small moment, Christ has forsaken his people, his returns are welcome and most affectionately embraced.

It is an instance of Peter's caution and due observance of the will of Christ, that he would not come without a warrant. Not, "If it be thou, I will come"; but If it be thou, bid me come. The boldest spirits must wait for a call to hazardous enterprises, and we must not rashly and presumptuously thrust ourselves upon them.

It is an instance of Peter's faith and resolution, that he ventured upon the water when Christ bid him. What difficulty or danger could stand before such a faith and such a zeal?

[2] It was very kind in Christ, that he was pleased to own him in it, v. 29. Christ knew that it came from a sincere and zealous affection to him, and graciously accepted of it. Christ is well pleased with the expressions of his people's love, though mixed with manifold infirmities, and makes the best of them.

He bid him come. When Peter asked a sign, he had it, because he did it with a resolution to trust Christ.

He bore him out when he did come; Peter walked upon the water. The communion of true believers with Christ is represented by their being quickened with him, raised up with him. Now, methinks, it is represented in this story by their walking with him on the water. Through the strength of Christ we are borne up above the world, kept from sinking into it, from being overwhelmed by it, obtain a victory over it (1 John v. 4).

He walked upon the water, not for diversion or ostentation, but to go to Jesus. Nor can we ever come to Jesus, unless we be upheld by his power; which power we must depend upon, as Peter when he walked upon the water: and there is no danger of sinking while underneath are the everlasting arms.

(2) Here is Peter's cowardice, and Christ's reproving him and succouring him. Christ bid him come, not only that he might walk upon the water, and so know Christ's power, but that he might sink, and so know his own weakness. Peter's great fear (v. 30); He was afraid. The strongest faith and the greatest courage have a mixture of fear. Those that can say, Lord, I believe; must say, Lord, help my unbelief. Peter was very stout at first, but afterwards his heart failed him. The lengthening out of a trial discovers the weakness of faith.

The cause of this fear; He saw the wind boisterous. While Peter kept his eye fixed upon Christ, and upon his word and power, he walked upon the water well enough; but when he took notice withal of the danger he was in, then he feared. Looking at difficulties with an eye of sense more than at precepts and promises with an eye of faith is at the bottom of all our inordinate fears. Peter, when he saw the wind boisterous, should have remembered what he had seen (ch. viii. 27), when the winds and the sea obeyed Christ.

The effect of this fear; He began to sink. While faith kept up, he kept above water: but when faith staggered, he began to sink. The sinking of our spirits is owing to the weakness of our faith; we are upheld (but it is as we are saved) through faith (1 Pet. i. 5). It was Christ's great mercy to him, that, upon the failing of his faith, he did not leave him to sink outright, to sink to the bottom as a stone (Exod. xv. 5), but gave him time to cry, Lord, save me. Such is the care of Christ concerning true believers; though weak, they do but begin to sink!

The remedy he had recourse to in this distress, the old, tried, approved remedy, and that was prayer: he cried, Lord, save me. 1. The manner of his praying; it is fervent and importunate; He cried. When faith is weak, prayer should be strong. 2. The matter of his prayer was pertinent and to the purpose; He cried,

Lord, save me. Those that would be saved, must not only come to him, but cry to him for salvation; but we are never brought to this, till we find ourselves sinking; sense of need will drive us to him.

Christ's great favour to Peter, in this fright.

He saved him. For immediately he stretched forth his hand, and caught him. Note, Christ's time to save is, when we sink: he helps at a dead lift. Christ's hand is still stretched out to all believers, to keep them from sinking. Never fear, he will hold his own.

He rebuked him; for as many as he loves and saves, he reproves and chides; O thou of little faith, wherefore didst thou doubt? Faith may be true, and yet weak; at first, like a grain of mustard-seed. Peter had faith enough to bring him upon the water, yet, because not enough to carry him through, Christ tells him he had but little. Our discouraging doubts and fears are all owing to the weakness of our faith: therefore we doubt, because we are but of little faith. Could we but believe more, we should doubt less. It is true, he doth not cast off weak believers, but it is as true, that he is not pleased with weak faith, no, not in those that are nearest to him. Wherefore didst thou doubt? What reason was there for it? There is no good reason why Christ's disciples should be of a doubtful mind, no, not in a stormy day, because he is ready to them, a very present Help.

VI. The ceasing of the storm, v. 32. When Christ was come into the ship, they were presently at the shore. Christ walked upon the water till he came to the ship, and then went into that, when he could as easily have walked to the shore. When Christ came into the ship, Peter came in with him. Companions with Christ in his patience, shall be companions in his kingdom, Rev. i. 9. Those that walk with him shall reign with him.

When they were come into the ship, immediately the storm ceased. When Christ comes into a soul, he makes winds and storms to cease there, and commands peace. Welcome Christ, and the noise of her waves will soon be quelled. The way to be still is, to know that he is God, that he is the Lord with us.

VII. The adoration paid to Christ hereupon (v. 33); They that were in the ship came and worshipped him, and said, Of a truth, thou art the Son of God. Two good uses they made of this distress, and this deliverance.

1. It was a confirmation of their faith in Christ. They knew before that he was the Son of God, but now they know it better. Faith, after a conflict with unbelief, is sometimes the more active, and gets to greater degrees of strength by being exercised. Now they know it of a truth. Faith then grows, when it arrives at a full assurance, when it sees clearly, and saith, Of a truth.

2. They took occasion from it to give him the glory due unto his name. They worshipped Christ. When Christ manifests his glory for us, we ought to return it to him (Ps. l. 15). Their worship and adoration of Christ were thus expressed, Of a truth thou art the Son of God. The matter of our creed may and must be made the matter of our praise. Faith is the proper principle of worship, and worship the genuine product of faith.

Verses 34–36

We have here an account of miracles by wholesale, which Christ wrought on the other side of the water, in the land of Gennesaret. Whithersoever Christ went, he was doing good.

I. The forwardness and faith of the men of that place. These were more noble than the Gergesenes, their neighbours. Those besought Christ to depart from them, they had no occasion for him; these besought him to help them, they had need of him. Christ reckons it the greatest honour we can do him, to make use of him. Now here we are told,

1. How the men of that place were brought to Christ; they had knowledge of him. It is probable that his miraculous passage over the sea might help to make way for his entertainment in those parts; and perhaps it was one thing Christ intended in it, for he has great reaches in what he does. They that know Christ's name, will make their application to him: if Christ were better known, he would not be neglected as he is; he is trusted as far as he is known.

They had knowledge of him, that is, of his being among them. The discerning of the day of our opportunities is a good step toward the improvement of it. It is better to know that there is a prophet among us than that there has been one.

2. How they brought others to Christ; They sent out into all that country. Note, those that have got the knowledge of Christ themselves, should do all they can to bring others acquainted with him too. We must not eat these spiritual morsels alone; there is in Christ enough for us all, so that there is nothing got by monopolising. When we have opportunities of getting good to our souls, we should bring as many as we can to share with us. More than we think of would close with opportunities, if they were but called upon and invited to them. Neighbourhood is an advantage of doing good which must be improved.

3. What their business was with Christ; They brought unto him all that were diseased. If love to Christ and his doctrine will not bring them to him, yet self-love would. Did we but rightly seek our own things, the things of our own peace and welfare, we should seek the things of Christ.

4. How they made their application to him; They besought him that they might only touch the hem of his garment, v. 36. They applied themselves to him, (1) With great importunity; they besought him. The greatest favours and blessings are to be obtained from Christ by entreaty; Ask, and it shall be given. (2) With great humility. Their desiring to touch the hem of his garment, intimates that they thought themselves unworthy that he should so much as speak to their case, much less touch them for their cure; but they will look upon it as a great favour, if he will give them leave to touch the hem of his garment. (3) With great assurance of the all-sufficiency of his power, not doubting but that they should be healed, even by touching the hem of his garment. They were sure that there was in him such an overflowing fulness of healing virtue, that they could not fail of a cure, who were but admitted near him. It was in this country and neighbourhood that the woman with the bloody issue was cured by touching the hem of his garment, and was commended for her faith (ch. ix. 20–22); and thence, probably, they took occasion to ask this. It is good using those means and methods which others before us have sped well in the use of.

II. The fruit and success of this their application to Christ. It was not in vain for as many as touched, were made perfectly whole. Christ's cures are perfect cures. Those that he heals, he heals perfectly. He doth not do his work by halves. There is abundance of healing virtue in Christ for all that apply themselves to him, be they ever so many. The least of Christ's institutions, like the hem of his garment, is replenished with the overflowing fulness of his grace. The healing virtue that is in Christ, is put forth for the benefit of those that by a true and lively faith touch him. Christ is in heaven, but his word is nigh us, and he himself in that word. When we mix faith with the word, submit to its influences and commands, then we touch the hem of Christ's garment. It is but thus touching, and we are made whole.

CHAP. XV

In this chapter, we have our Lord Jesus, as the great Prophet teaching, as the great Physician healing, and as the great Shepherd of the sheep feeding; as the Father of spirits instructing them: as the Conqueror of Satan dispossessing him; and as concerned for the bodies of his people, providing for them. I. Christ's discourse with the scribes and Pharisees, ver. 1–9. II. His discourse concerning the things that defile a man, ver. 10–20. III. His casting of the devil out of the woman of Canaan's daughter, ver. 21–28. IV. His healing of all that were brought to him, ver. 29–31. V. His feeding of four thousand men, ver. 32–39.

Verses 1–9

I. Here is the cavil of the scribes and Pharisees at Christ's disciples, for eating with unwashen hands. They were men of learning and men of business. These scribes and Pharisees here introduced were of Jerusalem; they should therefore have been better than others, but they were worse. External privileges, if they be not duly improved, commonly swell men up the more with pride and malignity.

Now if these great men be the accusers, pray what is the accusation? Nonconformity to the canons of their church (v. 2); Why do thy disciples transgress the tradition of the elders? This charge they make good in a particular instance; They wash not their hands when they eat bread.

Observe, 1. What was the tradition of the elders— That people should often wash their hands, and always at meat. This they placed a great deal of religion in, supposing that the meat they touched with unwashen hands would be defiling to them. The Pharisees practised this themselves, and with a great deal of strictness imposed it upon others. Nay, they would not eat meat with one that did not wash before meat.

2. What was the transgression of this tradition or injunction by the disciples; it seems, they did not wash their hands when they ate bread. The custom was innocent enough, and had a decency in its civil use. But when it came to be practised and imposed as a religious rite and ceremony, and such a stress laid upon it, the disciples, though weak in knowledge, yet were so well taught as not to comply with it, or observe it; no not when the scribes and Pharisees had their eye upon them. They had already learned St. Paul's lesson.

3. What was the complaint of the scribes and Pharisees against them. They quarrel with Christ about it, "Why do thy disciples transgress the canons of the church?" It was well that the complaint was made to Christ; for the disciples themselves were perhaps not so well able to give a reason for what they did as were to be wished.

II. Here is Christ's answer to this cavil, and his justification of the disciples.

Two ways Christ replies upon them;

1. By way of recrimination, v. 3–6. They were spying motes in the eyes of his disciples, but Christ shows them a beam in their own. It is such a censure of their tradition (and the authority of that was what they built their charge upon) as makes not only a non-compliance lawful, but an opposition a duty.

(1) The charge in general is, You transgress the commandment of God by your tradition. They call it the tradition of the elders, laying stress upon the antiquity of the usage, and the authority of them that imposed it. You transgress the commandment of God. Note, Those who are most zealous of their own impositions, are commonly most careless of God's commands.

(2) The proof of this charge is in a particular instance, that of their transgressing the fifth commandment.

[1] Let us see what the command of God is (v. 4), what the precept, and what the sanction of the law is.

The precept is, Honour thy father and thy mother; this is enjoined by the common Father of mankind. The whole of children's duty to their parents is included in this of honouring them, which is the spring and foundation of all the rest.

The sanction of this law in the fifth commandment, is, a promise, that thy days may be long; but our Saviour waives that, lest any should thence infer it to be only a thing commendable and profitable, and insists upon the penalty annexed to the breach of this commandment in another scripture, which denotes the duty to be highly and indispensably necessary; He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death. By our Saviour's application of this law, it appears, that denying service or relief to parents is included in cursing them. Though the language be respectful enough, and nothing abusive in it, yet what will that avail, if the deeds be not agreeable?

[2] Let us see what was the contradiction which the tradition of the elders gave to this command. It was not direct and downright, but implicit; their casuists gave them such rules as furnished them with an easy evasion from the obligation of this command, v. 5, 6. Observe,

First, What their tradition was; That a man could not in any case bestow his worldly estate better than to give it to the priests, and devote it to the service of the temple: and that when anything was so devoted, it was not only unlawful to alienate it, but all other obligations, though ever so just and sacred, were thereby superseded.

Secondly, How they allowed the application of this to the case of children. When their parents' necessities called for their assistance, they pleaded, that all they could spare from themselves and their children, they had devoted to the treasury of the temple; It is a gift, by whatsoever thou mightest be profited by me, and therefore their parents must expect nothing from them. This, they taught, was a good and valid plea, and many undutiful, unnatural children made use of it, and they justified them in it, and said, He shall be free. But the absurdity and impiety of this tradition were very evident: for revealed religion was intended to improve, not to overthrow, natural religion; one of the fundamental laws of which is this of honouring our parents. This was making the command of God of no effect. To break the law is bad, but to teach men so, as the scribes and Pharisees did, is much worse, ch. v. 19. To what purpose is the command given, if it be not obeyed?

2. The other part of Christ's answer is by way of reprehension; and that which he here charges them with, is hypocrisy; Ye hypocrites, v. 7. It is the prerogative of him who searcheth the heart, and knows what is in man, to pronounce who are hypocrites. The eye of man can perceive open profaneness, but it is only the eye of Christ that can discern hypocrisy, Luke xvi. 15. And as it is a sin which his eye discovers, so it is a sin which of all others his soul hates.

Now Christ fetches his reproof from Isa. xxix. 13. Well did Esaias prophesy of you. Isaiah spoke it of the men of that generation to which he prophesied, yet Christ applies it to these scribes and Pharisees. Threatenings directed against others, belong to us, if we be guilty of the same sins. Isaiah prophesied not of them only, but of all other hypocrites, against whom that word of his is still levelled, and stands in force. The prophecies of scripture are every day in the fulfilling.

(1) The description of hypocrites, in two things. In their own performances of religious worship, v. 8, when they draw nigh to God with their mouth, and honour him with their lips, their heart is far from him.

First, How far a hypocrite goes; he draws nigh to God, and honours him; he is, in profession, a worshipper of God. The Pharisee went up to the temple to pray; he does not stand at that distance which those are at, who live without God in the world. They honour him; that is, they take on them to honour God, they join with those that do so. Some honour God has even from the services of hypocrites.

Secondly, Where he rests and takes up; this is done but with his mouth and with his lips. It is piety but from the teeth outwards; he shows much love, and that is all, there is in his heart no true love. Hypocrites are those that only make a lip-labour of religion and religious worship.

Thirdly, What that is wherein he comes short; it is in the main matter; Their heart is far from me, habitually alienated and estranged (Eph. iv. 18), actually wandering and dwelling upon something else. A hypocrite says one thing, but thinks another. The great thing that God looks at and requires is the heart (Prov. xxiii, 26). In their prescriptions to others This is an instance of their hypocrisy, that they teach for doctrines the commandments of men. When men's inventions are tacked to God's institutions, and imposed accordingly, this is hypocrisy, a mere human religion. God will have his own work done by his own rules, and accepts not that which he did not himself appoint. That only comes to him, that comes from him.

(2) The doom of hypocrites; it is put in a little compass; In vain do they worship me. Their worship does not attain the end for which it was appointed; it will neither please God, nor profit themselves. If it be not in spirit, it is not in truth, and so it is all nothing. Lip-labour is lost labour.

Verses 10–20

I. The solemn introduction to this discourse (v. 10); He called the multitude. Christ had a regard to the multitude. The humble Jesus embraced those whom the proud Pharisees looked upon with disdain. He turns from them as wilful and unteachable, and turns to the multitude, who, though weak, were humble, and willing to be taught. To them he said, Hear and understand. Note, What we hear from the mouth of Christ, we must give all diligence to understand. Not only scholars, but even the multitude, the ordinary people, must apply their minds to understand the words of Christ.

II. The truth itself laid down (v. 11), in two propositions.

1. Not that which goes into the mouth defileth the man. It is not the kind or quality of our food, nor the condition of our hands, that affects the soul with any moral polution or defilement. The kingdom of God is not meat and drink, Rom. xiv. 17. That defiles the man, by which guilt is contracted before God, and the man is rendered offensive to him, and disfitted for communion with him; now what we eat does not this. He was now beginning to teach his followers to call nothing common or unclean; and if Peter, when he was bid to kill and eat, had remembered this word, he would not have said, Not so, Lord, Acts x. 13–15, 28.

2. But that which comes out of the mouth, this defiles a man. We are polluted, not by the meat we eat with unwashen hands, but by the words we speak from an unsanctified heart. It is not the disciples that defile themselves with what they eat, but the Pharisees that defile themselves with what they speak spitefully and censoriously of them. Those who charge guilt upon others for transgressing the commandments of men, many times bring greater guilt upon themselves, by transgressing the law of God against rash judging.

III. The offence that was taken at this truth and the account brought to Christ of that offence (v. 12); "The disciples said unto him, Knowest thou that the Pharisees were offended."

1. It was not strange that the Pharisees should be offended at this plain truth. Sore eyes cannot bear clear light; and nothing is more provoking to proud imposers than the undeceiving of those whom they have first blindfolded and then enslaved, great contenders for the formalities of religion, being commonly as great contemners of the substantials of it.

2. The disciples thought it strange that their Master should say that which he knew would give so much offence; he did not use to do so. But he knew what he said, and to whom he said it, and would teach us, that though in indifferent things we must be tender of giving offence, yet we must not, for fear of that, evade any truth or duty. Truth must be owned, and duty done; and if any be offended, it is his own fault; it is scandal, not given, but taken.

Perhaps the disciples themselves stumbled at the word Christ said and therefore objected this to Christ, that they might themselves be better informed. They seem likewise to have a concern upon them for the Pharisees. They would not have the Pharisees go away displeased at anything Christ had said; and therefore, though they do not desire him to retract it, they hope he will explain, correct, and modify it. Weak hearers are sometimes more solicitous than they should be not to have wicked hearers offended.

IV. The doom passed upon the Pharisees and their corrupt traditions. Two things Christ here foretells concerning them.

1. The rooting out of them and their traditions (v. 13); Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted up. Their sect, and way, and constitution, were plants not of God's planting. The rules of their profession were no institutions of his, but owed their origin to pride and formality. In the visible church, it is no strange thing to find plants that our heavenly Father has not planted. Let the husbandman be ever so careful, his ground will cast forth weeds of itself, more or less, and there is an enemy busy sowing tares. What is corrupt, though of God's permitting, is not of his planting; he sows nothing but good seed in his field. Let us not therefore be deceived, as if all must needs be right that we find in the church, and all those persons and things our Father's plants that we find in our Father's garden. By their fruit you shall know them. Those plants that are not of God's planting, shall not be of his protecting, but shall undoubtedly be rooted up. What is not of God shall not stand, Acts v. 38. But the gospel of truth is great, and will remain. It cannot be rooted up.

2. The ruin of them; and their followers, v. 14.

(1) Christ bids his disciples let them alone. "Have no converse with them or concern for them; neither court their favour, nor dread their displeasure; they will take their course, and let them take the issue of it. They are wedded to their own fancies, and will have everything their own way; let them alone. Seek not to please a generation of men that please not God" (1 Thess. ii. 15). The case of those sinners is sad indeed, whom Christ orders his ministers to let alone.

(2) He gives them two reasons for it. Let them alone; for, those who will not follow them. Though they were blind, if they had owned it, and come to Christ for eye-salve, they might have seen. Are we blind also? They were confident that they themselves were guides of the blind (Rom. ii. 19, 20), were appointed to be so, and fit to be so; that everything they said was an oracle and a law.

[1] They are proud and ignorant; two bad qualities that often meet, and render a man incurable in his folly, Prov. xxvi. 12. They are blind leaders of the blind. They are grossly ignorant in the things of God, and yet so proud, that they think they see better and further than any, and therefore undertake to be leaders of others, to show others the way to heaven, when they themselves know not one step of the way; and, accordingly, they prescribe to all, and proscribe

[2] They are posting to destruction; Both shall fall into the ditch. This must needs be the end of it, if both be so blind, and yet both so bold, venturing forward, and yet not aware of danger. The blind leaders and the blind followers will perish together. Those that by their cunning craftiness draw others to sin and error, shall not, with all their craft and cunning, escape ruin themselves. If both fall together into the ditch, the blind leaders will fall undermost, and have the worst of it. They that have thus mutually increased each other's sin, will mutually exasperate each other's ruin.

V. Instruction given to the disciples concerning the truth Christ had laid down, v. 10. Though Christ rejects the wilfully ignorant who care not to be taught, he can have compassion on the ignorant who are willing to learn, Heb. v. 2.

1. Their desire to be better instructed in this matter (v. 15); in this request as in many others, Peter was their speaker; Declare unto us this parable. What Christ said was plain, yet they call it a parable, and cannot understand it. Weak understandings are apt to turn plain truths into parables, and to seek for a knot in a bulrush. Where a weak head doubts concerning any word of Christ, an upright heart and a willing mind will seek for instruction. The disciples, though offended, sought for satisfaction, imputing the offence, not to the doctrine delivered, but to the shallowness of their own capacity.

2. The reproof Christ gave them for their weakness and ignorance (v. 16); Are ye also yet without understanding? As many as Christ loves and teaches. he thus rebukes. Two things aggravate their dullness and darkness. That they were the disciples of Christ; "Are ye also without understanding? Ye whom I have admitted into so great a degree of familiarity with me, are ye so unskilful in the word of righteousness?" The ignorance and mistakes of those that profess religion, and enjoy the privileges of church-membership, are justly a grief to the Lord Jesus. That they had been a great while Christ's scholars; "Are ye yet so, after ye have been so long under my teaching?" Had they been but of yesterday in Christ's school, it had been another matter. Christ expects from us some proportion of knowledge, and grace, and wisdom, according to the time and means we have had. See John xiv. 9.

3. The explication Christ gave them of this doctrine of pollutions. He here shows us,

(1) What little danger we are in of pollution from that which entereth in at the mouth, v. 17. An inordinate appetite, intemperance, and excess in eating, come out of the heart, and are defiling; but meat in itself is not so, as the Pharisees supposed. What there is of dregs and defilement in our meat, nature (or rather the God of nature) has provided a way to clear us of it; it goes in at the belly, and is cast out into the draught, and nothing remains to us but pure nourishment. By this means nothing defiles; if we eat with unwashen hands, and so anything unclean mix with our food, nature will separate it, and cast it out, and it will be no defilement to us. It may be a piece of cleanliness, but it is no point of conscience, to wash before meat.

(2) What great danger we are in of pollution from that which proceeds out of the mouth (v. 18). There is no defilement in the products of God's bounty; the defilement arises from the products of our corruption. Now here we have,

[1] The corrupt fountain of that which proceeds out of the mouth; it comes from the heart. It is the heart that is so desperately wicked (Jer. xvii. 9); for there is no sin in word or deed, which was not first in the heart. All evil speakings come forth from the heart, and are defiling.

[2] Some of the corrupt streams which flow from this fountain, specified,

First, Evil thoughts, sins against all the commandments. There is a great deal of sin that begins and ends in the heart, and goes no further.

Secondly, Murders, these come from a malice in the heart against our brother's life, or a contempt of it. Hence he that hates his brother, is said to be a murderer; he is so at God's bar, 1 John iii. 15.

Thirdly, Adulteries and fornications, these come from the wanton, unclean, carnal heart; and the lust that reigns there. There is adultery in the heart first, and then in the act, ch. v. 28.

Fourthly, Thefts, cheats, wrongs, rapines, and all injurious contracts. The fountain of all these is in the heart. Achan coveted, and then took, Joshua vii. 20, 21.

Fifthly, False witness. If truth, holiness, and love, which God requires in the inward parts, reigned as they ought, there would be no false witness bearing.

Sixthly, Blasphemies, speaking evil of God, speaking evil of our neighbour. These are the overflowing of the gall within.

Now these are the things which defile a man, v. 20. Sin is defiling to the soul, renders it unlovely and abominable in the eyes of the pure and holy God; unfit for communion with him.

These therefore are the things we must carefully avoid, and all approaches toward them, and not lay stress upon the washing of the hands. He concludes, To eat with unwashen hands this defileth not a man. If he wash, he is not the better before God; if he wash not, he is not the worse.

Verses 21–29

We have here that famous story of Christ's casting the devil out of the woman of Canaan's daughter; it has something in it singular and very surprising, and which looks favourably upon the poor Gentiles, and is an earnest of that mercy which Christ had in store for them. Here is a gleam of that light which was to lighten the Gentiles, Luke ii. 32.

I. Jesus went thence. Justly is the light taken from those that either play by it, or rebel against it. Though Christ endure long, he will not always endure, the contradition of sinners against himself. Wilful prejudices against the gospel, and cavils at it, often provoke Christ to withdraw.

II. When he went thence, he departed into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon; not to those cities, but into that part of the land of Israel which lay that way. While he went about doing good, he was never out of his way. The dark corners of the country, which lay most remote, shall have their share of his benign influences. Here it was, that this miracle was wrought, in the story of which we may observe,

1. The address of the woman of Canaan to Christ, v. 22. She was a Gentile, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel. God will have his remnant out of all nations, chosen vessels in all coasts, even the most unlikely. If Christ had not now made a visit to these coasts, it is probable that she had never come to him. It is often an excitement to a dormant faith and zeal, to have opportunities of acquaintance with Christ brought to our doors.

Her address was very importunate, she cried to Christ, as one in earnest.

(1) She relates her misery; My daughter is grievously vexed with a devil. The vexations of children are the trouble of parents. Tender parents very sensibly feel the miseries of those that are pieces of themselves. "Though vexed with the devil, yet she is my daughter still." The greatest afflictions of our relations do not dissolve our obligations to them, and therefore ought not to alienate our affections from them. It was the distress and trouble of her family, that now brought her to Christ. Because she came in faith, he did not reject her. Though it is need that drives us to Christ, yet we shall not therefore be driven from him.

(2) She requests for mercy; Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David.

Her petition is, Have mercy on me. She does not limit Christ, but mercy, mercy is the thing she begs: she pleads not merit, but depends upon mercy. Mercies to the children are mercies to the parents; favours to ours are favours to us. It is the duty of parents to pray for their children, and to be earnest in prayer for them. Bring them to Christ by faith and prayer, who alone is able to heal them.

2. The discouragement she met with in this address; in all the story of Christ's ministry we do not meet with the like. He was wont to countenance and encourage all that came to him, and either to answer before they called, or to hear while they were yet speaking; but here was one otherwise treated: and what could be the reason of it? Some think that Christ showed himself backward to gratify this poor woman, because he would not give offence to the Jews, by being as free and as forward in his favour to the Gentiles as to them. Or rather, Christ treated her thus, to try her; he knows what is in the heart, knew the strength of her faith, and how well able she was, by his grace, to break through such discouragements; he therefore met her with them, that the trial of her faith might be found unto praise, and honour, and glory, 1 Pet. i. 6, 7. Many of the methods of Christ's providence, and especially of his grace, in dealing with his people, which are dark and perplexing, may be explained with the key of this story. There may be love in Christ's heart while there are frowns in his face.

Observe the particular discouragements given her:

(1) When she cried after him, he answered her not a word, v. 23. His ear was wont to be always open and attentive to the cries of poor supplicants; but to this poor woman he turned a deaf ear, and she could get neither an alms nor an answer. But Christ knew what he did, and therefore did not answer, that she might be the more earnest in prayer. By seeming to draw away the desired mercy from her, he drew her on to be so much the more importunate for it. Every accepted prayer is not immediately an answered prayer. Sometimes God seems not to regard his people's prayers, but it is to prove, and so to improve, their faith.

(2) When the disciples spake a good word for her, he gave a reason why he refused her, which was yet more discouraging.

It was some little relief, that the disciples interposed on her behalf; they said, Send her away, for she crieth after us. The disciples, though wishing she might have what she came for, yet therein consulted rather their own ease than the poor woman's satisfaction; "Send her away with a cure, she cries after us, and is troublesome to us, and shames us." Continued importunity may be uneasy to men, even to good men; but Christ loves to be cried after.

Christ's answer to the disciples quite dashed her expectations; "I am not sent, but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel." Importunity seldom conquers the settled reason of a wise man. He doth not only not answer her, but he argues against her, and stops her mouth with a reason. It is a great trial, when we have occasion given us to question whether we be of those to whom Christ was sent. But, blessed be God, no room is left for that doubt; the distinction between Jew and Gentile is taken away; we are sure that he gave his life a ransom for many, and if for many, why not for me?

When she continued her importunity, he insisted upon the unfitness of the thing, and gave her not only a repulse, but a seeming reproach too (v. 26); It is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to dogs. This seems to cut her off from all hope, and might have driven her to despair, if she had not had a very strong faith indeed. Gospel grace and miraculous cures (the appurtenances of it), were children's bread; and lay not upon the same level with that rain from heaven, and those fruitful seasons, which God gave to the nations whom he suffered to walk in their own ways (Acts xiv. 16, 17); no, these were peculiar favours, appropriated to the peculiar people. The Gentiles were looked upon by the Jews with great contempt, were called and counted dogs. Christ here seems to allow it, and therefore thinks it not meet that the Gentiles should share in the favours bestowed on the Jews.

Now this Christ urgeth against this woman of Canaan; "How can she expect to eat of the children's bread, who is not of the family?" Those whom Christ intends most signally to honour, he first humbles and lays low in a sense of their own meanness and unworthiness. We must first see ourselves to be as dogs, less than the least of all God's mercies, before we are fit to be dignified and privileged with them. Christ delights to exercise great faith with great trials, and sometimes reserves the sharpest for the last, that, being tried, we may come forth like gold.

3. Many a one, thus tried, would either have sunk into silence, or broken out into passion. "Here is cold comfort," might she have said, "for a poor distressed creature; as good for me to have stayed at home. Not only to have a piteous case slighted, but to be called a dog!" "Is this the Son of David?" (might she have said): "Is this he that has such a reputation for kindness, tenderness, and compassion? I am not a dog, I am a woman, and an honest woman, and a woman in misery; and I am sure it is not meet to call me dog." A humble, believing soul, that truly loves Christ, takes everything in good part that he saith and doeth, and puts the best construction upon it.

She breaks through all these discouragements, (1) With an earnestness of desire in prosecuting her petition. This appeared upon the former repulse (v. 25); Then came she, and worshipped him, saying, Lord, help me. She continued to pray. What Christ said, silenced the disciples; you hear no more of them; they took the answer, but the woman did not. The more sensibly we feel the burthen, the more resolutely we should pray for the removal of it. She improved in prayer. Instead of blaming Christ, or charging him with unkindness, she seems rather to suspect herself. She fears lest she had not been humble and reverent enough, and therefore now she came, and worshipped him; or she fears that she had not been earnest enough, and therefore now she cries, Lord, help me. When the answers of prayer are deferred, God is thereby teaching us to pray more, and pray better. Disappointments in the success of prayer, must be excitements to the duty of prayer. Christ, in his agony, prayed more earnestly. She waives the question, whether she was of those to whom Christ was sent or no; but, "Whether an Israelite or no, I come to the Son of David for mercy, and I will not let him go, except he bless me." Many weak Christians perplex themselves with questions and doubts about their election; such had better mind their errand to God, and continue instant in prayer for mercy and grace; throw themselves by faith at the feet of Christ, and say, If I perish, I will perish here. If we cannot reason down our unbelief, let us pray it down. Her prayer is very short, but comprehensive and fervent, Lord, help me. Take this, First, As lamenting her case. It is not in vain for broken hearts to bemoan themselves; God looks upon them then. Or, Secondly, As begging grace to assist her in this hour of temptation. She found it hard to keep up her faith when it was thus frowned upon, and therefore prays, "Lord, help me." Or, Thirdly, As enforcing her original request, "Lord, help me; Lord, give me what I come for." She believed that Christ could and would help her. Still she keeps up good thoughts of Christ, and will not quit her hold. Lord, help me, is a good prayer, if well put up; and it is pity that it should be turned into a byword, and that we should take God's name in vain in it. (2) With a holy skilfulness of faith, suggesting a very surprising plea. Christ had placed the Jews with the children, as olive plants round about God's table, and had put the Gentiles with the dogs, under the table. There is nothing got by contradicting any word of Christ, though it bear ever so hard upon us. But this poor woman, since she cannot object against it, resolves to make the best of it (v. 27); Truth, Lord; yet the dogs eat of the crumbs. Her acknowledgment was very humble: Truth, Lord. You cannot speak so meanly and slightly of a humble believer, but he is ready to speak as meanly and slightly of himself. "Truth, Lord; I cannot deny it; I am a dog, and have no right to the children's bread." Her improvement of this into a plea was very ingenious; Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs. It was by a singular acumen, and spiritual quickness and sagacity, that she discerned matter of argument in that which looked like a slight. A lively, active faith will make that to be for us, which seems to be against us. Faith can find encouragement even in that which is discouraging, and get nearer to God by taking hold on that hand which is stretched out to push it away.

Her plea is, Yet the dogs eat of the crumbs. It is true, the full and regular provision is intended for the children only, but the small, casual, neglected crumbs are allowed to the dogs, and are not grudged them. Surely then some of the broken meat may fall to a poor Gentile; "I beg a cure by the by, which is but as a crumb, though of the same precious bread, yet but a small inconsiderable piece, compared with the loaves which they have." When we are ready to surfeit on the children's bread, we should remember how many there are, that would be glad of the crumbs. Our broken meat in spiritual privileges, would be a feast to many a soul.

Her humility and necessity made her glad of crumbs. Those who are conscious to themselves that they deserve nothing, will be thankful for anything. The least of Christ is precious to a believer, and the very crumbs of the bread of life.

Her faith encouraged her to expect these crumbs. Why should it not be at Christ's table, as at a great man's, where the dogs are fed as sure as the children? She calls it their master's table; if she were a dog, she was his dog. It is good lying in God's house, though we lie at the threshold there.

4. The happy issue and success of all this. She came off with credit and comfort from this struggle; and, though a Canaanite, approved herself a true daughter of Israel, who, like a prince, had power with God, and prevailed. Then Jesus said, O woman, great is thy faith. Now he begins to speak like himself, and to put on his own countenance. He commended her faith. O woman, great is thy faith. It is her faith that he commends. There were several other graces which shone bright in her conduct of this affair—wisdom, humility, meekness, patience, perseverance in prayer; but these were the product of her faith. Because of all graces faith honours Christ most, therefore of all graces Christ honours faith most. It is the greatness of her faith. Though the faith of all the saints is alike precious, yet it is not in all alike strong; all believers are not of the same size and stature.

The greatness of faith consists much in a resolute adherence to Jesus Christ, to love him, and trust him, as a Friend, even when he seems to come forth against us as an Enemy. Though weak faith, if true, shall not be rejected, yet great faith shall be commended. He cured her daughter; "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt: I can deny thee nothing, take what thou camest for." Great believers may have what they will for the asking. When our will conforms to the will of Christ's precept, his will concurs with the will of our desire. Those that will deny Christ nothing shall find that he will deny them nothing at last, though for a time he seems to hide his face from them.

The event was answerable to the word of Christ; Her daughter was made whole from that very hour; the mother's faith prevailed for the daughter's cure. He spake, and it was done.

Verses 29–39

I. A general account of Christ's cures, his curing by wholesale. The tokens of Christ's power and goodness are neither scarce nor scanty; for there is in him an overflowing fulness.

1. The place where these cures were wrought; it was near the sea of Galilee. We read not of anything he did in the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, but the casting of the devil out of the woman of Canaan's daughter, as if he took that journey on purpose, with that in prospect. Let not ministers grudge their pains to do good, though but to few. He that knows the worth of souls, would go a great way to help to save one from death and Satan's power.

But Jesus departed thence. Having let fall that crumb under the table, he here returns to make a full feast for the children. We may do that occasionally for one, which we may not make a constant practice of. Christ steps into the coast of Tyre and Sidon, but he sits down by the sea of Galilee (v. 29). He sat down on a mountain, that all might see him, and have free access to him; for he is an open Saviour. He sat down there as one waiting to be gracious. He settled himself to this good work.

2. The multitudes and maladies that were healed by him (v. 30); Great multitudes came to him. We are soon sensible of bodily pain and sickness, but few are concerned about their souls and their spiritual diseases. Such was the goodness of Christ, that he admitted all sorts of people; the poor as well as the rich are welcome to Christ. He never looked with contempt upon the vulgar, the herd, as they are called; for the souls of peasants are as precious with him as the souls of princes. Such was the power of Christ, that he healed all sorts of diseases; those that came to him, brought their sick relations and friends along with them, and cast them down at Jesus' feet, v. 30. We read not of anything they said to him, but they laid them down before him as objects of pity. Their calamities spake more for them than the tongue of the most eloquent orator could. Whatever our case is, the only way to find ease and relief is, to lay it at Christ's feet, and then submit it to him, and refer it to his disposal.

Here were lame, blind, dumb, maimed, and many others, brought to Christ. See what work sin has made! What various diseases are human bodies subject to! See what work the Saviour makes! He conquers those hosts of enemies to mankind. He sent his word, and healed them. This is an instance of Christ's power, which may comfort us in all our weaknesses; and of his pity, which may comfort us in all our miseries.

3. The influence that this had upon the people, v. 31.

(1) They wondered, and well they might. Christ's works should be our wonder.

(2) They glorified the God of Israel. Miracles, which are the matter of our wonder, must be the matter of our praise; and mercies, which are the matter of our rejoicing, must be the matter of our thanksgiving. If he heal our diseases, all that is within us must bless his holy name; and if we have been graciously preserved from blindness, and lameness, and dumbness, we have as much reason to bless God as if we had been cured. The standers-by glorified God. God must be acknowledged with praise and thankfulness in the mercies of others as in our own.

II. Here is a particular account of his feeding four thousand men with seven loaves, and a few little fishes, as he had lately fed five thousand with five loaves. The guests indeed were now not quite so many as then, and the provision a little more; he wrought his miracles as the occasion required. Both then and now he took as many as were to be fed, and made use of all that was at hand to feed them with. When once the utmost powers of nature are exceeded, we must say, This is the finger of God; and it is neither here nor there how far they are outdone.

1. Christ's pity (v. 32); I have compassion on the multitude. He tells his disciples this, both to try and to excite their compassion. In what he said to them, Observe,

(1) The case of the multitude; They continue with me now three days, and have nothing to eat. This is an instance of their zeal, and the strength of their affection to Christ and his word, that they not only left their callings, to attend upon him on weekdays, but underwent a deal of hardship, to continue with him; they wanted necessary food and had scarcely enough to keep life and soul together. They esteemed the words of Christ more than their necessary food. With what tenderness Christ spoke of it; I have compassion on them. It had become them to have compassion on him, who took so much pains with them for three days together, and yet for aught that appears he was fasting too. Our Lord Jesus keeps an account how long his followers continue their attendance on him, and takes notice of the difficulty they sustain in it.

Now the exigence the people were reduced to serves to magnify. The mercy of their supply: he fed them when they were hungry; and then food was doubly welcome. The miracle of their supply. If two hungry meals make the third a glutton, what would three hungry days do? And yet they did all eat and were filled. There are mercy and grace enough with Christ, to give the most earnest and enlarged desire an abundant satisfaction; Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it.

(2) The care of our master concerning them; I will not send them away fasting, lest they should faint by the way. It is the unhappiness of our present state, that when our souls are in some measure elevated and enlarged, our bodies cannot keep pace with them in good duties. The weakness of the flesh is a great grievance to the willingness of the spirit.

2. Christ's power. His pity of their wants sets his power on work for their supply.

(1) How his power was distrusted by his disciples (v. 33); whence should we have so much bread in the wilderness? They had been not only the witnesses, but the ministers, of the former miracle; the multiplied bread went through their hands; so that it was an instance of great weakness for them to ask, Whence shall we have bread? Could they be at a loss, while they had their Master with them? Forgetting former experiences leaves us under present doubts.

Christ knew how slender the provision was, but he would know it from them (v. 34); How many loaves have ye? Before he would work, he would have it seen how little he had to work on, that his power might shine the brighter. What they had, they had for themselves, and it was little enough, but Christ would have them bestow it all upon the multitude. It becomes Christ's disciples to be generous, their Master was so: what we have, we should be free of. Niggardliness to-day, out of thoughtfulness for tomorrow, is a complication of corrupt affection that ought to be mortified. The disciples asked, Whence should we have bread? Christ asked, How many loaves have ye? We must not think so much of our wants as of our havings.

(2) How his power was discovered to the multitude.

[1] The provision that was at hand; seven loaves, and a few little fishes. It is probable that the fish was such as they had themselves taken. It is comfortable to eat the labour of our hands (Ps. cxxviii. 2). And what we have got by God's blessing on our labour we should be free of; for therefore we must labour, that we may have to give, Eph. iv. 28.

[2] The putting of the people in a posture to receive it (v. 35); He commanded the multitude to sit down on the ground. They saw but very little provision, yet they must sit down, in faith that they should have a meal's meat out of it.

[3] The distributing of the provision among them. He first gave thanks. The word used in the former miracle was he blessed. It comes all to one; giving thanks to God is a proper way of craving a blessing from God. He then broke the loaves and gave to his disciples, and they to the multitude, Though the disciples had distrusted Christ's power, yet he made use of them now as before; he is not provoked, as he might be, by the weakness and infirmities of his ministers, to lay them aside; but still he gives to them, and they to his people, of the word of life.

[4] The plenty there was among them (v. 37). They did all eat, and were filled. Those whom Christ feeds, he fills. While we labour for the world, we labour for that which satisfieth not (Isa. lv. 2); but those that duly wait on Christ shall be abundantly satisfied with the goodness of his house.

To show that they had all enough, there was a great deal left—seven baskets full of broken meat; but enough to show that with Christ there is bread enough, and to spare; supplies of grace for more than seek it, and for those that seek more.

[5] The account taken of the guests; not that they might pay their share, but that they might be witnesses to the power and goodness of Christ.

[6] The dismission of the multitude, and Christ's departure to another place (v. 39). He sent away the people. Though he had fed them twice, they must not expect miracles to be their daily bread. Let them now go home to their callings, and to their own tables.

CHAP. XVI

I. A conference with the Pharisees, ver. 1–4. II. Another with his disciples about the leaven of the Pharisees, ver. 5–12. III. Another with them concerning himself, ver. 13–20. IV. Another concerning his sufferings for them, and theirs for him, ver. 21–28.

Verses 1–4

We have here Christ's discourse with the Pharisees and Sadducees, men at variance among themselves, and yet unanimous in their opposition to Christ. Christ and Christianity meet with opposition on all hands.

I. Their demand, and the design of it.

1. The demand was of a sign from heaven; this they desired him to show them; pretending they were very willing to be satisfied and convinced. That which they pretended to desire was,

(1) Some other sign than what they had yet had. They had great plenty of signs; every miracle Christ wrought was a sign. But this will not serve; they despised those signs which relieved the necessity of the sick and sorrowful, and insisted upon some sign which would gratify the curiosity of the proud. The evidence that is given is sufficient to satisfy an unprejudiced understanding, but was not intended to please a vain humour. And it is an instance of the deceitfulness of the heart, to think that we should be wrought upon by the means and advantages which we have not, while we slight those which we have.

(2) It must be a sign from heaven. They would have such miracles to prove his commission, as were wrought at the giving of the law upon mount Sinai: thunder, and lightning, and the voice of words were the sign from heaven they required.

2. The design was to tempt him; not to be taught by him, but to ensnare him. If he should show them a sign from heaven, they would attribute it to a confederacy with the prince of the power of the air. When they had signs from heaven, they tempted Christ, saying, Can he furnish a table in the wilderness? Now that he had furnished a table in the wilderness, they tempted him, saying, Can he give us a sign from heaven?

II. Christ's reply to this demand.

1. He condemns their overlooking of the signs they had, v. 2, 3. They were seeking for the signs of the kingdom of God, when it was already among them.

To expose this, he observes to them,

(1) Their skilfulness and sagacity in other things, particularly in natural prognostications of the weather. There are common rules drawn from observation and experience, by which it is easy to foretell very probably what weather it will be. We know not the balancing of the clouds (Job xxxvii. 16), but we may spell something from the faces of them.

(2) Their sottishness and stupidity in the concerns of their souls; Can ye not discern the signs of the times? "Do you not see that the Messiah is come?" The miracles Christ wrought, and the gathering of the people to him, were plain indications that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, that this was the day of their visitation. It is great hypocrisy, when we slight the signs of God's ordaining, to seek for signs of our own prescribing. "Do not you foresee your own ruin coming for rejecting him?" It is the undoing of multitudes, that they are not aware what will be the end of their refusing Christ.

2. He refuses to give them any other sign (v. 4). He calls them an adulterous generation; because, while they professed themselves of the true church and spouse of God, they treacherously departed from him, and brake their covenants with him. He refuses to gratify their desire. Christ will not be prescribed to; we ask, and have not, because we ask amiss. He refers them to the sign of the prophet Jonas, which should yet be given them; his resurrection from the dead, and his preaching by his apostles to the Gentiles. Though the fancies of proud men shall not be humoured, yet the faith of the humble shall be supported.

This discourse broke off abruptly; he left them and departed. Christ will not tarry long with those that tempt him, but justly withdraws from those that are disposed to quarrel with him.

Verses 5–12

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples concerning bread, in which, as in many other discourses, he speaks to them of spiritual things under a similitude, and they misunderstand him of carnal things. The occasion of it was, their forgetting to victual their ship; usually they carried bread along with them. But now they forgot; we will hope it was because their minds and memories were filled with better things. Christ's disciples are often such as have no great forecast for the world.

I. Here is the caution Christ gave them, to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees. Disciples are in most danger from hypocrites; against those that are openly vicious they stand upon their guard, and therefore the caution is doubled, Take heed, and beware.

The corrupt principles and practices of the Pharisees and Sadducees are compared to leaven; they fermented wherever they came.

II. Their mistake concerning this caution, v. 7. They thought Christ hereby upbraided them with their improvidence and forgetfulness. Or, they took it for a caution, not to be familiar with the Pharisees and Sadducees, not to eat with them, whereas the danger was not in their bread (Christ himself did eat with them, Luke vii. 36; xi. 37; xiv. 1), but in their principles.

III. The reproof Christ gave them for this.

1. He reproves their distrust of his ability and readiness to supply them in this strait (v. 8); "O ye of little faith, why are ye in such perplexity because ye have taken no bread, that ye can mind nothing else?" He does not chide them for their little forecast, as they expected he would. Parents and masters must not be angry at the forgetfulness of their children and servants, more than is necessary to make them take more heed another time; we are all apt to be forgetful of our duty. See how easily Christ forgave his disciples' carelessness; and do likewise. But that which he chides them for is their little faith.

(1) He would have them to depend upon him for supply. Though Christ's disciples be brought into wants and straits, through their own carelessness and incognitancy, yet he encourages them to trust in him for relief. We must not therefore use this as an excuse for our want of charity to those who are really poor, that they should have minded their own affairs better, and then they would not have been in need. It may be so, but they must not therefore be left to starve when they are in need.

(2) He is displeased at their solicitude in this matter. The weakness and shiftlessness of good people in their worldly affairs is that for which men are apt to condemn them; but it is not such an offence to Christ as their inordinate care and anxiety about those things. We must endeavour to keep the mean between the extremes of carelessness and carefulness; but of the two, the excess of thoughtfulness about the world worst becomes Christ's disciples.

(3) The aggravation of their distrust was the experience they had so lately had of the power and goodness of Christ in providing for them, v. 9, 10. They had him with them who could provide bread for them. If they had not the cistern, they had the Fountain. Do ye not yet understand, neither remember? Christ's disciples are often to be blamed for the shallowness of their understandings, and the slipperiness of their memories. "Remember how many baskets ye took up." These baskets were intended for memorials, by which to keep the mercy in remembrance. He that could furnish them with such an overplus then, surely could furnish them with what was necessary now. We are therefore perplexed with present cares and distrusts, because we do not duly remember our former experiences of divine power and goodness.

2. He reproves their misunderstanding of the caution he gave them (v. 11); How is it that you do not understand? Christ's disciples may well be ashamed of the slowness and dullness of their apprehensions in divine things. I spake it not unto you concerning bread. He took it ill, (1) That they should think him as thoughtful about bread as they were; whereas his meat and drink were to do his Father's will. (2) That they should be so little acquainted with his way of preaching, as to take that literally which he spoke by way of parable.

IV. The rectifying of the mistake by this reproof (v. 12); Then understood they what he meant. He did not tell them expressly what he meant, but repeated what he had said; and so obliged them to arrive at the sense of it in their own thoughts. Thus Christ teaches by the Spirit of wisdom in the heart, opening the understanding to the Spirit of revelation in the word. And those truths are most precious, which we have thus digged for.

Verses 13–20

We have here a private conference which Christ had with his disciples concerning himself. It was in the coasts of Cæsarea Philippi, there in that remote corner, perhaps, there was less flocking after him than in other places, which gave him leisure for this private conversation with his disciples.

I. He enquires what the opinions of others were concerning him; Who do men say that I, the Son of man, am?

1. He calls himself the Son of man; which may be taken either, (1) As a title common to him with others. He was called, and justly, the Son of God, for so he was (Luke i. 35); but he called himself the Son of man; for he is really and truly "Man, made of a woman." Or, (2) As a title peculiar to him as Mediator.

2. He enquires what people's sentiments were concerning him: "Who do men say that I am? The Son of man?" (So I think it might better be read.) "Do they own me for the Messiah?" He asks not, "Who do the scribes and Pharisees say that I am?" But, "Who do men say that I am?" He referred to the common people, whom the Pharisees despised. The common people conversed more familiarly with the disciples than they did with their Master, and therefore from them he might better know what they said. Christ had not plainly said who he was, but left people to infer it from his works, John x. 24, 25. Now he would know what inferences the people drew from them.

3. To this question the disciples gave him an answer (v. 14), Some say, thou art John the Baptist, &c. They are different opinions; some say one thing, and others another. Truth is one; but those who vary from that commonly vary one from another. Being so noted a Person, everyone would be ready to pass his verdict upon him, and, "Many men, many minds." They are honourable opinions. It is possible for men to have good thoughts of Christ, and yet not right ones, a high opinion of him, and yet not high enough. They all suppose him to be one risen from the dead; which perhaps arose from a confused notion they had of the resurrection of the Messiah. They are all false opinions, built upon mistakes.

(1) Some say, thou art John the Baptist. Herod said so (ch. xiv. 2), and those about him would be apt to say as he said.

(2) Some Elias; taking occasion, no doubt, from the prophecy of Malachi (ch. iv. 5), Behold, I will send you Elijah.

(3) Others Jeremias.

(4) Or, one of the prophets. This shows what an honourable idea they entertained of the prophets. Rather than they would allow Jesus of Nazareth, one of their own country, to be such an extraordinary Person as his works bespoke him to be, they would say, "It was not he, but one of the old prophets."

II. He enquires what their thoughts were concerning him; "But who say ye that I am?" v. 15. The disciples had themselves been better taught than others; had, by their intimacy with Christ, greater advantages of getting knowledge than others had. Those who have more acquaintance with Christ than others, should have truer sentiments concerning him, and be able to give a better account of him than others. The disciples were trained up to teach others, and therefore it was highly requisite that they should understand the truth themselves. This is a question we should every one of us be frequently putting to ourselves, "Who do we say, what kind of one do we say, that the Lord Jesus is?" It is well or ill with us, according as our thoughts are right or wrong concerning Jesus Christ.

Well, this is the question. Peter's answer to this question, v. 16. Peter answers in the name of all the rest, they all consenting to it, and concurring in it. Peter's temper led him to be forward in speaking upon all such occasions, and sometimes he spoke well, sometimes amiss; in all companies there are found some warm, bold men, to whom a precedency of speech falls of course; Peter was such a one.

Peter's answer is short, but it is full, and true, and to the purpose; Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. This is the conclusion of the whole matter. The people called him a Prophet, that Prophet (John vi. 14); but the disciples own him to be the Christ, the anointed One. It was a great thing to believe this concerning one whose outward appearance was so contrary to the general idea the Jews had of the Messiah. He called himself the Son of Man; but they owned him to be the Son of the living God. They know and believe him to be the Son of the living God, and to be the Life of the world. Let us then go to Christ; Lord Jesus, thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. Note: Christ's approbation of his answer (v. 17–19).

1. As a believer, v. 17. Christ shows himself well pleased with Peter's confession, that it was so clear and express. Christ shows him whence he received the knowledge of this truth. At the first discovery of this truth in the dawning of the gospel day, it was a mighty thing to believe it.

Peter had the happiness of it; Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-jona. He reminds him of his rise and original; he was Bar-jonas—The son of a dove. Let him remember the rock out of which he was hewn, that he may see he was not born to this dignity, but preferred to it by the divine favour; it was free grace that made him to differ. Having reminded him of this, he makes him sensible of his great happiness as a believer; Blessed art thou. True believers are truly blessed, and those are blessed indeed whom Christ pronounces blessed. All happiness attends the right knowledge of Christ.

God must have the glory of it; "For flesh and blood have not revealed it to thee. This light sprang neither from nature nor from education, but from my Father who is in heaven." Saving faith is the gift of God, and, wherever it is, is wrought by him. Therefore thou art blessed, because my Father has revealed it to thee. Blessed are they that are thus highly favoured.

2. Christ replies to him as an apostle or minister, v. 18, 19. There is nothing lost by being forward to confess Christ; for those who thus honour him, he will honour.

Upon occasion of this great confession made of Christ, which is the church's homage and allegiance, he signed and published this royal, this divine charter, by which that body politic is incorporated.

Now the purport of this charter is,

First, To establish the being of the church; I say also unto thee. It is Christ that makes the grant, he who is the church's Head. The grant is put into Peter's hand; "I say it to thee." The New Testament charter is here delivered to Peter as an agent, but to the use and behoof of the church in all ages, according to the purposes therein specified and contained. Now it is here promised, that Christ would build his church upon a rock. This body politic is incorporated by the style and title of Christ's church. It is a number of the children of men called out of the world, and set apart from it, and dedicated to Christ. The Builder and Maker of the church is Christ himself; I will build it. Ye are God's building; and building is a progressive work; the church in this world is like a house in the building. It is a comfort that Christ, who has divine wisdom and power, undertakes to build it. The foundation on which it is built is, this Rock. Let the architect do his part ever so well, if the foundation be rotten, the building will not stand; let us therefore see what the foundation is. The church is built upon a rock; a firm, strong, and lasting foundation, which time will not waste, nor will it sink under the weight of the building. Christ would not build his house upon the sand, for he knew that storms would arise. It is built upon this rock; thou art Peter, which signifies a stone or rock; Christ gave him that name when he first called him (John i. 42), and here he confirms it. From the mention of this significant name, occasion is taken for this metaphor of building upon a rock.

Some by this rock understand Peter himself as an apostle. The church is built upon the foundation of the apostles, Eph. ii. 20. The first stones of that building were laid in and by their ministry. Now Peter being that apostle by whose hand the first stones of the church were laid, both in Jewish converts (Acts ii), and in the Gentile converts (Acts x), he might in some sense be said to be the rock on which it was built.

Others, by this rock, understand Christ; "Thou art Peter, thou hast the name of a stone, but upon this rock, pointing to himself, I will build my church." He took occasion from Peter, to speak of himself as the Rock. Christ is both its Founder and its Foundation; he draws souls, and draws them to himself; to him they are united, and on him they rest and have a constant dependence.

Others, by this rock understand this confession which Peter made of Christ, and this comes all to one with understanding it of Christ himself. "Now," saith Christ, "this is that great truth upon which I will build my church." Take away this truth itself, and the universal church falls to the ground. If Christ be not the Son of God, Christianity is a cheat. Take away the faith and confession of this truth from any particular church, and it ceases to be a part of Christ's church. This is articulus stantis et cadentis ecclesiae—that article, with the admission or the denial of which the church either rises or falls; "the main hinge on which the door of salvation turns"; those who let go this, do not hold the foundation.

Christ here promises to preserve and secure his church, when it is built; The gates of hell shall not prevail against it. This implies that the church has enemies that fight against it, and endeavour its ruin and overthrow, here represented by the gates of hell, that is, the city of hell; (which is directly opposite to this heavenly city, this city of the living God), the devil's interest among the children of men. This assures us that the enemies of the church shall not gain their point. While the world stands, Christ will have a church in it. Somewhere or other the Christian religion shall have a being, though not always in the same degree of purity and splendour, yet so as that the entail of it shall never be quite cut off. The church may be foiled in particular encounters, but in the main battle it shall come off more than a conqueror.

The other part of this charter is, to settle the Second, Government of the church, v. 19. A city without government is a chaos. Now this constituting of the government of the church, is here expressed by the delivering of the keys, and, with them, a power to bind and loose. This invests all the apostles and their successors with a ministerial power to guide and govern the church of Christ, as it exists in particular congregations or churches, according to the rules of the gospel. The keys were first put into Peter's hand, because he was the first that opened the door of faith to the Gentiles, Acts. x. 28. Christ, having incorporated his church, hath appointed the office of the ministry for the keeping up of order and government, and to see that his laws be duly served. He doth not say, The keys shall be given, but, I will give them; for ministers derive their authority from Christ, and all their power is to be used in his name. The power here delegated is a spiritual power; it is a power pertaining to the kingdom of heaven, that is, to the church, to the gospel dispensation. It is the power of the keys that is given, alluding to the custom of investing men with authority in such a place, by delivering to them the keys of the place. Or as the master of the house gives the keys to the steward, the keys of the stores where the provisions are kept. It is a power to bind and loose, that is (following the metaphor of the keys), to shut and open. It is a power which Christ has promised to own the due administration of; It shall be bound in heaven, and loosed in heaven. The word of the gospel, in the mouth of faithful ministers, is to be looked upon, not as the word of man, but as the word of God, and to be received accordingly.

Now the keys of the kingdom of heaven are,

(1) The key of doctrine, called the key of knowledge. Now the apostles had an extraordinary power of this kind; some things forbidden by the law of Moses were now to be allowed; some things allowed there were now to be forbidden; and the apostles were empowered to declare this to the world. When Peter was first taught himself, and then taught others, to call nothing common or unclean, this power was exercised. There is also an ordinary power hereby conveyed to all ministers, to tell people, in God's name, and according to the scriptures, what is good, and what the Lord requires of them. Christ gives his apostles power to shut or open the book of the gospel to people, as the case required. When ministers preach pardon and peace to the penitent, wrath and the curse to the impenitent, in Christ's name, they act then pursuant to this authority of binding and loosing.

(2) The key of discipline, which is but the application of the former to particular persons, upon a right estimate of their characters and actions. The judge doth not make the law, but only declares what is law, and gives sentence accordingly. Christ's ministers have a power to admit into the church; "Go, disciple all nations, baptising them; those who profess faith in Christ, and obedience to him, admit them by baptism." Ministers are to let in to the wedding-feast those that are bidden; and to keep out such as are apparently unfit for so holy a communion. They have a power to expel and cast out such as have forfeited their church-membership. They have a power to restore and to receive in again, upon their repentance, such as had been thrown out; to loose those whom they had bound. The apostles had a miraculous gift of discerning spirits; yet even they went by the rule of outward appearances, which ministers may still make a judgment upon, if they be skilful and faithful.

Here is the charge which Christ gave his disciples, to keep this private for the present (v. 20); They must tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ. What they had professed to him, they must not yet publish to the world, for several reasons: Because this was the time of preparation for his kingdom: the great thing now preached, was, that the kingdom of heaven was at hand. Everything is beautiful in its season, and it is good advice, Prepare thy work, and afterwards build, Prov. xxiv. 27. Christ would have his Messiahship proved by his works. He was so secure of the demonstration of his miracles that he waived other witnesses. Christ would not have the apostles preach this, till they had the most convincing evidence ready to allege in confirmation of it. Great truths may suffer damage by being asserted before they can be sufficiently proved. Now the great proof of Jesus being the Christ was his resurrection. It was requisite that the preachers of so great a truth should be furnished with greater measures of the Spirit than the apostles as yet had. When Christ was glorified and the Spirit poured out, we find Peter proclaiming upon the house-tops what was here spoken in a corner. As there is a time to keep silence, so there is a time to speak.

I. Christ's foretelling of his sufferings. Some hints he had already given of his sufferings, but now he began to show it, to speak plainly and expressly of it. Hitherto he had not touched upon this, because the disciples were weak, but now that they were more ripe in knowledge, and strong in faith, he began to tell them this. Christ reveals his mind to his people gradually, and lets in light as they can bear it, and are fit to receive it.

From that time, when they had made that full confession of Christ, when he found them knowing in one truth, he taught them another. If they had not been well grounded in the belief of Christ's being the Son of God, it would have been a great shaking to their faith. All truths are not to be spoken to all persons at all times, but such as are proper and suitable to their present state. Now observe,

1. What he foretold concerning his sufferings, the particulars and circumstances of them, and all surprising. The place where he should suffer. He must go to Jerusalem, the head city, the holy city, and suffer there. There all the sacrifices were offered, there therefore he must die, who is the great sacrifice. The persons by whom he should suffer; the elders, and chief priests, and scribes. Those that should have been most forward in owning and admiring Christ, were the most bitter in persecuting him. What he should suffer; he must suffer many things, and be killed. His enemies' insatiable malice, and his own invincible patience, appear in the variety and multiplicity of his sufferings (he suffered many things) and in the extremity of them; nothing less than his death would satisfy them, he must be killed. What should be the happy issue of all his sufferings; he shall be raised again the third day. His rising again the third day proved him to be the Son of God, notwithstanding his sufferings; and therefore he mentions that, to keep up their faith. Thus we must look upon Christ's suffering for us, trace in it the way to his glory; and thus we must look upon our suffering for Christ, look through it to the recompence of reward. If we suffer with him, we shall reign with him.

2. Why he foretold his sufferings. His sufferings were no surprise to him, did not come upon him as a snare, but he had a distinct and certain foresight of them, which greatly magnifies his love. To rectify the mistakes which his disciples had imbibed concerning the external pomp and power of his kingdom, here Christ reads them another lesson, tells them of the cross and sufferings. Those that follow Christ must be dealt plainly with, and warned not to expect great things in this world. It was to prepare them for the share, at least, of sorrow and fear, which they must have in his sufferings. When he suffered many things, the disciples could not but suffer some; let them know it before, and, being fore-warned, may be fore-armed.

II. The offence which Peter took at this: he said, Be it far from thee, Lord. He took him, and began to rebuke him.

1. It did not become Peter to contradict his Master, or take upon him to advise him. When God's dispensations are either intricate or cross to us, it becomes us silently to acquiesce in, and not to prescribe to, the divine will; God knows what he has to do, without our teaching

2. It savoured much of fleshly wisdom. It is the corrupt part of us, that is thus solicitous to sleep in a whole skin. We are apt to look upon sufferings as they relate to this present life, to which they are uneasy; but there are other rules to measure them by. He would have Christ to dread suffering as much as he did; but we mistake, if we measure Christ's love and patience by our own.

III. Christ's displeasure against Peter for this suggestion of his, v. 23. We do not read of anything said or done by any of his disciples, at any time, that he resented so much as this. How he expressed his displeasure: Get thee behind me, Satan. Just now, he had said, Blessed art thou, Simon; but here, Get thee behind me, Satan; and there was cause for both. A good man may by a surprise of temptation soon grow very unlike himself. It is the subtlety of Satan, to send temptations to us by the unsuspected hands of our best and dearest friends. Even the kindnesses of our friends are often abused by Satan, and made use of as temptations to us. We should learn to know the devil's voice when he speaks in a saint as well as when he speaks in a serpent. We must be free and faithful in reproving the dearest friend we have. We must not compliment, but rebuke, mistaken courtesies. Why did Christ thus resent a motion that seemed not only harmless, but kind? Two reasons are given:

1. Thou art my hindrance (so it may be read); "thou standest in my way." Christ was hastening on in the work of our salvation, and his heart was so much upon it, that he took it ill to be hindered. Peter was not so sharply reproved for disowning and denying his Master in his sufferings as he was for dissuading him from them. Our Lord Jesus preferred our salvation before his own ease and safety; he came into the world, not to spare himself, as Peter advised, but to spend himself. Thou art an offence to me. Those that engage in any great and good work must expect to meet with hindrance and opposition from friends and foes, from within and from without. Those that hinder us from doing or suffering for God, when we are called to it, whatever they are in other things in that they are Satans, adversaries to us.

2. Thou savourest not the things that are of God, but those that are of men. The things that are of God often clash and interfere with the things that are of men, that is, with our own wealth, pleasure, and reputation.

Verses 24–28

Christ, having shown his disciples that he must suffer, here shows them that they must suffer too.

I. Here is the law of discipleship laid down, and the terms fixed, upon which we may have the honour and benefit of it, v. 24.

1. What it is to be a disciple of Christ; it is to come after him. A true disciple of Christ is one that doth follow him in duty, and shall follow him to glory. He is one that comes after Christ, not one that prescribes to him, as Peter now undertook to do. A disciple of Christ comes after him, as the sheep after the shepherd, one that walks in the same way that he walked in, treads in his steps, and follows the Lamb, whithersoever he goes.

2. What are the great things required of those that will be Christ's disciples; If any man will come.

It denotes a deliberate choice, and cheerfulness and resolution in that choice. Christ will have his people volunteers.

Let him deny himself. Peter had advised Christ to spare himself, but Christ tells them all, they must be so far from sparing themselves, that they must deny themselves. If self-denial be a hard lesson, and against the grain to flesh and blood. it is no more than what our Master learned and practised before us and for us. All the disciples and followers of Jesus Christ must deny themselves. It is the fundamental law of admission into Christ's school; it is both the strait gate, and the narrow way. We must deny ourselves absolutely, we must not admire our own shadow, nor gratify our own humour; nor seek our own things, nor be our own end. We must deny ourselves comparatively; we must deny ourselves for Christ; we must deny ourselves for our brethren, and for their good; and we must deny ourselves for ourselves, deny the appetites of the body for the benefit of the soul.

Let him take up his cross. The cross is here put for all sufferings, as men or Christians; providential afflictions, persecutions for righteousness' sake, every trouble that befalls us, either for doing well or for not doing ill. It should reconcile us to troubles, and take off the terror of them, that they are what we bear in common with Christ, and such as he hath borne before us. Every disciple of Christ hath his cross, and must count upon it, and everyone feels most from his own burthen. Crosses are the common lot of God's children, but of this common lot each hath his particular share. It is good for us to call the cross we are under our own, and entertain it accordingly. We are apt to think we could bear such a one's cross better than our own; but that is best which is, and we ought to make the best of it. Every disciple of Christ must take up that which the wise God hath made his cross. We must not make crosses to ourselves, but must accommodate ourselves to those which God has made for us. Our rule is, not to go a step out of the way of duty, either to meet a cross, or to miss one. We must not by our rashness and indiscretion pull crosses down upon our own heads, but must take them up when they are laid in our way. We must take it up out of our way, and we must then go on with it in our way, though it lie heavy. That which we have to do, is, not only to bear the cross, but we must take up the cross, must improve it to some good advantage. We should not say, "This is an evil, and I must bear it, because I cannot help it"; but, "This is an evil, and I will bear it, because it shall work for my good." When we rejoice in our afflictions, and glory in them, then we take up the cross.

Let him follow me, in this particular of taking up the cross. Do we bear the cross? We therein follow Christ, who bears it before us, bears it for us, and so bears it from us. He bore the heavy end of the cross, the end that had the curse upon it, that was a heavy end, and so made the other light and easy for us. Or, we may take it in general, we must follow Christ in all instances of holiness and obedience. To do well and to suffer ill, is to follow Christ. Those that come after Christ, must follow after him.

II. Self-denial, and patient suffering, are hard lessons, which will never be learned if we consult with flesh and blood; let us therefore consult with our Lord Jesus, about some considerations proper to these duties of self-denial and suffering for Christ. 1. The weight of that eternity which depends upon our present choice (v. 25); Whosoever will save his life, by denying Christ, shall lose it; and whosoever is content to lose his life, for owning Christ, shall find it. Here are life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, set before us. Observe, The misery that attends the most plausible apostasy. Whosoever will save his life in this world, if it be by sin, he shall lose it in another; he that forsakes Christ, to preserve a temporal life and avoid a temporal death, will certainly come short of eternal life, and will be hurt of the second death, and eternally held by it. The life saved is but for a moment, the death shunned is but as a sleep; but the life lost is everlasting, and the death run upon is an endless separation from all good. 2. The advantage that attends the most perilous and expensive constancy; Whosoever will lose his life for Christ's sake in this world, shall find it in a better. Many a life is lost, for Christ's sake. Christ's holy religion is handed down to us, sealed with the blood of thousands. Though many have been losers for Christ, even of life itself, yet never anyone was, or will be, a loser by him in the end. An assurance of the life they should find, in lieu of the life they hazarded, hath enabled them to triumph over death in all its terrors; to go smiling to a scaffold, and stand singing at a stake. 3. The worth of the soul which lies at stake, and the worthlessness of the world in comparison of it (v. 26). What is a man profited, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? This alludes to that common principle, that, whatever a man gets, if he lose his life, it will do him no good, he cannot enjoy his gains. But it looks higher, and speaks of the soul as immortal, and a loss of it beyond death, which cannot be compensated by the gain of the whole world. Our souls are our own not in respect of dominion and property, but in respect of nearness and concern; our souls are our own, for they are ourselves. It is possible for the soul to be lost, and there is danger of it. The soul is lost when it is eternally separated from all the good, to all the evil that a soul is capable of; when it is separated from the favour of God. If the soul be lost, it is of the sinner's own losing. The man loses his own soul, for he does that which is certainly destroying to it, and neglects that which alone would be saving. One soul is worth more than all the world; our own souls are of greater value to us than all the wealth, honour, and pleasures of this present time, if we had them. The winning of the world is often the losing of the soul. Many a one has ruined his eternal interests by his preposterous and inordinate care to secure and advance his temporal ones. The loss of the soul is so great a loss, that the gain of the whole world will not countervail it, or make it up. He that loses his soul, though it be to gain the world, makes a very bad bargain for himself. When he comes to balance the account, and to compare profit and loss, he will find that he is ruined to all intents and purposes, is irreparably broken.

What shall a man give in exchange for his soul? If once the soul be lost, it is lost for ever. It is a loss that can never be repaired, never be retrieved. Therefore it is good to be wise in time, and do well for ourselves. Here are some considerations proper to encourage us in self-denial and suffering for Christ.

(1) The assurance we have of Christ's glory, at his second coming to judge the world, v. 27. If we see things as they will appear then, we shall see them as they should appear now.

The great encouragement to steadfastness in religion is taken from the second coming of Christ, considering it,

[1] As his honour; The Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels. To look upon Christ in his state of humiliation would discourage his followers from taking any pains, or running any hazards for him; but with an eye of faith to see the Captain of our salvation coming in his glory, will animate us, and make us think nothing too much to do, or too hard to suffer, for him. [2] As our concern;

Then he shall reward every man according to his works. Jesus Christ will come as a Judge, to dispense rewards and punishments. Men will then be rewarded, not according to their gains in this world, but according to their works, according to what they were and did, and the constancy of faithful souls recompensed with a crown of life. The best preparative for that day is to deny ourselves, and to take up our cross, and follow Christ; for so we shall make the Judge our Friend. The rewarding of men according to their works is deferred till that day. Here good and evil seem to be dispensed promiscuously; but in that day all will be set to rights.

(2) The near approach of his kingdom in this world, v. 28. It was so near, that there were some attending him who should live to see it. At the end of time, he shall come in his Father's glory; but now, in the fulness of time, he was to come in his own kingdom, his mediatorial kingdom. Some little specimen was given of his glory a few days after this, in his transfiguration (ch. xvii. 1). The apostles were employed in setting up Christ's kingdom; let them know, for their comfort, that whatever opposition they meet with, yet they shall carry their point. It is a great encouragement to suffering saints to be assured, not only of the safety, but of the advancement of Christ's kingdom among men; not only notwithstanding their sufferings, but by their sufferings. This shall be done shortly, in the present age. The nearer the church's deliverances are, the more cheerful should we be in our sufferings for Christ. It is spoken as a favour to those that should survive the present cloudy time, that they should see better days.

CHAP. XVII

I. Christ in his pomp and glory transfigured, ver. 1–13. II. Christ in his power and grace, casting the devil out of a child, ver. 14–21. And, III. Christ in his poverty and great humiliation, 1. Foretelling his own sufferings, ver. 22, 23. 2. Paying tribute, ver. 24–27. Thus were the several indications of Christ's gracious intentions admirably interwoven.

Verses 1–13

We have here the story of Christ's transfiguration; he had said that the Son of man should shortly come in his kingdom, with which promise all the three evangelists industriously connect this story.

When Christ was here in his humiliation, though his state, in the main, was a state of abasement and afflictions, there were some glimpses of his glory intermixed. But the series of his public ministry being a continued humiliation, here, just in the midst of that, comes in this discovery of his glory.

Now concerning Christ's transfiguration, observe,

I. The circumstances of it, which are here noted, v. 1.

1. The time; six days after he had the solemn conference with his disciples, ch. xvi. 21. Nothing is recorded to be said or done by our Lord Jesus for six days before his transfiguration. Then when Christ seems to be doing nothing for his church, expect, ere long, something more than ordinary.

2. The place; it was on the top of a high mountain apart. Christ chose a mountain, (1) As a secret place. He went apart; Christ chose a retired place to be transfigured in, because his appearing publicly in his glory was not agreeable to his present state; and thus he would teach us that privacy much befriends our communion with God. (2). Those that would maintain intercourse with Heaven, must frequently withdraw, and they will find themselves never less alone than when alone, for the Father is with them. Those that would have a transforming fellowship with God, must not only retire, but ascend; lift up their hearts, and seek things above.

3. The witnesses of it. He took with him Peter and James and John. He took three, a competent number to testify what they should see. Christ makes his appearances certain enough, but not too common that they might be blessed, who have not seen, and yet have believed. He took these three because they were the chief of his disciples. They were afterward to be the witnesses of his agony, and this was to prepare them for that. A sight of Christ's glory, while we are here in this world, is a good preparative for our sufferings with him, as these are preparatives for the sight of his glory in the other world.

II. The manner of it (v. 2); He was transfigured before them. The substance of his body remained the same; he was not turned into a spirit, but his body, which had appeared in weakness and dishonour, now appeared in power and glory. Now, in his transfiguration, he gave his disciples a glimpse of his glory, which could not but change his form.

Now his transfiguration appeared in two things:

1. His face did shine as the sun. The face is the principal part of the body, by which we are known; therefore such a brightness was put on Christ's face. It shone as the sun when he goes forth in his strength, so clear, so bright; the more sensibly glorious, because it suddenly broke out, as it were, from behind a black cloud.

2. His raiment was white as the light. The shining of the face of Moses was so weak, that it could easily be concealed by a thin veil; but such was the glory of Christ's body, that his clothes were enlightened by it.

III. The companions of it. There now appeared unto them Moses and Elias talking with him, v. 3. There were glorified saints attending him, that, when there were three to bear record on earth, Peter, James, and John, these might be some to bear record from heaven too. We see here, that they who are fallen asleep in Christ are not perished. These two were Moses and Elias. The Jews had great respect for the memory of Moses and Elias, and therefore they came to witness of him. In them the law and the prophets honoured Christ, and bore testimony to him. Moses and Elias appeared to the disciples; they saw them, and heard them talk, and they knew them to be Moses and Elias; glorified saints shall know one another in heaven. They talked with Christ. Christ has communion with the blessed.

IV. The great pleasure and satisfaction that the disciples took in the sight of Christ's glory. Peter, as usual, spoke for the rest; Lord, it is good for us to be here. Peter here expresses,

1. The delight they had in this converse; Lord, it is good to be here. He speaks the sense of his fellow-disciples; It is good not only for me, but for us. He did not covet to monopolise this favour, but gladly takes them in. He saith this to Christ. The soul that loves Christ, and loves to be with him, loves to go and tell him so; Lord, it is good for us to be here. All the disciples of the Lord Jesus reckon it is good for them to be with him in the holy mount. It is good to be here where Christ is; it is good to be here, retired and alone with Christ; to be here, where we may behold the beauty of the Lord Jesus.

2. The desire they had of the continuance of it; Let us make here three tabernacles. There was in this, as in many other of Peter's sayings, more zeal than discretion.

(1) Here was a zeal for this converse with heavenly things. Those that by faith behold the beauty of the Lord in his house, cannot but desire to dwell there all the days of their life. It is good to be in holy ordinances as a man at home, not as a wayfaring man.

(2) Yet in this zeal he betrayed a great deal of weakness and ignorance. What need had Moses and Elias of tabernacles? Christ had lately foretold his sufferings; Peter forgets this, or, to prevent it, will needs be building tabernacles in the mount of glory, out of the way of trouble. There is a proneness in good men to expect the crown without the cross. We are out in our aim, if we look for a heaven here upon earth. It is not for strangers and pilgrims to talk of building, or to expect a continuing city.

Yet it is some excuse for the incongruity of Peter's proposal, not only that he knew not what he said (Luke ix. 33), but also that he submitted the proposal to the wisdom of Christ; If thou wilt, let us make tabernacles.

Now to this which Peter said, there was no reply made; the disappearing of the glory would soon answer it.

V. The glorious testimony which God the Father gave to our Lord Jesus.

Now concerning this testimony from heaven to Christ, observe.

1. How it came, and in what manner it was introduced. There was a cloud. We find often in the Old Testament, that a cloud was the visible token of God's presence. He took possession of the tabernacle in a cloud, and afterwards of the temple; where Christ was in his glory, the temple was, and there God showed himself present. It was a bright cloud. Under the law it was commonly a thick and dark cloud that God made the token of his presence. But we are now come to the mount that is crowned with a bright cloud. That was a dispensation of darkness, and terror, and bondage, this of light, love, and liberty. It overshadowed them. God, in manifesting himself to his people, considers their frame. This cloud was to their eyes as parables to their understandings, to convey spiritual things by things sensible, as they were able to bear them. There came a voice out of the cloud, and it was the voice of God. Here was no thunder, or lightning, or voice of a trumpet, as there was when the law was given by Moses, but only a voice, a still small voice.

2. What this testimony from heaven was; This is my beloved Son, hear ye him.

(1) The great gospel mystery revealed; This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased. This was the very same that was spoken from heaven at his baptism (ch. iii. 17). Moses and Elias were great men, and favourites of Heaven, yet they were but servants; but Christ is a Son, and in him God was always well pleased. Moses was a great intercessor, and Elias a great reformer; but in Christ God is reconciling the world; his intercession is more prevalent than that of Moses, and his reformation more effectual than that of Elias.

This repetition of the same voice that came from heaven at his baptism was to show the thing was established. What God hath thus spoken once, yea twice, no doubt he will stand to. Now it was repeated, because he was entering upon his sufferings, to arm him against the terror, and his disciples against the offence, of the cross. When sufferings begin to abound, consolations are given more abundantly.

(2) The great gospel duty required, Hear ye him. God is well pleased with none in Christ but those that hear him. It is not enough to give him the hearing (what will that avail us?) but we must hear him, and heed him. Whoever would know the mind of God, must hearken to Jesus Christ; for by him God has in these last days spoken to us. God does here, as it were, turn us over to Christ for all the revelations of his mind.

Christ now appeared in glory; and the more we see of Christ's glory, the more cause we shall see to hearken to him.

Moses and Elias were now with him; the law and the prophets; hitherto it was said, Hear them, Luke xvi. 29. No, saith God, hear him, and that is enough; him, and not Moses and Elias, hear Christ, and you will not want them.

VI. The fright which the disciples were put into by this voice, and the encouragement Christ gave them.

1. The disciples fell on their faces, and were sore afraid. The greatness of the light, and the surprise of it, might have a natural influence upon them, to dispirit them. But that was not all, extraordinary appearances of God have ever been terrible to man, who has been afraid to hear anything immediately from God. It is well for us that God speaks to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid.

2. Christ graciously raised them up with abundance of tenderness. Observe here, (1) What he did; he came, and touched them. His approaches banished their fears. Christ's touches were often healing, and here they were strengthening and comforting. (2) What he said; Arise, and be not afraid. It is Christ by his word, and the power of his grace going along with it, that raises up good men from their dejections, and silences their fears; and none but Christ can do it; Arise, be not afraid. Causeless fears would soon vanish, if we would not yield to them. Considering what they had seen and heard, they had more reason to rejoice than to fear. Through the infirmity of the flesh, we often frighten ourselves with that wherewith we should encourage ourselves. After they had an express command from heaven to hear Christ, the first word they had from him was, Be not afraid.

VII. The disappearing of the vision (v. 8); They lift up themselves, and then lift up their eyes, and saw no man, save Jesus only. It is not wisdom to raise our expectations high in this world, for the most valuable of our glories and joys here are vanishing, even those of near communion with God are so, not a continual feast, but a running banquet. Two heavens are too much for those to expect that never deserve one. Now they saw no man, save Jesus only. Christ will tarry with us when Moses and Elias are gone.

VIII. The discourse between Christ and his disciples as they came down from the mountain, v. 9–13. They came down from the mountain. We must come down from the holy mountains, where we have communion with God; even there we have no continuing city. When the disciples came down, Jesus came with them. When we return to the world again after an ordinance, it must be our care to take Christ with us. As they came down, they talked of Christ. Note, When we are returning from holy ordinances, it is good to entertain ourselves and one another with discourse suitable to the work we have been about.

Here is, (1) The charge that Christ gave the disciples to keep the vision very private for the present (v. 9); Tell it to no man till the Son of man is risen. If they had proclaimed it, the credibility of it would have been shocked by his sufferings, which were now hastening on. But let the publication of it be adjourned till after his resurrection, and then that and his subsequent glory will be a great confirmation of it. Everything is beautiful in its season. Christ's time is the best and fittest for the manifesting of himself and must be attended to by us.

(2) An objection which the disciples made against something Christ had said (v. 10); "Why then say the scribes that Elias must first come?" When the disciples could not reconcile what Christ said with what they had heard out of the Old Testament, they desired him to explain it to them. When we are puzzled with scripture difficulties, we must apply ourselves to Christ by prayer for his Spirit to open our understandings and to lead us into all truth.

(3) The solving of this objection. Ask, and it shall be given; ask instruction, and it shall be given. Christ allows the prediction (v. 11); "Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things; so far you are in the right." Christ did not come to alter or invalidate anything foretold in the Old Testament. John Baptist came to restore things spiritually, to revive the decays of religion, which means the same with this, he shall restore all things. John preached repentance, and that restores all things. He asserts the accomplishment. The scribes say true, that Elias shall come; but I say unto you, what the scribes could not say, that Elias is come, v. 12. God's promises are often fulfilled, and men perceive it not, but enquire, Where is the promise? when it is already performed. The scribes busied themselves in criticising upon the scripture, but understood not by the signs of the times the fulfilling of the scripture. It is easier to explain the word of God than to apply it and make a right use of it.

Because they knew him not, they have done to him whatsoever they listed; if they had known. they would not have crucified Christ, or beheaded John. He adds, Likewise also shall the Son of man suffer of them. When they had imbrued their hands in the blood of John Baptist, they were ready to do the like to Christ. As men deal with Christ's servants, so they would deal with him himself.

(4) The disciples' satisfaction in Christ's reply to their objection (v. 13); They understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist. He did not name John, but gives them such a description of him as would put them in mind of what he had said to them formerly concerning him; This is Elias. When we diligently use the means of knowledge, how strangely are mists scattered and mistakes rectified!

Verses 14–21

I. A melancholy representation of the case of this child, made to Christ by the afflicted father. This was immediately upon his coming down from the mountain where he was transfigured. Christ's glories do not make him unmindful of us and of our wants and miseries. This poor man's address was very importunate; he came kneeling to Christ. Sense of misery will bring people to their knees. He delights to be thus wrestled with.

Two things the father of the child complains of.

1. The distress of his child (v. 15); Lord, have mercy on my son. Parents are doubly concerned to pray for their children, not only that are weak and cannot, but much more that are wicked and will not, pray for themselves. (1) The nature of this child's disease was very sad; He was lunatic and sore vexed. A lunatic is properly one whose distemper lies in the brain. The child had the falling-sickness, and the hand of Satan was in it. Those whom Satan got possession of, he afflicted by those diseases of the body which do most affect the mind; for it is the soul that he aims to do mischief to. The father, in his complaint, saith, He is lunatic, taking notice of the effect; but Christ, in the cure, rebuked the devil, and so struck at the cause. Thus he doth in spiritual cures. (2) The effects of the disease were very deplorable; He oft falls into the fire, and into the water.

2. The disappointment of his expectation from the disciples (v. 16); I brought him to thy disciples, and they could not cure him. Christ gave his disciples power to cast out devils (ch. x. 1, 8), and therein they were successful (Luke x. 17); yet at this time they failed in the operation, though there were nine of them together. It is for the honour of Christ to come in with help at a dead-lift, when other helpers cannot help. Sometimes he keeps the cistern empty, that he may bring us to himself, the Fountain. But the failures of instruments shall not hinder the operations of his grace, which will work, if not by them, yet without them.

II. The rebukes that Christ gave.

1. He chid those about him (v. 17); O faithless and perverse generation! This is not spoken to the disciples, but to the people, and perhaps especially to the scribes. Christ himself could not do many mighty works among a people in whom unbelief reigned. It was here owing to the faithlessness of this generation, that they could not obtain those blessings from God, which otherwise they might have had; as it was owing to the weakness of the disciples' faith, that they could not do those works for God, which otherwise they might have done.

Two things he upbraids them with. (1) His presence with them so long; "How long shall I be with you? Will you always need my bodily presence, and never come to such maturity as to be fit to be left? Must the child be always carried, and will it never learn to go alone?" (2) His patience with them so long; How long shall I suffer you? The faithlessness and perverseness of those who enjoy the means of grace are a great grief to the Lord Jesus. He is God, and not man, else he would not suffer so long, nor bear so much, as he doth.

2. He cured the child, and set him to rights again. He called, Bring him hither to me. Though the people were perverse, and Christ was provoked, yet care was taken of the child. Though Christ may be angry, he is never unkind. Bring him to me. When all other helps and succours fail, we are welcome to Christ.

See here an emblem of Christ's undertaking as our Redeemer.

(1) He breaks the power of Satan (v. 18); Jesus rebuked the devil, as one having authority. Christ's victories over Satan are obtained by the power of his word. Satan cannot stand before the rebukes of Christ, though his possession has been ever so long.

(2) He redresses the grievances of the children of men; The child was cured from that very hour. It was an immediate cure, and a perfect one. This is an encouragement to parents to bring their children to Christ. Not only bring them to Christ by prayer, but bring them to the word of Christ. Christ's rebukes, brought home to the heart, will ruin Satan's power there.

III. Christ's discourse with his disciples hereupon.

1. They ask the reason why they could not cast out the devil at this time (v. 19); They came to Jesus apart. Ministers, who are to deal for Christ in public, have need to keep up a private communion with him. We should make use of the liberty of access we have to Jesus apart, where we may be free and particular with him. That which is amiss may, when found out, be amended.

2. Christ gives them two reasons why they failed.

(1) It was because of their unbelief, v. 20. When he spake to the father of the child and to the people, he charged it upon their unbelief; when he spake to his disciples, he charged it upon theirs; for the truth was, there were faults on both sides. When the preaching of the word seems not to be so successful as sometimes it has been, the people are apt to lay all the fault upon the ministers, and the ministers upon the people; whereas, it is more becoming for each to own his own faultiness, and to say, "It is owing to me." Though they had faith, yet that faith was weak and ineffectual. As far as faith falls short of its due strength, vigour, and activity, it may truly be said, "There is unbelief." Many are chargeable with unbelief, who yet are not to be called unbelievers. It is because of our unbelief, that we bring so little to pass in religion, and come short, in that which is good.

Our Lord Jesus takes this occasion to show them the power of faith, If ye have faith as a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall do wonders, v. 20. Some make the comparison to refer to the quality of the mustard-seed, which is, when bruised, sharp and penetrating;

"If you have an active growing faith, not dead, flat, or insipid, you will not be baffled thus." But it rather refers to the quantity; "If you had but a grain of true faith, though so little that it were like that which is the least of all seeds, you would do wonders." The faith here required, is that which had for its object that particular revelation by which Christ gave his disciples power to work miracles in his name. It was a faith in this revelation that they were defective in. Perhaps their Master's absence with the three chief of his disciples might occasion some doubts concerning their power to do this. It is good for us to be diffident of ourselves and of our own strength; but it is displeasing to Christ, when we distrust any power derived from him or granted by him.

If ye have ever so little of this faith in sincerity ye shall say to this mountain, Remove. This is a proverbial expression, denoting that which follows, and no more, Nothing shall be impossible to you. They distrusted the power they had received, and so failed. To convince them of this, Christ shows them what they might have done. An active faith can remove mountains, not of itself, but in the virtue of a divine power engaged by a divine promise.

(2) Because there was something in the kind of the malady, which rendered the cure more than ordinarily difficult (v. 21); "This kind goes not out but by prayer and fasting." The extraordinary power of Satan must not discourage our faith, but quicken us to a greater intenseness in the acting of it, and more earnestness in praying to God for the increase of it. Fasting and prayer are proper means for the fetching in of divine power to our assistance. Fasting is of use to put an edge upon prayer; it is an evidence and instance of humiliation which is necessary in prayer. Fasting must be joined with prayer, to keep under the body.

Verses 22–23

Christ here foretells his own sufferings; he began to do it before (ch. xvi. 21); and, finding that it was to his disciples a hard saying, he saw it necessary to repeat it.

1. What he foretold concerning himself—that he should be betrayed and killed.

(1) He tells them that he should be betrayed into the hands of men. Men to whom he was allied by nature, and from whom therefore he might expect pity and tenderness; these are his persecutors and murderers.

(2) That they should kill him; nothing less than that would satisfy their rage; it was his blood, his precious blood, that they thirsted after. If he be a Sacrifice of atonement, he must be killed; without blood no remission.

(3) That he shall be raised again the third day. Still, when he spoke of his death, he gave a hint of his resurrection. This was an encouragement, not only to him, but to his disciples; for if he rise the third day, his absence from them will not be long, and his return to them will be glorious.

2. How the disciples received this; They were exceedingly sorry. Herein appeared their love to their Master's person, but with all their ignorance and mistake concerning his undertaking.

Verses 24–27

We have here an account of Christ's paying tribute.

I. Observe how it was demanded, v. 24. Christ was now at Capernaum.

1. The tribute demanded was not any civil payment to the Roman powers, but the church-duties, which were required from every person for the service of the temple, and the defraying of the expenses of the worship there.

2. The demand was very modest. Their question is, Doth not your master pay tribute? Some think that they sought an occasion against him. It should rather seem, they asked this with respect, intimating, that if he had any privilege to exempt him from this payment, they would not insist upon it.

Peter passed his word for his Master; "Yes, certainly; my Master pays tribute." He was made under the law, therefore under this law he was paid for at forty days old (Luke ii. 22), and now he paid for himself. Now this tax paid to the temple is called an atonement for the soul, Exod. xxx. 15. Christ, that in everything he might appear in the likeness of sinners, paid it though he had no sin to atone for. He did this to set us an example: Of rendering to all their due tribute to whom tribute is due. Of contributing to the support of the public worship of God in the places where we are. If we reap spiritual things, it is fit that we should return carnal things. If Christ pay tribute, who can pretend an exemption?

II. How it was disputed (v. 25), not with the collectors themselves, but with Peter, that he might be satisfied in the reason why Christ paid tribute. He brought the collectors into the house; but Christ anticipated him. The disciples of Christ are never attacked without his knowledge. He appeals to the way of the kings of the earth, which is, to take tribute of strangers. He applies this to himself; Then are the children free. Christ is the Son of God, and Heir of all things; and therefore not obliged to pay this tax for the service of the temple. Thus Christ asserts his right. God's children are freed by grace and adoption from the slavery of sin and Satan, but not from their subjection to civil magistrates in civil things; here the law of Christ is express. Render to Caesar the things that are Caesar's.

III. How it was paid, notwithstanding, v. 27.

1. For what reason Christ waived his privilege, and paid this tribute—Lest we should offend them. Christ considers that if he should refuse this payment, it would increase people's prejudice against him and his doctrine, and alienate their affections from him, and therefore he resolves to pay it. Christian prudence and humility teach us, in many cases, to recede from our right, rather than give offence by insisting upon it. We must never decline our duty for fear of giving offence, but we must sometimes deny ourselves in that which is our secular interest, rather than give offence.

2. What course he took for the payment of this tax (v. 27).

(1) The poverty of Christ; though he cured so many that were diseased; it seems, he did all gratis.

(2) The power of Christ, in fetching money out of a fish's mouth for this purpose. It was an evidence of his divinity, and that he is Lord of hosts. Those creatures that are most remote from man are at the command of Christ, even the fishes of the sea are under his feet (Ps. viii. 5). Now observe,

[1] Peter must catch the fish by angling. Peter has something to do, and it is in the way of his own calling too; to teach us diligence in the employment we are called to, and called in. Do we expect that Christ should give to us? Let us be ready to work for him.

[2] The fish came up, with money in the mouth of it. What work we do at Christ's command brings its own pay along with it.

[3] The piece of money was just enough to pay the tax for Christ and Peter. He would teach us not to covet superfluities, but, having enough for our present occasions, therewith to be content, and not to distrust God, though we live but from hand to mouth. Peter fished for this money, and therefore part of it went for his use. Those that are workers together with Christ in winning souls shall be sharers with him in his glory. Give it for thee and me. What Christ paid for himself was looked upon as a debt; what he paid for Peter was a courtesy to him. It is a desirable thing, if God so please, to have wherewithal of this world's goods, not only to be just, but to be kind; not only to be charitable to the poor, but obliging to our friends.

CHAP. XVIII

We have here, I. Instructions concerning humility, ver. 1–6. II. Concerning offences in general (ver. 7), particularly offences given. 1. By us to ourselves, ver. 8, 9. 2. By us to others, ver. 10–14. 3. By others to us; (1) Scandalous sins, ver. 15–20. (2) Personal wrongs, ver. 21–35.

Verses 1–6

There never was a greater pattern of humility than Christ; he took all occasions to command it, to commend it, to his disciples and followers.

I. The occasion of this discourse concerning humility was an unbecoming contest among the disciples for precedency; Who is the greatest in the kingdom of heaven? They mean not, who by character but who by name. They had heard much, and preached much, of the kingdom of heaven; but as yet they were so far from having any clear notion of it, that they dreamt of a temporal kingdom, and the external pomp and power of it. They expected his kingdom would commence; and now they thought it was time to put in for their places in it; it is good, in such cases, to speak early. Instead of asking how they might have strength and grace to suffer with him, they ask him, "Who shall be highest in reigning with him." Many love to hear and speak of privileges and glory, who are willing to pass by the thoughts of work and trouble.

1. They suppose that all who have a place in that kingdom are great. Those are truly great who are truly good.

2. They suppose that there are degrees in this greatness. All the saints are honourable, but not all alike so.

3. They suppose it must be some of them, that must be prime ministers of state.

4. They strive who it should be, each having some pretence or other to it. We are very apt to amuse and humour ourselves with foolish fancies of things that will never be.

II. The discourse itself, which is a just rebuke to the question, Who shall be greatest?

Christ here teacheth them to be humble,

1. By a sign (v. 2); He called a little child to him, and set him in the midst of them. Humility is a lesson so hardly learned, that we have need by all ways and means to be taught it. When we look upon a little child, we should be put in mind of the use Christ made of this child. He set him in the midst of them; not that they might play with him, but that they might learn by him. Grown men, and great men, should not disdain the company of little children. They may either speak to them, and give instruction to them; or look upon them, and receive instruction from them.

2. By a sermon upon this sign; in which he shows them and us,

(1) The necessity of humility, v. 3. Verily I say unto you, Except ye be converted, and become as little children, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven.

What it is that he requires and insists upon. First, "You must be converted, you must be of another mind." Besides the first conversion of a soul there are after-conversions from particular paths of backsliding. Every step out of the way by sin, must be a step into it again by repentance. Secondly, You must become as little children. Converting grace makes us like little children. As children, we must be careful for nothing, but leave it to our heavenly Father to care for us (ch. vi. 31). We must be humble as little children; the child of a gentleman will play with the child of a beggar (Rom. xii. 16). The age of childhood is the learning age. What stress he lays upon this; Without this, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven. The disciples, when they put that question (v. 1), thought themselves sure of the kingdom of heaven. They were ambitious of being greatest in the kingdom of heaven; Christ tells them, that except they came to a better temper, they should never come thither. Our Lord designs here to show the great danger of pride and ambition. Pride threw the angels that sinned out of heaven, and will keep us out, if we be not converted from it.

(2) He shows the honour and advancement that attend humility (v. 4). He that humbles himself as a little child the same is greatest in the kingdom of heaven. The humblest Christians are the best Christians and most like to Christ, and highest in his favour, and fittest to serve God in this world, and enjoy him in another.

(3) The special care Christ takes for those that are humble.

Those that thus humble themselves will be afraid,

[1] That nobody will receive them; but (v. 5), Whoso shall receive one such little child in my name, receiveth me. Whatever kindnesses are done to such, Christ takes as done to himself. Though it be but one such little child that is received in Christ's name, it shall be accepted. The less they are in themselves, to whom we show kindness, the more there is of good will in it to Christ; the less it is for their sakes, the more it is for his; and he takes it accordingly.

[2] They will be afraid that everybody will abuse them. This objection he obviates (v. 6), where he warns all people not to offer any injury to one of Christ's little ones. This word makes a wall of fire about them; he that touches them, touches the apple of God's eye.

The crime supposed; offending one of these little ones that believe in Christ. Their believing in Christ unites them to him, so that, as they partake of the benefit of his sufferings, he also partakes in the wrong of theirs. Even the little ones that believe have the same privileges with the great ones. The best men have often met with the worst treatment in this world.

The punishment of this crime; intimated in that word, Better for him that he were drowned in the depth of the sea. The sin is so heinous, and the ruin proportionably so great, that he had better undergo the sorest punishments inflicted on the worst of malefactors, which can only kill the body.

Verses 7–14

Our Saviour here speaks of offences, or scandals,

I. In general, v. 7. That is an offence, 1. Which occasions guilt. 2. Which occasions grief. Christ here tells them,

(1) That they were certain things; It must needs be, that offences come. When we are sure there is danger, we should be the better armed. Not that Christ's word necessitates any man to offend, but it is a prediction upon a view of the causes. It is morally impossible but that there should be offences. Let us stand upon our guard.

(2) That they would be woeful things.

[1] A woe to the careless and unguarded, to whom the offence is given; Woe to the world because of offences. This present world is an evil world, it is so full of offences, of sins, and snares, and sorrows; a dangerous road we travel, full of stumbling-blocks, precipices, and false guides. Woe to the world. As for those whom God hath chosen they are preserved by the power of God, are helped over all these stones of stumbling.

[2] A woe to the wicked, who wilfully give the offence; But woe to that man by whom the offence comes. Though it must needs be, that the offence will come, that will be no excuse for the offenders. The guilt will be laid at the door of those who give the offence, though they also fall under a woe who take it. The righteous God will reckon with those who ruin the eternal interests of precious souls, and the temporal interests of precious saints. Men will be reckoned with, not only for their doings, but for the fruit of their doings.

II. In particular, Christ here speaks of offences given,

1. By us to ourselves, which is expressed by our hand or foot offending us; in such a case, it must be cut off, v. 8, 9. This Christ had said before (ch. v. 29, 30). Those hard sayings of Christ need to be repeated to us again and again, and all little enough. What it is that is here enjoined. We must part with an eye, or a hand, or a foot, whatever it is, which is dear to us, when it proves unavoidably an occasion of sin to us. Many prevailing temptations to sin arise from within ourselves; if there were never a devil to tempt us, we should be drawn away of our own lust. We must, as far as lawfully we may, part with that which we cannot keep without being entangled in sin by it. It is certain, the inward lust must be mortified. Corrupt inclinations and appetites must be checked and crossed. The outward occasions of sin must be avoided, though we thereby put as great a violence upon ourselves as it would be to cut off a hand, or pluck out an eye. We must think nothing too dear to part with, for the keeping of a good conscience. Upon what inducement this is required: It is better for thee to enter into life maimed, than, having two hands, to be cast into hell. The argument is the same with that of the apostle, Rom. viii. 13. If we live after the flesh, we shall die. If we through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body, we shall live; that is meant by our entering into life maimed, that is, the body of sin maimed. They that are Christ's have nailed the flesh to the cross, but it is not yet dead; its life is prolonged, but its dominion taken away.

2. Concerning offences given by us to others.

(1) The caution itself; Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones. He will be displeased with the great ones of the church, if they despise the little ones of it. We may understand it literally of little children; of them Christ was speaking, v. 2, 4. Or, figuratively; true but weak believers are these little ones, who are like little children, the lambs of Christ's flock. We must not despise them, not think meanly of them. We must not make a jest of their infirmities, not conduct ourselves scornfully or disdainfully toward them, as if we cared not what became of them. We must not impose upon the consciences of others. There is a respect owing to the conscience of every man who appears to be conscientious. We must take heed that we do not despise them; and be very cautious what we say and do, lest we should through inadvertency give offence to Christ's little ones.

(2) The reasons to enforce the caution. We must not look upon these little ones as contemptible. Let not those be looked upon by us with disdain, whom God has put honour upon. To prove that the little ones which believe in Christ are worthy to be respected, consider,

[1] The ministration of the good angels about them; In heaven their angels always behold the face of my Father. Two things he lets us know concerning them.

First, That they are the little ones' angels. God's angels are theirs. They can look by faith on the heavenly hosts, and call them theirs. It is bad being enemies to those who are so guarded; and it is good having God for our God, for then we have his angels for our angels.

Secondly, That they always behold the face of the Father in heaven. This bespeaks, 1. The angels' continual felicity and honour. The happiness of heaven consists in the vision of God, beholding his beauty. 2. It bespeaks their continual readiness to minister to the saints. They behold the face of God, expecting to receive orders from him what to do for the good of the saints. If we would behold the face of God in glory hereafter, we must behold the face of God now, in readiness to our duty.

[2] The gracious design of Christ concerning them (v. 11); For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost. This is a reason, First, Why the little ones' angels have such a charge concerning them, and attend upon them; it is in pursuance of Christ's design to save them. Secondly, Why they are not to be despised; because Christ came to save them, to save them that are lost. Our souls by nature are lost souls; as a traveller is lost, that is out of his way. Christ's errand into the world was to save that which was lost, to put us into the right way that leads to our great end. This is a good reason why the least and weakest believers should not be despised or offended. If Christ put such a value upon them, let us not undervalue them.

[3] The tender regard which our heavenly Father has to these little ones, and his concern for their welfare. This is illustrated by a comparison, v. 12–14.

Here is, First, The comparison, v. 12, 13. The owner that had lost one sheep out of a hundred diligently enquires after it, is greatly pleased when he has found it, and has in that a sensible and affecting joy, more than in the ninety and nine that wandered not. Now this is applicable, 1. To the state of fallen man in general; he is strayed like a lost sheep. Wandering man is sought upon the mountains, which Christ, in great fatigue, traversed in pursuit of him, and he is found; which is matter of joy. Greater joy there is in heaven for returning sinners than for remaining angels. 2. To particular believers, God is graciously concerned, not only for his flock in general, but for every lamb, or sheep, that belongs to it. Though they are many, yet out of those many he can easily miss one, for he is a great Shepherd, but not so easily lose it, for he is a good Shepherd.

Secondly, The application of this comparison (v. 14); It is not the will of your Father, that one of these little ones should perish. It is his will, that these little ones should be saved; it is the will of his design and delight. This care extends itself to every particular member of the flock, even the meanest.

Observe, Christ called God, v. 19, my Father which is in heaven; he calls him, v. 14, your Father which is in heaven; intimating that he is not ashamed to call his poor disciples brethren. This intimates likewise the ground of the safety of his little ones; that God is their Father. A father takes care of all his children, but is particularly tender of the little ones.

Verses 15–20

Christ, having cautioned his disciples not to give offence, comes next to direct them what they must do in case of offences given them.

I. Let us apply it to the quarrels that happen, upon any account, among Christians.

1. Go, and tell him his fault between thee and him alone. Do not suffer thy resentments to ripen into a secret malice (like a wound, which is most dangerous when it bleeds inwardly), but give vent to them in a mild and grave admonition, let them so spend themselves, and they will expire the sooner. If he has indeed done thee a considerable wrong, endeavour to make him sensible of it, but let the rebuke be private, between thee and him alone; if thou wouldest convince him, do not expose him, for that will but exasperate him. "If he shall hear thee, well and good, thou hast gained thy brother, there is an end of the controversy, and it is a happy end; let no more be said of it, but let the falling out of friends be the renewing of friendship."

2. "If he will not hear thee, if he will not own himself in a fault, yet do not despair, but try what he will say to it, if thou take one or two more, not only to be witnesses of what passes, but to reason the case further with him."

3. "If he shall neglect to hear them, and will not refer the matter to their arbitration, then tell it to the church, and do not presently appeal to the magistrate, or fetch a writ for him." This is fully explained by the apostle (1 Cor. vi), where he reproves those that went to law before the unjust, and not before the saints (v. 1). This rule was then in a special manner requisite, when the civil government was in the hands of such as were not only aliens, but enemies.

4. "If he will not hear the church but persists in the wrong he has done thee let him be to thee as a heathen man, and a publican. Thou mayest, if thou wilt, break off thy friendship and familiarity with him; though thou must by no means study revenge, yet thou mayest choose whether thou wilt have any dealings with him. Thou wouldest have preserved his friendship, but he would not, and so has forfeited it." If a man cheat and abuse me once, it is his fault; if twice, it is my own.

II. Let us apply it to scandalous sins. Christ, designing to erect a church for himself in the world, here took care of the preservation, 1. Of its purity. 2. Of its peace and order.

(1) What is the case supposed? If thy brother trespass against thee. Church discipline is for church members. Them that are without God judges. Christ and believers have twisted interests; what is done against them Christ takes as done against himself, and what is done against him they cannot but take as done against themselves.

(2) What is to be done in this case.

[1] The rules prescribed, v. 15–17.

First, "Go and tell him his fault between thee and him alone. Do not stay till he comes to thee, but go to him, as the physician visits the patient. Tell him his fault, remind him of what he has done, and of the evil of it." People are loth to see their faults, and have need to be told of them. Great sins often amuse conscience, and for the present stupefy and silence it; and there is need of help to awaken it.

"Tell him his fault, ἔλεγξον αὐτὸν—argue the case with him" (so the word signifies). Where the fault is plain and great, and the person proper to deal with, we must with meekness and faithfulness tell people of what is amiss in them. Christian reproof is an ordinance of Christ for the bringing of sinners to repentance. "Let the reproof be private that it may appear you seek not his reproach, but his repentance." It is a good rule not to speak of our brethren's faults to others, till we have first spoken of them to themselves; this would make less reproaching and more reproving. It will be likely to work upon an offender, when he sees his reprover concerned not only for his salvation, in telling him his fault, but for his reputation in telling him of it privately.

"If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother; thou hast helped to save him from sin and ruin, and it will be thy credit and comfort," James v. 19, 20. If the loss of a soul be a great loss, the gain of a soul is sure no small gain.

Secondly, If that doth not prevail, then take with thee one or two more, v. 16. We must not be weary of well-doing, though we see not presently the good success of it. "If he will not hear thee, yet do not give him up as in a desperate case; but go on in the use of other means."

"Take with thee one or two more; 1. To assist thee; they may speak some pertinent convincing word which thou didst not think of, and may manage the matter with more prudence than thou didst." Christians should see their need of help in doing good, as in other things, so in giving reproofs. 2. "To affect him; he will be the more likely to be humbled for his fault, when he sees it witnessed against by two or three." Though in such a world as this it is rare to find one good whom all men speak well of, yet it is more rare to find one good whom all men speak ill of. 3. "To be witnesses of his conduct, in case the matter should afterward be brought before the church."

Thirdly, If he neglect to hear them, and will not be humbled, then tell it to the church, v. 17. There are some stubborn spirits to whom the likeliest means of conviction prove ineffectual; yet such must not be given over as incurable. Private admonitions must always go before public censures; if gentler methods will do the work, those that are more rough and severe must not be used. Those that will be reasoned out of their sins, need not be shamed out of them. Let God's work be done effectually, but with as little noise as may be. Where private admonition does not prevail, there public censure must take place.

Tell it to the church. What church must be told—is the great question. By what follows, v. 18, it is plain that he means a Christian church, which, though not yet formed, was now in the embryo. "Tell it to the church, that particular church in the communion of which the offender lives. Tell it to the guides and governors of the church; let them examine the matter and, if they find the complaint frivolous and groundless, let them rebuke the complainant; if they find it just, let them rebuke the offender, and call him to repentance."

Fourthly, "If he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as a heathen man and a publican; let him be cast out of the communion of the church." Those who put contempt on the orders and rules of a society, and bring reproach upon it, forfeit the honours and privileges of it. But observe, he doth not say, "Let him be to thee as a devil," but "as a heathen and a publican, as one in a capacity of being restored and received in again." But when by this he is humbled and reclaimed, he must be welcomed into communion again, and all shall be well.

[2] Here is a warrant signed for the ratification of all the church's proceedings according to these rules, v. 18. What was said before to Peter is here said to all the disciples. While ministers preach the word of Christ faithfully, and in their government of the church strictly adhere to his laws, they may be assured that he will own them, and stand by them. He will own them,

First, In their sentence of suspension; Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven. If the censures of the church duly follow the institution of Christ, his judgments will follow the censures of the church, for Christ will not suffer his own ordinances to be trampled upon. Christ will not own those as his, nor receive them to himself, whom the church has duly delivered to Satan; but, if through error or envy the censures of the church be unjust, Christ will graciously find those who are so cast out, John ix. 34, 35.

Secondly, In their sentence of absolution; Whatsoever ye shall lose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. No church censures bind so fast, but that, upon the sinner's repentance and reformation, they may and must be loosed again. Sufficient is the punishment which has attained its end, and the offender must then be forgiven and comforted. Those who, upon their repentance, are received by the church into communion again may take the comfort of their absolution in heaven, if their hearts be upright with God.

Now it is a great honour which Christ here puts upon the church.

(1) God's readiness to answer the church's prayers (v. 19); If two of you shall agree harmoniously, touching any thing that they shall ask, it shall be done for them. Apply this,

[1] In general, to all the requests of the faithful praying seed of Jacob; they shall not seek God's face in vain. Many promises we have in scripture of a gracious answer to the prayers of faith, but this gives a particular encouragement to joint-prayer. No law of heaven limits the number of petitioners. If they join in the same prayer, or, though at a distance, agree in some particular matter of prayer, they shall speed well.

[2] In particular, to those requests that are put up to God about binding and loosing. The power of church discipline is not here lodged in the hand of a single person, but two, at least, are supposed to be concerned in it. Heats and animosities, among those whose work it is to remove offences, will be the greatest offence of all. Prayer must evermore go along with church discipline. Pass no sentence, which you cannot in faith ask God to confirm. Prayer must go along with all our endeavours for the conversion of sinners; see James v. 16. The unanimous petitions of the church of God, for the ratification of their just censures, shall be heard in heaven. God will set his fiat to the appeals and applications you make to him. God doth especially own and accept us, when we are praying for those that have offended him and us. The Lord turned the captivity of Job, not when he prayed for himself, but when he prayed for his friends who had trespassed against him.

(2) The presence of Christ in the assemblies of Christians, v. 20. Assemblies of Christians for holy purposes are hereby appointed, directed, and encouraged. They are hereby appointed; the church of Christ in the world exists most visibly in religious assemblies; it is the will of Christ that these should be set up, and kept up. If there be no liberty and opportunity for large and numerous assemblies, yet then it is the will of God that two or three should gather together. When we cannot do what we would in religion, we must do as we can, and God will accept us. They are hereby directed to gather together in Christ's name. In the exercise of church discipline, they must come together in the name of Christ. In meeting for worship, we must have an eye to Christ; and in communion with all that in every place call upon him. When we come together to worship God in a dependence upon the Spirit and grace of Christ, having an actual regard to him as our Way to the Father, and our Advocate with the Father, then we are met together in his name. They are hereby encouraged with an assurance of the presence of Christ; There am I in the midst of them. Where his saints are, his sanctuary is, and there he will dwell. He is in the midst of them, that is, in their hearts; it is a spiritual presence, the presence of Christ's Spirit with their spirits, that is here intended. There am I, not only I will be there, but I am there; as if he came first, is ready before them, they shall find him there.

Though but two or three are met together, Christ is among them; this is an encouragement to the meeting of a few, when it is either, First, Of choice. There may be occasion sometimes for two or three to come together, either for mutual assistance in conference or joint assistance in prayer; there Christ will be present. Or, Secondly, By constraint; when there are not more than two or three to come together, or, if there be, they dare not. It is not the multitude, but the faith and sincere devotion, of the worshippers, that invites the presence of Christ; and though there be but two or three, the smallest number that can be, yet, if Christ make one among them, who is the principal one, their meeting is as honourable and comfortable as if they were two or three thousand.

Verses 21–35

I. Peter's question concerning this matter (v. 21); Lord, how oft shall my brother trespass against me, and I forgive him? Will it suffice to do it seven times?

1. He takes it for granted that he must forgive. He knows that he must not only not bear a grudge against his brother, or meditate revenge, but be as good a friend as ever, and forget the injury.

2. He thinks it a great matter to forgive till seven times; he means not seven times a day, as Christ said (Luke xvii. 4), but seven times in his life. There is a proneness in our corrupt nature to stint ourselves in that which is good, and to be afraid of doing too much in religion, particularly of forgiving too much, though we have so much forgiven us.

II. Christ's direct answer to Peter's question; I say not unto thee, Until seven times, but Until seventy times seven; a certain number for an indefinite one, but a great one. It does not look well for us to keep count of the offences done against us by our brethren. There is something of ill-nature in scoring up the injuries we forgive, as if we would allow ourselves to be revenged when the measure is full. It is necessary to pass by injuries, without reckoning how often; to forgive, and forget. God multiplies his pardons, and so should we. We should make it our constant practice to forgive injuries, and should accustom ourselves to it till it becomes habitual.

III. A further discourse of our Saviour's, by way of parable, to show the necessity of forgiving the injuries that are done to us. The parable is a comment upon the fifth petition of the Lord's prayer, Forgive us our trespasses, as we forgive them that trespass against us. Those, and those only, may expect to be forgiven of God, who forgive their brethren.

There are three things in the parable.

1. The master's wonderful clemency to his servant who was indebted to him; he forgave him ten thousand talents, out of pure compassion to him, v. 23–27. Where observe,

(1) Every sin we commit is a debt to God; not like a debt to an equal, contracted by buying or borrowing, but to a superior; like a debt to a prince when a recognizance is forfeited, or a penalty incurred by a breach of the law. We are all debtors; we owe satisfaction, and are liable to the process of the law.

(2) There is an account kept of these debts. This king would take account of his servants. God now reckons with us by our own consciences; conscience is an auditor for God in the soul, to call us to account, and to account with us. One of the first questions that an awakened Christian asks, is, How much owest thou unto my Lord? And unless it be bribed, it will tell the truth, and not write fifty for a hundred.

(3) The debt of sin is a very great debt; and some are more in debt, by reason of sin, than others. When he began to reckon, one of the first defaulters appeared to owe ten thousand talents. The debt was ten thousand talents, a vast sum, a king's ransom or a kingdom's subsidy. See what our sins are, [1] For the heinousness of their nature; they are talents, the greatest denomination that ever was used in the account of money or weight. [2] For the vastness of their number; they are ten thousand, a myriad.

(4) The debt of sin is so great, that we are not able to pay it; He had not to pay. Sinners are insolvent debtors.

(5) If God should deal with us in strict justice, we should be condemned as insolvent debtors. Justice demands satisfaction. The servant had contracted this debt by his wastefulness and wilfulness, and therefore might justly be left to lie by it. His lord commanded him to be sold; his wife and children to be sold, and all that he had, and payment to be made. See here what every sin deserves; this is the wages of sin. Thus he would have payment to be made, that is, something done towards it; though it is impossible that the sale of one so worthless should amount to the payment of so great a debt.

(6) The servant fell down at the feet of his royal master, and worshipped him; or, as some copies read it, he besought him; his address was very submissive and very importunate; Have patience with me, and I will pay thee all, v. 26. The servant knew before that he was so much in debt, and yet was under no concern about it, till he was called to an account. Sinners are commonly careless about the pardon of their sins, till they come under the arrests of some awakening word, some startling providence, or approaching death. The stoutest heart will fail, when God sets the sins in order before it. He begs time; Have patience with me. Patience and forbearance are a great favour, but it is folly to think that these alone will save us; reprieves are not pardons. He promises payment; Have patience awhile, and I will pay thee all. He that had nothing to pay with (v. 25) fancied he could pay all. See how close pride sticks, even to awakened sinners; they are convinced, but not humbled.

(7) The God of infinite mercy is very ready, out of pure compassion, to forgive the sins of those that humble themselves before him (v. 27); The lord of that servant, since he could not be satisfied by the payment of the debt, would be glorified by the pardon of it. The servant's prayer was, Have patience with me; the master's grant is a discharge in full. The pardon of sin is owing to the mercy of God, to his tender mercy (Luke i. 77, 78); He was moved with compassion. There is forgiveness with God for the greatest sins, if they be repented of. Though the debt was vastly great, he forgave it all, v. 32. The forgiving of the debt is the loosing of the debtor; He loosed him. The obligation is cancelled, the judgment vacated. Though he discharged him from the penalty as a debtor, he did not discharge him from his duty as a servant. The pardon of sin doth not slacken, but strengthen, our obligations to obedience.

2. The servant's unreasonable severity toward his fellow-servant, notwithstanding his lord's clemency toward him, v. 28–30. This represents the sin of those who are rigorous and unmerciful in demanding that which is their own, to the utmost of right, which sometimes proves a real wrong. To exact satisfaction for debts of injury purely for revenge, though the law may allow it, savours not of a Christian spirit.

See here, (1) How small the debt was, how very small, compared with the ten thousand talents which his lord forgave him; He owed him a hundred pence. Offences done to men are nothing to those which are committed against God. Not that therefore we may make light of wronging our neighbour, for that is also a sin against God; but therefore we should make light of our neighbour's wronging us, and not aggravate it, or study revenge.

(2) How severe the demand was; He laid hands on him, and took him by the throat. What needed all this violence? The debt might have been demanded without taking the debtor by the throat. How lordly is this man's carriage, and yet how base and servile is his spirit! If he had been himself going to prison for his debt he might have had some pretence for going to this extremity in requiring his own; but frequently pride and malice prevail more to make men severe than the most urgent necessity would do.

(3) How submissive the debtor was; His fellow servant fell down at his feet, and humbled himself to him for this trifling debt, as much as he did to his lord for that great debt. The poor man's request is, Have patience with me; he honestly confesses the debt, only begs time. Forbearance, though it be no acquittance, is sometimes a piece of needful and laudable charity. As we must not be hard, so we must not be hasty, in our demands, but think how long God bears with us.

(4) How implacable and furious the creditor was (v. 30); He would not have patience with him, but without mercy cast him into prison. How insolently did he trample upon one as good as himself, that submitted to him!

(5) How much concerned the rest of the servants were; They were very sorry (v. 31). The sins and sufferings of our fellow-servants should be matter of grief and trouble to us. To see a fellow-servant, either raging like a bear or trampled on like a worm, cannot but occasion great regret to all that have any jealousy for the honour either of their nature or of their religion.

(6) How notice of it was brought to the master; They came, and told their lord. They durst not reprove their fellow-servant for it, he was so unreasonable and outrageous; but they went to their lord. Let our complaints both of the wickedness of the wicked and of the afflictions of the afflicted, be brought to God, and left with him.

3. The master's just resentment of the cruelty his servant was guilty of.

(1) How he reproved his servant's cruelty (v. 32, 33); O thou wicked servant. Note, Unmercifulness is wickedness, it is great wickedness. He upbraids him with the mercy he had found with his master; I forgave thee all that debt. Those that will use God's favours, shall never be upbraided with them, but those that abuse them, may expect it. The greatness of sin magnifies the riches of pardoning mercy: we should think how much has been forgiven us, Luke vii. 47. He thence shows him the obligation he was under to be merciful to his fellow-servant; Shouldst not thou also have had compassion on thy fellow-servant, even as I had pity on thee? It is justly expected, that such as have received mercy, should show mercy. He shows him, First, That he should have been more compassionate to the distress of his fellow servant, because he had himself experienced the same distress. What we have had the feeling of ourselves, we can the better have the fellow feeling of with our brethren. Secondly, That he should have been more conformable to the example of his master's tenderness. The comfortable sense of pardoning mercy tends much to the disposing of our hearts to forgive our brethren. We must have compassion on our brethren, as God has on us.

(2) How he revoked his pardon (v. 34); He delivered him to the tormentors, till he should pay all that was due unto him. Though the wickedness was very great, his lord laid upon him no other punishment than the payment of his own debt. See how the punishment answers the sin; he that would not forgive shall not be forgiven. Our debts to God are never compounded; either all is forgiven or all is exacted; glorified Saints in heaven are pardoned all, through Christ's complete satisfaction.

Lastly, Here is the application of the whole parable (v. 35); So likewise shall my heavenly Father do also unto you. If God's governing be fatherly, it follows thence, that it is righteous, but it does not therefore follow that it is not rigorous. When we pray to God as our Father in heaven, we are taught to ask for the forgiveness of sins, as we forgive our debtors. We must from our hearts forgive. We do not forgive our offending brother aright, nor acceptably, if we do not forgive from the heart; for that is it that God looks at. No malice must be harboured there, nor ill will to any person. Yet this is not enough; we must from the heart desire and seek the welfare even of those that have offended us. The danger of not forgiving; So shall your heavenly Father do. This is not intended to teach us that God reverses his pardons to any, but that he denies them to those that are unqualified for them. Intimations enough we have in scripture of the forfeiture of pardons, for caution to the presumptuous; and yet we have security enough of the continuance of them, for comfort to those that are sincere, but timorous; that the one may fear, and the other may hope. Those that do not forgive their brother's trespasses, did never truly repent of their own, and therefore that which is taken away is only what they seemed to have. This is intended to teach us, that they shall have judgment without mercy, that have showed no mercy, James ii. 13. It is indispensably necessary to pardon and peace, that we not only do justly, but love mercy.

CHAP. XIX

I. Christ changing his quarters, ver. 1, 2. II. His dispute with the Pharisees about divorce, and his discourse with his disciples upon occasion of it, ver. 3–12. III. The kind entertainment he gave to some little children which were brought to him, ver. 13–15. IV. An account of what passed between Christ and a hopeful young gentleman that applied himself to him, ver. 16–22. V. His discourse with his disciples upon that occasion, ver. 23–30.

Verses 1, 2

1. He left Galilee. There he had been brought up, and had spent the greatest part of his life in that remote despicable part of the country. In this, as in other things, he appeared in a mean state, that he would go under the character of a Galilean, a north-countryman, the least polite and refined part of the nation. Now, having finished these sayings, he departed from Galilee, and it was his final farewell; for he never came to Galilee again till after his resurrection.

2. He came into the coasts of Judæa, beyond Jordan, that they might have their day of visitation as well as Galilee, for they also belonged to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.

3. Great multitudes followed him. When Christ departs, it is best for us to follow him. He went about doing good; for so it follows, he healed them there. This shows what they followed him for, to have their sick healed; and they found him as able and ready to help here, as he had been in Galilee.

Verses 3–12

We have here the law of Christ in the case of divorce, occasioned, as some other declarations of his will, by a dispute with the Pharisees.

I. The case proposed by the Pharisees (v. 3); Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife? This they asked, tempting him, not desiring to be taught by him. If he would declare himself now against divorce, they would make use of it for the prejudicing and incensing of the people of this country against him, who would look with a jealous eye upon one that attempted to cut them short in a liberty they were fond of. If he should say that divorces were not lawful, they would reflect upon him as an enemy to the law of Moses, which allowed them; if he should say that they were, they would represent his doctrine as not having that perfection in it which was expected in the doctrine of the Messiah, since though divorces were tolerated, they were looked upon by the stricter sort of people as not of good report.

Their question is, Whether a man may put away his wife for every cause. That it might be done for some cause, even for that of fornication, was granted; but may it be done, as now it commonly was done, by the looser sort of people, for any cause that a man shall think fit to assign, though ever so frivolous?

II. Christ's answer to this question; though it was proposed to tempt him, was a full one, not a direct one, but an effectual one. Now his argument is this: "If husband and wife are by the will and appointment of God joined together in the strictest and closest union, then they are not to be lightly, and upon every occasion, separated." He urges three things.

1. The creation of Adam and Eve, concerning which he appeals to their own knowledge of the scriptures; Have ye not read? Ye have read (but have not considered) that he which made them at the beginning, made them male and female, Gen. i. 27; v. 2. He made them male and female, one female for one male; so that Adam could not divorce his wife, and take another, for there was no other to take. It likewise intimated an inseparable union between them; Eve was a rib out of Adam's side, so that he could not put her away, but he must put away a piece of himself.

2. The fundamental law of marriage, which is, that a man shall leave father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife, v. 5. The relation between husband and wife is nearer than that between parents and children; now, if the filial relation may not easily be violated, much less may the marriage union be broken. May a child desert his parents, or may a parent abandon his children, for any cause, for every cause? No, by no means.

3. The nature of the marriage contract; it is a union of persons; They twain shall be one flesh, so that (v. 6) they are no more twain, but one flesh. A man's children are pieces of himself, but his wife is himself. As the conjugal union is closer than that between parents and children, so it is in a manner equivalent to that between one member and another in the natural body.

From hence he infers, What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder. Husband and wife are of God's joining together; συνέζευξεν—he hath yoked them together, so the word is. God himself instituted the relation between husband and wife. Though marriage be not peculiar to the church, but common to the world, yet it ought to be managed after a godly sort, and sanctified by the word of God, and prayer. A conscientious regard to God in this ordinance would have a good influence upon the duty, and consequently upon the comfort, of the relation. Husband and wife, being joined together by the ordinance of God, are not to be put asunder by any ordinance of man.

III. An objection started by the Pharisees against this (v. 7); "Why did Moses command to give a writing of divorcement, in case a man did put away his wife?" He urged scripture reason against divorce; they allege scripture authority for it. The seeming contradictions that are in the word of God are great stumbling-blocks to men of corrupt minds.

IV. Christ's answer to this objection.

1. He rectifies their mistake concerning the law of Moses; they called it a command, Christ calls it but a permission, a toleration. Carnal hearts will take an ell if but an inch be given them.

But Christ tells them there was a reason for this toleration, not at all for their credit; It was because of the hardness of your hearts, that you were permitted to put away your wives. Moses complained of the people of Israel in his time, that their hearts were hardened, hardened against God; this is here meant of their being hardened against their relations. There is not a greater piece of hard-heartedness in the world than for a man to be harsh, and severe with his own wife. The Jews, it seems, were infamous for this, and therefore were allowed to put them away; better divorce them than do worse. A little compliance, to humour a madman, or a man in a frenzy, may prevent a greater mischief. The law of Moses considered the hardness of men's hearts, but the gospel of Christ cures it. By the law was the knowledge of sin, but by the gospel was the conquest of it.

2. He reduces them to the original institution; But from the beginning it was not so. Corruptions that are crept into any ordinance of God must be purged out by having recourse to the primitive institution. If the copy be vicious, it must be examined and corrected by the original.

3. He settles the point by an express law; I say unto you (v. 9); and it agrees with what he said before (ch. v. 32). Now, in both these places he allows divorce, in case of adultery; the reason of the law against divorce being this, They two shall be one flesh. If the wife play the harlot, and make herself one flesh with an adulterer, the reason of the law ceases, and so does the law. He disallows it in all other cases; Whosoever puts away his wife, except for fornication, and marries another, commits adultery. This is a direct answer to their query, that it is not lawful. There will be no occasion for divorces, if we forbear one another, and forgive one another, in love, as those that are, and hope to be, forgiven. No need of divorces, if husbands love their wives, and wives be obedient to their husbands, and they live together as heirs of the grace of life.

V. Here is a suggestion of the disciples against this law of Christ (v. 10); If the case of the man be so with his wife, it is better not to marry. It seems, the disciples themselves were loth to give up the liberty of divorce, thinking it a good expedient for preserving comfort in the married state. Unless they may have a liberty of divorce, they think it is good for a man not to marry. Corrupt nature is impatient of restraint. It is a foolish, peevish thing for men to abandon the comforts of this life, because of the crosses that are commonly woven in with them. No, whatever our condition is, we must bring our minds to it, be thankful for its comforts, submissive to its crosses, and make the best of that which is. If the yoke of marriage may not be thrown off at pleasure, it does not follow that therefore we must not come under it; but therefore, when we do come under it, we must resolve to comport with it, by love, and meekness, and patience, which will make divorce the most unnecessary undesirable thing that can be.

VI. Christ's answer to this suggestion (v. 11, 12). He allows it good for some not to marry; He that is able to receive it, let him receive it. Christ allowed what the disciples said, It is good not to marry, as giving them a rule that they who have the gift of continence do best if they continue single. The increase of grace is better than the increase of the family, and fellowship with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ is to be preferred before any other fellowship. He disallows it, as utterly mischievous, to forbid marriage, because all men cannot receive this saying.

Christ here speaks of a twofold unaptness to marriage.

1. That which is a calamity by the providence of God; such as those labour under who are born eunuchs, or made so by men.

2. That which is a virtue by the grace of God; such is theirs who have made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. This is meant of an unaptness for marriage, not in body but in mind. Those have thus made themselves eunuchs who have attained a holy indifference to all the delights of the married state, have a fixed resolution, in the strength of God's grace, wholly to abstain from them. These are they that can receive this saying. This affection to the single state must be given of God; for none can receive it, save they to whom it is given. Continence is a special gift of God to some, and not to others. The single state must be chosen for the kingdom of heaven's sake. When it is for religion's sake, then it is approved and accepted of God. That condition is best for us, and to be chosen and stuck to accordingly, which is best for our souls, and tends most to the preparing of us for, and the preserving of us to, the kingdom of heaven.

Verses 13–15

I. The faith of those that brought them. The account here given of it, is, that there were brought unto him little children, that he should put his hands on them, and pray, v. 13. They testified their respect to Christ, and the value they had for his favour and blessing. They did a kindness to their children. Others brought their children to Christ, to be healed when they were sick; but these children were under no present malady, only they desired a blessing for them. It is a good thing when we come to Christ ourselves, and bring our children to him, before we are driven to him (as we say) by woe-need.

They desired that he would put his hands on them, and pray. Imposition of hands was a ceremony used especially in paternal blessings. It intimates something of love and familiarity mixed with power and authority and bespeaks an efficacy in the blessing. We cannot do better for our children than to commit them to the Lord Jesus, to be wrought upon, and prayed for, by him. We can but beg a blessing for them, it is Christ only that can command the blessing.

II. The fault of the disciples in rebuking them. They discountenanced the address as vain and frivolous, and reproved them that made it as impertinent and troublesome. It is well for us, that Christ has more love and tenderness in him than the best of his disciples have. And let us learn of him not to discountenance any willing well-meaning souls in their enquiries after Christ, though they are but weak. If he do not break the bruised reed, we should not.

III. The favour of our Lord Jesus.

1. He rebuked the disciples (v. 14); Suffer little children, and forbid them not; and he rectifies the mistake they went upon, Of such is the kingdom of heaven. The children of believing parents belong to the kingdom of heaven, and are members of the visible church. For this reason they are welcome to Christ, who is ready to entertain those who, when they cannot come themselves, are brought to him. And this, (1) In respect to the little children themselves, whom he had upon all occasions expressed a concern for. (2) With an eye to the faith of the parents who brought them. Parents are trustees of their children's wills. Therefore Christ accepts their dedication of them as their act and deed. (3) Therefore he takes it ill of those who forbid them, and exclude those whom he has received.

2. He received the little children, and did as he was desired; he laid his hands on them, that is, he blessed them. The strongest believer lives not so much by apprehending Christ as by being apprehended of him (Phil. iii. 12), and this the least child is capable of. If they cannot stretch out their hands to Christ, yet he can lay his hands on them, and so make them his own, and own them for his own.

Verses 16–22

Here is an account of what passed between Christ and a hopeful young gentleman; he is said to be a young man (v. 20); and I called him a gentleman, not only because he had great possessions, but because he was a ruler (Luke xviii. 18).

Now concerning this young gentleman, we are told how fair he bid for heaven and came short.

I. How fair he bid for heaven, and how kindly and tenderly Christ treated him.

1. The gentleman's serious address to Jesus Christ (v. 16); Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? Not a better question could be asked, nor more gravely.

(1) He gives Christ an honourable title, Good Master. It signifies not a ruling, but a teaching Master. His calling him Master, bespeaks his submissiveness, and willingness to be taught; and good Master, his affection and peculiar respect to the Teacher. It is a good thing when men's quality and dignity increase their civility and courtesy. It was gentleman-like to give this title of respect to Christ. It was not usual among the Jews to accost their teachers with the title of good; and therefore this bespeaks the uncommon respect he had for Christ.

(2) He comes to him upon an errand of importance (none could be more so), and he came not to tempt him, but sincerely desiring to be taught by him. His question is, What good thing shall I do, that I may have eternal life? He was convinced that there is a happiness prepared for those in the other world, who are prepared for it in this world. It was a rare thing for one of his age and quality to appear so much in care about another world. The rich are apt to think it below them to make such an enquiry as this; and young people think it time enough yet; but here was a young man, and a rich man, solicitous about his soul and eternity. He was sensible something must be done, some good thing, for the attainment of this happiness. We must be doing, and doing that which is good. The blood of Christ is the only purchase of eternal life (he merited it for us), but obedience to Christ is the appointed way to it, Heb. v. 9. Those that know what it is to have eternal life, and what it is to come short of it, will be glad to accept of it upon any terms. Such a holy violence does the kingdom of heaven suffer. Our great enquiry should be, What shall we do, that we may have eternal life? For this world has not that in it that will make us happy.

2. The encouragement that Jesus Christ gave to this address. It is not his manner to send any away without an answer, that come to him on such an errand, for nothing pleases him more, v. 17.

(1) He tenderly assists his faith; for, doubtless, he did not mean it for a reproof, when he said, Why callest thou me good? He intended no more than to own and honour him as a good man, but Christ would lead him to own and honour him as a good God; for there is none good but one, that is God. As Christ is graciously ready to make the best that he can of what is said or done amiss; so he is ready to make the most that can be of what is well said and well done. His constructions are often better than our intentions. All crowns must lie before his throne. God only is good. We in our language call him God, because he is good.

(2) He plainly directs his practice. Now Christ's answer is, in short, this, If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. The end proposed is, entering into life. The young man, in his question, spoke of eternal life. Christ, in his answer, speaks of life; to teach us, that eternal life is the only true life. He desired to know how he might have eternal life; Christ tells him how he might enter into it. The way of entering into it, is, by obedience, and Christ directs us in that. Christ, who is our Life, is the Way to the Father. He is the only Way, but duty, and the obedience of faith, are the way to Christ. The way prescribed is, keeping the commandments. Keeping the commandments of God, according as they are revealed and made known to us, is the only way to life and salvation. Keeping the commandments includes faith in Jesus Christ, for that is the great commandment (1 John iii. 23). It is not enough for us to know the commandments of God, but we must keep them, keep in them as our way, keep to them as our rule. At his further instance and request, he mentions some particular commandments which he must keep (v. 18, 19); The young man saith unto him, Which?

In answer to this, Christ specifies several, especially the commandments of the second table. First, That which concerns our own and our neighbour's life; Thou shalt do no murder. Secondly, Our own and our neighbour's chastity, Thou shalt not commit adultery. Thirdly, Our own and our neighbour's wealth and outward estate, Thou shalt not steal. Fourthly, That which concerns truth, and our own and our neighbour's good name; Thou shalt not bear false witness. Fifthly, That which concerns the duties of particular relations; Honour thy father and mother. Sixthly, That comprehensive law of love in which they are all fulfilled, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself (Gal. v. 14; Rom. xiii. 9), that royal law, James ii. 8.

Our Saviour here specifies second-table duties only; not as if the first were of less account, but, 1. Because they that now sat in Moses's seat, either wholly neglected, or greatly corrupted, these precepts in their preaching. While they pressed the tithing of mint, anise, and cummin—judgment, and mercy, and faith—the summary of second-table duties, were overlooked, ch. xxiii. 23. Their preaching ran out all in rituals and nothing in morals. 2. Because he would teach him, and us all, that moral honesty is a necessary branch of true Christianity. Though a mere moral man comes short of being a complete Christian, yet an immoral man is certainly no true Christian. Nay, though first-table duties have in them more of the essence of religion, yet second-table duties have in them more of the evidence of it. Our light burns in love to God, but it shines in love to our neighbour.

II. See here how he came short and wherein he failed.

1. By pride, and a vain conceit of his own merit and strength. When Christ told him what commandments he must keep, he answered very scornfully, All these things have I kept from my youth up, v. 20. Christ knew it, for he did not contradict him; nay, it is said in Mark, He loved him; and so far he was very good and pleasing to Christ. His observance of these commands was universal; All these have I kept: it was early and constant; from my youth up. A man may be free from gross sin, and yet come short of grace and glory.

It was commendable also, that he desired to know further what his duty was; What lack I yet? He was convinced that he wanted something to fill up his works before God, and was therefore desirous to know it, because, if he was not mistaken in himself, he was willing to do it. Having not yet attained, he thus seemed to press forward. And he applied himself to Christ. Who could bid fairer? Even in this that he said, he discovered his ignorance and folly. Had he been acquainted with the extent and spiritual meaning of the law, instead of saying, All these have I kept; what lack I yet? he would have said, with shame and sorrow, "All these have I broken, what shall I do to get my sins pardoned?" Take it how you will, what he said savoured of pride and vain-glory, and had in it too much of that boasting which is excluded by the law of faith (Rom. iii. 27). That word, What lack I yet? perhaps was not so much a desire of further instruction as a demand of the praise of his present fancied perfection.

2. He came short by an inordinate love of the world, and his enjoyments in it. This was the fatal rock on which he split. Observe,

(1) How he was tried in this matter (v. 21); Jesus said unto him, If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell that thou hast. Christ waived the matter of his boasted obedience to the law, and let that drop, because this would be a more effectual way of discovering him than a dispute of the extent of the law. What Christ said to him, he thus far said to us all, that, if we would approve ourselves Christians indeed, and would be found at last the heirs of eternal life, we must do these two things:

[1] We must practically prefer the heavenly treasures before all the wealth and riches in this world. Now, as an evidence of this, First, We must dispose of what we have in this world, for the honour of God, and in his service: "Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor. Sell what thou canst spare for pious uses, all thy superfluities; if thou canst not otherwise do good with it, sell it. Sit loose to it, be willing to part with it for the honour of God, and the relief of the poor." In those that have wherewithal, giving of alms is as necessary an evidence of that contempt of the world, and compassion to our brethren. When we embrace Christ, we must let go the world, for we cannot serve God and mammon. Christ knew that covetousness was the sin that did most easily beset this young man, that, though what he had he had got honestly, yet he could not cheerfully part with it, and by this he discovered his insincerity. Secondly, We must depend upon what we hope for in the other world as an abundant recompence for all we have left, or lost, or laid out, for God in this world; Thou shalt have treasure in heaven. Trust God for a happiness out of sight, which will make us rich amends for all our expenses in God's service. Christ immediately annexes this assurance of a treasure in heaven. Christ's promises make his precepts easy, and his yoke not only tolerable, but pleasant, and sweet, and very comfortable.

[2] We must devote ourselves entirely to the conduct and government of our Lord Jesus; Come, and follow me. It seems here to be meant of a close and constant attendance upon his person, but of us it is required that we follow Christ, strictly conform to his pattern, and keep his laws, and all this from a principle of love to him, and dependence on him, and with a holy contempt of everything else in comparison of him. This is to follow Christ fully. To sell all, and give to the poor, will not serve, unless we come, and follow Christ. If I give all my goods to feed the poor, and have not love, it profits me nothing.

(2) See how he was discovered. This touched him in a tender part (v. 22); When he heard that saying, he went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions. He was a rich man, and loved his riches, and therefore went away. Those who have much in the world are in the greatest temptation to love it. Such is the bewitching nature of worldly wealth, that those who want it least desire it most. The reigning love of this world keeps many from Christ, who seem to have some good desires toward him. A great estate, as to those who are got above it, is a great furtherance, so to those who are entangled in the love of it, it is a great hindrance, in the way of heaven.

Yet something of honesty there was in it. He went away, and would not pretend to that, which he could not find in his heart to come up to the strictness of. Since he could not be a complete Christian, he would not be a hypocrite. Yet he was a thinking man, and well-inclined, and therefore went away sorrowful. He had a leaning toward Christ, and was loth to part with him. Many a one is ruined by the sin he commits with reluctance; leaves Christ sorrowfully, and yet is never truly sorry for leaving him, for, if he were, he would return to him.

Verses 23–30

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples upon occasion of the rich man's breaking with Christ.

I. Christ took occasion from thence to show the difficulty of the salvation of rich people, v. 23–26.

1. That it is a very hard thing for a rich man to get to heaven. From the harms and falls of others it is good for us to infer that which will be of caution to us. This is vehemently asserted by our Saviour, v. 23, 24. He said this to his disciples, who were poor. The less they had of worldly wealth, the less hindrance they had in the way to heaven. This saying is ratified, v. 23. Verily I say unto you. It is repeated, v. 24. Again I say unto you. Thus he speaks once, yea, twice, that which man is loth to perceive and more loth to believe. He saith that it is a hard thing for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven, either here or hereafter. The way to heaven is to all a narrow way, and the gate that leads into it, a strait gate, but it is particularly so to rich people. Rich people have great temptations to resist, and such as are very insinuating; it is hard not to be charmed with a smiling world. It must be a great measure of divine grace that will enable a man to break through these difficulties. He saith that the conversion and salvation of a rich man is so extremely difficult, that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, v. 24. Nothing less than the almighty grace of God will enable a rich man to get over this difficulty. It is very rare for a man to be rich, and not to set his heart upon his riches; and it is utterly impossible for a man that sets his heart upon his riches, to get to heaven. The way to heaven is very fitly compared to a needle's eye, which is hard to hit and hard to get through. A rich man is fitly compared to a camel, a beast of burthen, for he has riches, as a camel has his load. This truth is very much wondered at, and scarcely credited by the disciples (v. 25); They were exceedingly amazed, saying, Who then can be saved? Many surprising truths Christ told them, which they were astonished at, and knew not what to make of. It was not on contradiction to Christ, but for awakening to themselves, that they said, Who then can be saved? When we think how good God is, it may seem a wonder that so few are his; but when we think how bad man is, it is a more wonder that so many are. Who then can be saved? Since so many are rich, and have great possessions, and so many more would be rich, and are well affected, to great possessions; who can be saved? This is a good reason why rich people should strive against the stream.

2. That, though it be hard, yet it is not impossible for the rich to be saved (v. 26); Jesus beheld them, turned and looked wistfully upon his disciples, and he said unto them, with men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible. This is a great truth in general. Nothing is too hard for God. When men are at a loss, God is not; but this truth is here applied, (1) To the salvation of any. Who can be saved? say the disciples. None, saith Christ, by any created power. With men this is impossible. It is a creation, it is a resurrection, and with men this is impossible; but with God all things are possible. (2) To the salvation of rich people especially; it is impossible with men that such should be saved, but with God even this is possible. The sanctification and salvation of such as are surrounded with the temptations of this world are not to be despaired of; it is possible. In this word of Christ there is an intimation of mercy Christ had yet in store for this young gentleman, who was now gone away sorrowful; it was not impossible to God yet to recover him.

II. Peter took occasion from hence to enquire what they should get by it, who had left all to follow him, v. 27, &c.

1. We have their expectations from Christ; Behold, we have forsaken all, and have followed thee; what shall we have therefore? Peter desires to know,

(1) Whether they had sufficiently come up to those terms: they had not sold all (for they had many of them wives and families to provide for), but they had forsaken all. When we hear what are the characters of those that shall be saved, it concerns us to enquire whether we, through grace, answer those characters.

Lord, saith Peter, we have forsaken all. Alas! it was but a poor all that they had forsaken; and yet observe how Peter there speaks of it, as if it had been some mighty thing; Behold, we have forsaken all. We are too apt to make the most of our services and sufferings, our expenses and losses, for Christ, and to think we have made him much our debtor. However, Christ does not upbraid them with this. It was their all, like the widow's two mites, and was as dear to them as if it had been more, and therefore Christ took it kindly that they left it to follow him.

(2) Whether therefore they might expect that treasure which the young man shall have if he will sell all. All people are for what they can get; and Christ's followers are allowed to consult their own true interest, and to ask, What shall we have? Christ encourages us to ask what we shall gain by leaving all to follow him; that we may see he doth not call us to our prejudice, but unspeakably to our advantage. It is of a hoping, trusting faith, to ask, "What shall we have?" The disciples had never till now asked, What shall we have? They were so well assured of his goodness, that they knew they should not lose by him at last, and therefore minded their work, and asked not what should be their wages. It honours Christ, to trust him and serve him, and not to bargain with him.

2. We have here Christ's promises to them, and to all others that tread in the steps of their faith and obedience.

(1) To his immediate followers, v. 28. To them he promises not only treasure, but honour. Ye which have followed me in the regeneration shall sit upon twelve thrones. Observe, The preamble to the patent, or the consideration of the grant, which, as usual, is a recital of their services; "You have followed me in the regeneration, and therefore this will I do for you." The disciples had followed Christ when the gospel temple was but in the framing. Now they followed Christ with constant fatigue, when few did; and therefore on them he will put particular marks of honour. Christ hath special favour for those who begin early with him, who trust him further than they can see him. Peter spoke of their forsaking all, to follow him, Christ only speaks of their following him, which was the main matter. The date of their honour, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory. All that partake of the regeneration in grace shall partake of the regeneration in glory.

Now their honour being adjourned till the Son of man's sitting in the throne of his glory, intimates, First, That they must stay for their advancement till then. As long as our Master's glory is delayed, it is fit that ours should be so too. We must live, and work, and suffer, in faith, and hope, and patience. Secondly, That they must share with Christ in his advancement. They having suffered with a suffering Jesus, must reign with a reigning Jesus. The longest voyages make the richest returns. The honour itself hereby granted; Ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.

The general intendment of this promise is, to show the glory and dignity reserved for the saints in heaven, which will be abundant recompence for the disgrace they suffered here in Christ's cause. There are higher degrees of glory for those that have done and suffered most. Here bonds, and afflictions, and deaths, did abide them, but there they shall sit on thrones of glory. And will not this be recompence enough to make up all their losses and expenses for Christ? The ratification of this grant; it is firm, it is inviolably immutably sure; for Christ hath said, "Verily I say unto you."

(2) Here is a promise to all others that should in like manner leave all to follow Christ. This honour have all his saints. Christ will take care they shall none of them lose by him (v. 29). Losses for Christ are here supposed. Christ had told them that his disciples must deny themselves. Now here he specifies particulars; for it is good to count upon the worst. If they have not forsaken all, yet they have forsaken a great deal, houses suppose, or dear relations, that would not go with them, to follow Christ; these are particularly mentioned, as hardest for a tender gracious spirit to part with; brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children; and lands are added in the close, the profits of which were the support of the family.

The loss of these things is supposed to be for Christ's name's sake; else he doth not oblige himself to make it up. Many forsake brethren, and wife, and children, in humour and passion; that is a sinful desertion. But if we forsake them for Christ's sake, because we must either quit them, or quit our interest in Christ; if we do not quit our concern for them, or our duty to them, but our comfort in them, and will do it rather than deny Christ, this is that which shall be thus recompenced. It is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes both the martyr and the confessor.

It is supposed to be a great loss; and yet Christ undertakes to make it up. A recompence of these losses is here secured. Thousands have dealt with Christ, and have trusted him far; but never anyone lost by him, never anyone but was an unspeakable gainer by him.

A hundred-fold in this life; sometimes in kind, in the things themselves which they have parted with. God will raise up for his suffering servants more friends, that will be so to them for Christ's sake, than they have left that were so for their own sakes. The apostles, wherever they came, met with those that were kind to them, and entertained them, and opened their hearts and doors to them. However, they shall receive a hundred-fold, in kindness. Their graces shall increase, their comforts abound, they shall have tokens of God's love, and then they may truly say they have received a hundred times more comfort in God and Christ than they could have in wife, or children.

Eternal life at last. The former is reward enough, if there were no more. But this comes in over and above, as it were, into the bargain. Now, if we could but mix faith with the promise, and trust Christ for the performance of it, surely we should think nothing too much to do, nothing too hard to suffer, nothing too dear to part with, for him. Many that are first, shall be last, and the last, first, v. 30. God will cross his hands. The heavenly inheritance is not given as earthly inheritances commonly are, by seniority of age, and priority of birth, but according to God's pleasure. This is the text of another sermon, which we shall meet with in the next chapter.

CHAP. XX

I. The parable of the labourers in the vineyard, ver. 1–16. II. A prediction of Christ's approaching sufferings, ver. 17–19. III. The petition of two of the disciples, by their mother, reproved, ver. 20–28. IV. The petition of the two blind men granted, ver. 29–34.

Verses 1–16

This parable of the labourers in the vineyard is intended,

I. To represent to us the kingdom of heaven (v. 1). The laws of that kingdom are not wrapt up in parables, but plainly set down, as in the sermon upon the mount. The notions of it are more necessary to be illustrated than the duties of it; which is that which parables are designed for.

II. In particular, to represent to us that concerning the kingdom of heaven, which he had said in the close of the foregoing chapter, that many that are first shall be last, and the last, first.

The parable shows us, 1. That God is debtor to no man; a great truth. 2. That many who begin last, and promise little in religion, sometimes, by the blessing of God, arrive at greater attainments in knowledge, grace, and usefulness, than others whose entrance was more early, and who promised fairer. John is swifter of foot, and comes first to the sepulchre: but Peter has more courage, and goes first into it. Thus many that are last, shall be first. Some make it a caution to the disciples. Let them look to it, that they keep up their zeal; else their good beginnings will avail them little; they that seemed to be first, would be last. Sometimes those that are converted later in their lives, outstrip those that are converted earlier. 3. That the recompence of reward will be given to the saints, not according to the time of their conversion; not according to the seniority, but according to the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. Sufferers for Christ in the latter days, shall have the same reward with the martyrs and confessors of the primitive times, though they are more celebrated; and faithful ministers now, the same with the first fathers.

We have two things in the parable; the agreement with the labourers, and the account with them.

(1) Here is the agreement made with the labourers (v. 1–7); and here it will be asked, as usual, Who hires them? A man that is a householder. God is the great Householder; as a householder, he has work that he will have to be done, and servants that he will have to be doing. God hires labourers in kindness to them, to save them from idleness and poverty, and pay them for working for themselves. Whence are they hired? Out of the market-place, where, till they are hired into God's service, they stand idle (v. 3), all the day idle (v. 6). The soul of man stands ready to be hired into some service or other; it was (as all the creatures were) created to work, and is either a servant to iniquity, or a servant to righteousness. The devil, by his temptations, is hiring labourers into his field, to feed swine. God, by his gospel, is hiring labourers into his vineyard, to dress it, and keep it, paradise-work. We are put to our choice. Till we are hired into the service of God, we are standing all the day idle. The gospel call is given to those that stand idle in the market-place. The market-place is a place of concourse; it is a place of sport, there the children are playing (ch. xi. 16); it is a place of business, of noise and hurry. "Come, come from this market-place." What are they hired to do? To labour in his vineyard. The church is God's vineyard; it is of his planting, watering, and fencing. We are all called upon to be labourers in this vineyard. We have each of us our own vineyard to keep, our own soul; and it is God's, and to be kept and dressed for him. In this work we must not be slothful, not loiterers, but labourers, working. Work for God will not admit of trifling. A man may go idle to hell; but he that will go to heaven, must be busy. What shall be their wages? He promises, First, A penny, v. 2. A day's wages for a day's work, and the wages sufficient for a day's maintenance. This doth not prove that the reward of our obedience to God is of works, or of debt. It is to signify that there is a reward set before us, and a sufficient one. Secondly, Whatsoever is right, v. 4–7. God will be sure not to be behind-hand with any for the service they do him: never any lost by working for God. For what term are they hired? For a day. It is but a day's work that is here done. The time of life is the day. It is a short time; the reward is for eternity, the work is but for a day. This should quicken us to expedition and diligence in our work, that we have but a little time to work in. It should also encourage us in reference to the hardships and difficulties of our work, that it is but for a day; the approaching shadow will bring with it both rest, and the reward of our work. Hold out, faith, and patience, yet a little while. Notice is taken of the several hours of the day, at which the labourers were hired.

This may be, and commonly is, applied to the several ages of life, in which souls are converted to Christ. The effectual call is particular, and it is then effectual when we come to the call.

First, Some are effectually called, and begin to work in the vineyard when they are very young; are sent in early in the morning. Those that have such a journey to go, had need set out betimes, the sooner the better.

Secondly, Others are savingly wrought upon in middle age; Go work in the vineyard, at the third, sixth, or ninth hour. The power of divine grace is magnified in the conversion of some, when they are in the midst of their pleasures and worldly pursuits, as Paul. God has work for all ages; no time amiss to turn to God. The time past of our life may suffice that we have served sin; Go ye also into the vineyard. God turns away none that are willing to be hired.

Thirdly, Others are hired into the vineyard in old age, at the eleventh hour, when the day of life is far spent, and there is but one hour of the twelve remaining. "While there is life, there is hope." There is hope for old sinners; true repentance is never too late. There is hope of old sinners, that they may be brought to true repentance; nothing is too hard for Almighty grace to do, it can set those to work, who have contracted a habit of idleness. Nicodemus may be born again when he is old.

Yet let none, upon this presumption, put off their repentance till they are old. These were sent into the vineyard, it is true, at the eleventh hour; but nobody had hired them, or offered to hire them, before.

(2) Here is the account with the labourers. When the account was taken; when the evening was come, then, as usual, the day-labourers were called and paid. Evening time is the reckoning time. Faithful labourers shall receive their reward when they die; it is deferred till then, that they may wait with patience for it. Ministers call them into the vineyard, to do their work; death calls them out of the vineyard, to receive their penny: and those to whom the call into the vineyard is effectual, the call out of it will be joyful. They did not come for their pay till they were called; we must with patience wait God's time for our rest and recompence; go by our master's clock. What the account was; and in that observe, The general pay (v. 9, 10); They received every man a penny. Though there be degrees of glory in heaven, yet it will be to all a complete happiness. In heaven, every vessel will be full, brimful, though every vessel is not alike large and capacious.

The giving of a whole day's wages to those that had not done the tenth part of a day's work, is designed to show that God distributes his rewards by grace and sovereignty, and not of debt. Because we are under grace, and not under the law, even such defective services, done in sincerity, shall not only be accepted, but by free grace richly rewarded. Note the particular pleading with those that were offended with this distribution in gavelkind.

1. The offence taken (v. 11, 12); They murmured at the good man of the house; not that there is, or can be, any discontent or murmuring in heaven, but there may be, and often are, discontent and murmuring concerning heaven and heavenly things, while they are in prospect and promise in this world. These labourers quarrelled with their master, and found fault, not because they had not enough, so much as because others were made equal with them. They boast of their good services; We have borne the burthen and heat of the day. Now these last have worked but one hour, and that too in the cool of the day; and yet thou hast made them equal with us. There is a great proneness in us to think that we have too little, and others too much, of the tokens of God's favour. Very apt we all are to undervalue the deserts of others, and to overvalue our own. Perhaps, Christ here gives an intimation to Peter, not to boast too much, as if, because he and the rest of them had borne the burthen and heat of the day thus, they must have a heaven by themselves. It is hard for those that do or suffer more than ordinary for God, not to be elevated too much with the thought of it.

2. The offence removed. Three things the master of the house urges.

(1) That the complainant had no reason at all to say he had any wrong done to him, v. 13, 14. Friend, I do thee no wrong. He calls him friend, for in reasoning with others we should use soft words and hard arguments. It is incontestably true, that God can do no wrong. Whatever God does to us, or withholds from us, he does us no wrong. If God gives that grace to others, which he denies to us, it is kindness to them, but no injustice to us; and bounty to another, while it is no injustice to us, we ought not to find fault with.

To convince the murmurer that he did no wrong, he refers him to the bargain: "Didst not thou agree with me for a penny? Thou shalt have that we agreed for." It is good for us often to consider what it was that we agreed with God for. Worldlings agree with God for their penny in this world; they chose their portion in this life (Ps. xvii. 14). Believers agree with God for their penny in the other world, and they must remember that they have so agreed.

He therefore ties him to his bargain (v. 14); Take that thine is, and go thy way. If we understand it of that which is ours by gift, the free gift of God, it teaches us to be content with such things as we have. If God be better in any respect to others than to us, yet we have no reason to complain while he is so much better to us than we deserve. He tells him that those he envied should fare as well as he did; "I will give unto this last, even as unto thee."

(2) He had no reason to quarrel with the master; for what he gave was absolutely his own, v. 15. As before he asserted his justice, so here his sovereignty; Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own? He may therefore give or withhold his blessings, as he pleases. What God has, is his own; and this will justify him, in all the disposals of his providence; when God takes from us that which was dear to us we must silence our discontents with this; May he not do what he will with his own? Absutlit, sed et dedit. —He hath taken away; but he originally gave. We are in his hand, as clay in the hands of a potter; and it is not for us to prescribe to him, or strive with him.

(3) He had no reason to be angry that he came into the vineyard no sooner; for he was not sooner called; he had no reason to be angry that the master had given him wages for the whole day. Is thine eye evil, because I am good? The nature of envy; It is an evil eye. The eye is often both the inlet and the outlet of this sin. It is an evil eye, which is displeased at the good of others, and desires their hurt, and see the aggravation of it; "It is because I am good." Envy is unlikeness to God, who is good, and doeth good, and delighteth in doing good. It is a direct violation of both the two great commandments at once; both that of love to God, in whose will we should acquiesce, and love to our neighbour, in whose welfare we should rejoice.

Lastly, Here is the application of the parable (v. 16), in that observation which occasioned it (ch. xix. 30); So the first shall be last, and the last first. Christ, to obviate and silence their boasting, here tells them,

1. That they might possibly be outstripped by their successors in profession, and, might be found inferior to them in knowledge, grace, and holiness. Who knows but that the church, in its old age, may be more fat and flourishing than ever. What labourers may be sent into the vineyard in the eleventh hour, and what plentiful effusions of the Spirit may then be, above what has been yet, who can tell?

2. That they had reason to fear, lest they themselves should be found hypocrites at last; for many are called but few chosen. As to the outward call; many are called, and yet refuse (Prov. i. 24). There are but few chosen Christians, in comparison with the many that are only called Christians.

Verses 17–19

This is the third time that Christ gave his disciples notice of his approaching sufferings.

I. The privacy of this prediction; He took the twelve disciples apart in the way. His secret was with them, as his friends. It was a hard saying, and if any could bear it, they could. It was requisite that they should know of it, that, being fore-warned, they might be fore-armed. It was not fit to be spoken publicly as yet, because many that were cool toward him, would hereby have been driven to turn their backs upon him; because many that were hot for him, would hereby be driven to take up arms in his defence, and it might have occasioned an uproar among the people (ch. xxvi. 5). He never countenanced anything which had a tendency to prevent his sufferings.

II. The prediction itself, v. 18, 19.

1. It is but a repetition of what he had once and again said before, ch. xvi. 21; xvii. 22, 23. This intimates that he not only saw clearly what troubles lay before him, but that his heart was upon his suffering-work; it filled him, not with fear but with desire and expectation; he spoke thus frequently of his sufferings, because through them he was to enter into his glory.

2. He is more particular here in foretelling his sufferings than any time before. He had said (ch. xvi. 21), that he should suffer many things, and be killed; here he adds, that he shall be condemned, and delivered to the Gentiles, that they shall mock him, and scourge him, and crucify him. The more clearly he foresaw his sufferings, the more cheerfully he went forth to meet them. He foretells by whom he should suffer, by the chief priests and the scribes; so he had said before, but here he adds, They shall deliver him to the Gentiles. He was to suffer for the salvation both of Jews and Gentiles; both had a hand in his death, because he was to reconcile both by his cross, Eph. ii. 16.

3. Here, as before, he annexes the mention of his resurrection and his glory to that of his death and sufferings; The third day he shall rise again. He still brings this in to encourage himself in his sufferings, and to carry him cheerfully through them. He endured the cross for the joy set before him; he foresaw he should rise again, and rise quickly, the third day. The reward is not only sure, but very near. It was also to encourage his disciples, and comfort them, and to direct us, under all the sufferings of this present time to look at the things that are not seen, that are eternal, which will enable us to call the present afflictions light, and but for a moment.

Verses 20–28

Here is, first, the request of the two disciples to Christ, v. 20–23. The sons of Zebedee were James and John, two of the first three of Christ's disciples; Peter and they were his favourites; John was the disciple whom Jesus loved; yet none were so often reproved as they; whom Christ loves best he reproves most, Rev. iii. 19.

I. Here is the ambitious address they made to Christ, v. 20, 21. It was a great degree of faith, that they were confident of his kingdom, but a great degree of ignorance, that they still expected a temporal kingdom, with worldly pomp and power. In this they expected to be grandees. They ask not for employment in this kingdom, but for honour only. It is probable that the last word in Christ's foregoing discourse gave occasion to this request, that the third day he should rise again. What Christ said to comfort them, they thus abused. Some cannot bear comforts, but they turn them to a wrong purpose; as sweetmeats in a foul stomach produce bile. There was policy in the management of this address, that they put their mother on to present it, that it might be looked upon as her request, and not theirs. She was one of those women that attended Christ, and ministered to him; and they thought that he could deny her nothing, and therefore they made her their advocate. It was their mother's weakness thus to become the tool of their ambition. Those that are wise and good, would not be seen in an ill-favoured thing. In gracious requests, we should learn this wisdom, to desire the prayers of those that have an interest at the throne of grace; we should beg of our praying friends to pray for us, and reckon it a real kindness. There was pride at the bottom of it. Pride is a sin that most easily besets us, and which it is hard to get clear of. It is a holy ambition to strive to excel others in grace and holiness; but it is a sinful ambition to covet to exceed others in pomp and grandeur.

II. Christ's answer to this address (v. 22, 23), directed not to the mother, but to the sons that set her on. He reproved the ignorance and error of their petition; Ye know not what ye ask. They were much in the dark concerning the kingdom they had their eye upon. They knew not what it was to sit on his right hand, and on his left; they talked of it as blind men do of colours. Our apprehensions of that glory which is yet to be revealed, are like the apprehensions which a child has of the preferments of grown men. What it will be in the performance, eye has not seen, nor ear heard. They were much in the dark concerning the way to that kingdom. They know not what they ask, who ask for the end, but overlook the means. The disciples thought, when they had left what little all they had for Christ, all their service and sufferings were over, and it was now time to ask, What shall we have? They imagined their warfare was accomplished when it was scarcely begun, and they had yet but run with the footman. We know not what we ask, when we ask for the glory of wearing the crown, and ask not for grace to bear the cross in our way to it. See how he repressed the vanity and ambition of their request.

(1) He leads them to the thoughts of their sufferings, which they were not so mindful of as they ought to have been. Therefore he thinks it necessary to put them in mind of the hardships that were before them, that they might be no surprise or terror to them.

Observe, [1] How fairly he puts the matter to them. Are you able to drink of the cup that I shall drink of? Are you able to hold out to the end of it? Put the matter seriously to yourselves. They were not aware what was amiss in their spirits when they were lifted up with ambition. Christ sees that pride in us which we discern not in ourselves.

Note, That to suffer for Christ is to drink of a cup, and to be baptised with a baptism. It is supposed to be a bitter cup, those waters of a full cup, that are wrung out to God's people (Ps. lxxiii. 10). It is supposed to be a baptism, a washing with the waters of affliction; some are dipped in them; others have but a sprinkling of them; both are baptisms, some are overwhelmed in them, as in a deluge, others ill wet, as in a sharp shower. Even in this, consolation doth more abound. It is but a cup, bitter perhaps, but we shall see the bottom of it; it is a cup in the hand of a Father (John xviii. 11). It is but a baptism; if dipped, that is the worst of it, not drowned; perplexed, but not in despair. It is to drink of the same cup that Christ drank of, and to be baptised with the same baptism that he was baptised with. Christ is beforehand with us in suffering. 1. It bespeaks the condescension of a suffering Christ, that he would drink of such a cup (John xviii. 11); that he would be baptised with such a baptism. 2. It bespeaks the consolation of suffering Christians, that they do but pledge Christ in the bitter cup. It is good for us to be often putting it to ourselves, whether we are able to drink of this cup, and to be baptised with this baptism. We must expect suffering. Are we able to suffer cheerfully. What can we afford to part with for Christ? The truth is, Religion, if it be worth anything, is worth everything; but it is worth little, if it be not worth suffering for. Now let us sit down, and count the cost of dying for Christ rather than denying him, and ask, Can we take him upon these terms?

[2] See how boldly they engage for themselves; they said, We are able; but at the same time they fondly hoped that they should never be tried. As before they knew not what they asked, so now they knew not what they answered. But those are commonly most confident that are least acquainted with the cross.

[3] See how plainly and positively their sufferings are here foretold (v. 23); Ye shall drink of my cup. Sufferings foreseen will be the more easily borne. Christ will have us know the worst, that we may make the best of our way to heaven; Ye shall drink; that is, ye shall suffer.

(2) He leaves them in the dark about the degrees of their glory. To carry them cheerfully through their sufferings, it was enough to be assured that they should have a place in his kingdom. The lowest seat in heaven is an abundant recompence for the greatest sufferings on earth. "To sit on my right hand and on my left is not mine to give, and therefore it is not for you to ask it or to know it; but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father." It is not mine to give to those that seek and are ambitious of it, but to those that by great humility and self-denial are prepared for it.

III. Here are the reproof and instruction which Christ gave to the other ten disciples for their displeasure at the request of James and John.

1. The fret that the ten disciples were in (v. 24). They were moved with indignation against the two brethren; not because they were desirous to be preferred, but because they were desirous to be preferred before them. Many seem to have indignation at sin; but it is not because it is sin, but because it touches them. These disciples were angry at their brethren's ambition, though they themselves, nay because they themselves, were as ambitious. It is common for people to be angry at those sins in others which they allow of and indulge in themselves. Nothing makes more mischief among brethren, or is the cause of more indignation and contention, than ambition.

2. The check that Christ gave them. He had reproved this very sin before (ch. xviii. 3), and told them they must be humble as little children; yet they relapsed into it, and yet he reproved them for it thus mildly.

He called them unto him, which intimates great tenderness and familiarity. He did not, in anger, bid them get out of his presence, but called them, in love, to come into his presence.

(1) They must not be like the princes of the Gentiles. Christ's disciples must not be like Gentiles, no not like princes of the Gentiles.

Observe, What is the way of the princes of the Gentiles (v. 25); to exercise dominion and authority over their subjects. That which bears them up in it is, that they are great, and great men think they may do anything. What is the will of Christ in this matter. "It shall not be so among you. You are to teach the subjects of this kingdom, to take pains with them, and suffer with them; you are not to lord it over God's heritage (1 Pet. v. 3), but to labour in it." The pomp and grandeur of the princes of the Gentiles ill become Christ's disciples. How then shall it be among the disciples of Christ? Something of greatness among them Christ himself had intimated, and here he explains it; "He that will be great among you, that will be chief, let him be your minister, your servant," v. 26, 27. It is the duty of Christ's disciples to serve one another, for mutual edification. This includes both humility and usefulness. It is the dignity of Christ's disciples faithfully to discharge this duty. The way to be great and chief is to be humble and serviceable. Those are to be best accounted of, and most respected, that are most humble and self-denying, and lay out themselves most to do good. These honour God most, and those he will honour. As he must become a fool that would be wise, so he must become a servant that would be chief.

(2) They must be like the Master himself. The Son of man came not to be ministered to, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many, v. 28. Our Lord Jesus here sets himself before his disciples as a pattern of those two things before recommended, humility, and usefulness.

[1] Never was there such an example of humility and condescension as there was in the life of Christ, who came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. He was indeed ministered to as a poor man, but he was never ministered to as a great man. He once washed his disciples' feet, but we never read that they washed his feet. He came to minister help to all that were in distress; he made himself a servant to the sick and diseased; was as ready to their requests as ever any servant was at the beck of his master, and took as much pains to serve them.

[2] Never was there such an example of beneficence and usefulness as there was in the death of Christ, who gave his life a ransom for many. He lived as a servant, and went about doing good; but he died as a sacrifice, and in that he did the greatest good of all. He came into the world on purpose to give his life a ransom. He gives his honour and life too a ransom for his subjects. It was a ransom for many, sufficient for all, effectual for many; and, if for many, then, saith the poor doubting soul, "Why not for me?"

Now this is a good reason why we should not strive for precedency, because the cross is our banner, and our Master's death is our life. It is a good reason why we should study to do good. The nearer we are all concerned in, and the more we are advantaged by, the humility and humiliation of Christ, the more ready and careful we should be to imitate it.

Verses 29–34

I. Their address to Christ, v. 29, 30.

1. The circumstances of it are observable. It was as Christ and his disciples departed from Jericho; of that devoted place, which was rebuilt under a curse, Christ took his leave with this blessing. It was in the presence of a great multitude that followed him; Christ had a numerous attendance, and did good to them. This multitude that followed Christ was a mixed multitude. Some followed him for loaves, and some for love, some for curiosity, very few with desire to be taught their duty; yet, for the sake of those few, he confirmed his doctrine by miracles wrought in the presence of great multitudes. Two blind men concurred in their request; for joint-prayer is pleasing to Christ, ch. xviii. 19. Being companions in the same tribulation, they were partners in the same supplication. It is good for those that are labouring under the same calamity, or infirmity of body or mind, to join together in the same prayer to God for relief, that they may quicken one another's fervency, and encourage one another's faith. There is mercy enough in Christ for all the petitioners. These blind men were sitting by the way-side. It is good thus to way-lay Christ, to be in his road.

They heard that Jesus passed by. Though they were blind, they were not deaf. Seeing and hearing are the learning senses. These blind men had heard of Christ by the hearing of the ear, but they desired that their eyes might see him. When they heard that Jesus passed by, they asked no further questions, but immediately cried out. It is good to improve the present opportunity. These blind men did so, and did wisely; for we do not find that Christ ever came to Jericho again. Now is the accepted time.

2. The address itself is more observable; Have mercy on us, O Lord, thou Son of David, repeated again, v. 31. Four things are recommended to us for an example in this address.

(1) Here is an example of importunity in prayer. They cried out as men in earnest; men in want are earnest, of course. Cold desires do but beg denials. When they were discountenanced in it, they cried the more. The stream of fervency, if it be stopped, will rise and swell the higher. This is wrestling with God in prayer, and makes us the fitter to receive mercy; for the more it is striven for, the more it will be prized and thankfully acknowledged.

(2) Of humility in prayer; in that word, Have mercy on us, not specifying the favour, or prescribing what; "Only have mercy." They ask not for silver and gold, though they were poor, but mercy, mercy. This is that which our hearts must be upon.

(3) Of faith in prayer; in the title they gave to Christ, which was in the nature of a plea; O Lord, thou Son of David; they confess that Jesus Christ is Lord. Thus they take their encouragement in prayer from his power, as in calling him the Son of David they take encouragement from his goodness, as Messiah, of whom so many kind and tender things had been foretold. It is of excellent use, in prayer, to eye Christ in the grace and glory of his Messiahship; to remember that he is the Son of David, whose office it is to help, and save.

(4) Of perseverance in prayer, notwithstanding discouragement. The multitude rebuked them and bid them hold their peace. In following Christ with our prayers, we must expect to meet with hindrances and manifold discouragements. Such rebukes are permitted, that faith and fervency, patience and perseverance, may be tried. These poor blind men were rebuked by the multitude that followed Christ. But they would not be beaten off so; when they were in pursuit of such a mercy. They cried the more. Men ought always to pray, and not to faint; to pray with all perseverance (Luke xviii. 1).

II. The answer of Christ to this address of theirs. The multitude rebuked them; but Christ encouraged them. It were sad for us, if the Master were not more kind and tender than the multitude. He will not suffer his humble supplicants to be run down, and put out of countenance.

1. He stood still, and called them, v. 32. He was now going up to Jerusalem, and yet he stood still to cure these blind men. When we are ever so much in haste about any business, yet we should be willing to stand still to do good. He called them. Christ not only enjoins us to pray, but invites us; holds out the golden sceptre to us, and bids us come touch the top of it.

2. He enquired further into their case; What will ye that I shall do unto you? "Here I am; let me know what you would have, and you shall have it." What would we more? Ask, and it shall be given you. One would think this a strange question, anyone might tell what they would have. Christ knew well enough; but he would know it from them, whether they begged only for an alms, as from a common person, or for a cure, as from the Messiah. The waterman in the boat, who with his hook takes hold of the shore, does not thereby pull the shore to the boat, but the boat to the shore. So in prayer we do not draw the mercy to ourselves, but ourselves to the mercy.

They soon made known their request to him; Lord, that our eyes may be opened. The wants and burthens of the body we are soon sensible of, and can readily relate. O that we were but as apprehensive of our spiritual maladies, and could as feelingly complain of them, especially our spiritual blindness! Lord, that the eyes of our mind may be opened! Were we but sensible of our darkness, we should soon apply ourselves to him. Lord, that our eyes may be opened.

3. He cured them. What he did was an instance,

(1) Of his pity; He had compassion on them. Misery is the object of mercy. It was the tender mercy of our God, that gave light and sight to them that sat in darkness, Luke i. 78, 79.

(2) Of his power. He did it easily, he touched their eyes; he did it effectually, Immediately their eyes received sight. These blind men, when they had received sight, followed him. None follow Christ blindfold. He first by his grace opens men's eyes, and so draws their hearts after him.

CHAP. XXI

The history of his sufferings, even unto death, and his rising again, is more particularly recorded by all the evangelists than any other part of his story; and to that this evangelist now hastens apace. Now at length he is come up to Jerusalem; and here we have, I. The public entry which he made into Jerusalem, ver. 1–11. II. The authority he exercises there, in cleansing the temple, ver. 12–16. III. The emblem he gave of the state of the Jewish church, in cursing the barren fig-tree, and his discourse with his disciples thereupon, ver. 17–22. IV. His justifying his own authority, ver. 23–27. V. His shaming the chief priests and elders, with the repentance of the publicans, illustrated by the parable of the two sons, ver. 29–32. VI. The parable of the vineyard let out to unthankful husbandmen, ver. 33–46.

Verses 1–11

All the four evangelists take notice of this passage of Christ's riding in triumph into Jerusalem, five days before his death. He had lodged at Bethany, a village not far from Jerusalem, for some time; at a supper there the night before Mary had anointed his feet, John xii. 3. Our Lord Jesus travelled much, and his custom was to travel on foot from Galilee to Jerusalem; many a dirty weary step he had when he went about doing good. How ill does it become Christians to be inordinately solicitous about their own ease and state. Yet once in his life he rode in triumph, and it was now when he went into Jerusalem, to suffer and die.

I. The provision that was made for this solemnity; and it was very poor and ordinary.

1. The preparation was sudden and off-hand. For his glory in the other world was the glory his heart was upon; his glory in this world he was dead to. They were come to Bethphage, a long scattering street that lay toward the mount of Olives; when he entered upon that he sent two of his disciples to fetch him an ass.

2. It was very mean. He sent only for an ass and her colt, v. 2. Asses were much used in that country for travel; horses were kept only by great men, and for war. In his state of humiliation, he rides upon an ass.

3. It was not his own, but borrowed. He had nothing of this world's goods but what was given him or lent him.

The disciples who were sent to borrow this ass are directed to say, The Lord has need of him. In the borrowing of this ass,

(1) We have an instance of Christ's knowledge. Christ could tell his disciples where they should find an ass tied, and a colt with her.

(2) We have an instance of his power over the spirits of men. Christ asserts his right to use the ass, in bidding them bring it to him; but he foresees some hindrance which the disciples might meet with in this service; If any man say aught to you, ye shall say, The Lord hath need of him. What Christ sets us to do, he will bear us out in the doing of; Straightway he will send them.

(3) We have an example of justice and honesty, in not using the ass without the owner's consent.

II. The prediction that was fulfilled in this, v. 4, 5. Our Lord Jesus, in all that he did and suffered, had very much his eye upon this, That the scriptures might be fulfilled. This particularly which was written of him, Zech. ix. 9, where it ushers in a large prediction of the kingdom of the Messiah, Tell ye the daughter of Sion, Behold, thy King cometh, must be accomplished.

1. How the coming of Christ is foretold; Tell ye the daughter of Sion, Behold, thy King cometh unto thee. Jesus Christ is the church's King. Christ, the King of his church, came to his church, even in this lower world. Notice was given to the church beforehand of the coming of her King; Tell the daughter of Sion. Christ will have his coming looked for, and waited for, and his subjects big with expectation of it.

2. How his coming is described. When a king comes, something great and magnificent is expected. But there is nothing of that here; Behold, he cometh to thee, meek, and sitting upon an ass. When Christ would appear in his glory, it is in his meekness, not in his majesty. His temper is very mild. He is meek to suffer the greatest injuries and indignities for Sion's cause. He is easy of access, easy to be entreated. His government is mild and gentle, and his laws not written in the blood of his subjects, but in his own. His yoke is easy. As an evidence of this, his appearance is very mean, sitting upon an ass, a creature made not for state, but service, not for battles, but for burthens; slow in its motions, but sure, and safe and constant. Sion's King comes riding, not on a prancing horse, which the timorous petitioner dares not come near, or a running horse, which the slow-footed petitioner cannot keep pace with, but on a quiet ass, that the poorest of his subjects may not be discouraged in their access to him.

III. The procession itself. His equipage; The disciples did as Jesus commanded them (v. 6). Christ's commands must not be disputed, but obeyed; and those that sincerely obey them, shall not be baulked or baffled in it; They brought the ass and the colt. They had not so much as a saddle for the ass, but the disciples threw some of their clothes upon it, and that must serve for want of better accommodations. We ought not to be nice or curious, or to affect exactness in outward conveniences. A holy indifference or neglect well becomes us in these things. The disciples furnished him with the best they had, and did not object the spoiling of their clothes when the Lord had need of them. We must not think the clothes on our backs too dear to part with for the service of Christ, for the clothing of his poor destitute and afflicted members. Christ stripped himself for us. His retinue; there was nothing in this stately or magnificent. He has his attendants, a very great multitude; they were only the common people, the mob (the rabble we should have been apt to call them), that graced the solemnity of Christ's triumph, and none but such. Christ is honoured by the multitude, more than by the magnificence, of his followers; for he values men by their souls, not by their preferments, names, or titles of honour.

Now, concerning this great multitude, we are here told, what they did; according to the best of their capacity, they studied to do honour to Christ. They spread their garments in the way, that he might ride upon them. When Jehu was proclaimed king, the captains put their garments under him, in token of their subjection to him. Those that take Christ for their King must lay their all under his feet; the clothes, in token of the heart. How shall we express our respects to Christ? What honour and what dignity shall be done to him? Others cut down branches from the trees, and strewed them in the way, as they used to do at the feast of tabernacles, in token of liberty, victory, and joy. What they said; They that went before, and they that followed, cried, saying, Hosanna to the Son of David, v. 9. When they carried branches about at the feast of tabernacles, they were wont to cry Hosanna, and from thence to call their bundles of branches their hosannas. Hosanna signifies, Save now, we beseech thee; referring to Ps. cxviii. 25, 26.

The hosannas with which Christ was attended bespeak two things: Their welcoming his kingdom. Hosanna bespeaks the same with, Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. All nations shall call him blessed (Ps. lxxii. 17); these here began, and all true believers in all ages concur in it, and call him blessed: it is the genuine language of faith. Well may we say, Blessed is he; for it is in him that we are blessed. Well may we follow him with our blessings, who meets us with his. Their wishing well to his kingdom was intimated in their Hosannas; earnestly desiring that it might be a victorious kingdom. If they understood it of a temporal kingdom it was their mistake, which a little time would rectify; however, their good-will was accepted. It is our duty earnestly to desire and pray for the prosperity and success of Christ's kingdom in the world. This we mean when we pray, Thy kingdom come. They add, Hosanna in the highest. Let him have a name above every name, a throne above every throne. We have here his entertainment in Jerusalem (v. 10); When he was come into Jerusalem, all the city was moved; everyone took notice of him, some were moved with wonder at the novelty of the thing, others with laughter at the meanness of it; some perhaps were moved with joy; others, of the Pharisaical class, were moved with envy and indignation. So various are the motions in the minds of men upon the approach of Christ's kingdom!

Upon this commotion we are further told,

1. What the citizens said; Who is this? They were, it seems, ignorant concerning Christ. The Holy One unknown in the holy city! In places where the clearest light shines, and the greatest profession of religion is made, there is more ignorance than we are aware of. Yet they were inquisitive concerning him. Who is this King of glory?

2. How the multitude answered them; This is Jesus, v. 11. In the account they give of him they were right in calling him the Prophet, that great Prophet. Yet they missed it, in saying he was of Nazareth: and it helped to confirm some in their prejudices against him. Some that are willing to honour Christ, and bear their testimony to him, yet labour under mistakes concerning him.

Verses 12–17

It is in holy things that he rules, in the temple of God that he exercises authority. Now, what did he do there?

I. Thence he drove the buyers and sellers. Abuses must first be purged out before that which is right can be established. Here we are told,

1. What he did (v. 12); He cast out all them that sold and bought; he had done this once before (John ii. 14, 15). Buyers and sellers driven out of the temple, will return and nestle there again. The abuse was, buying and selling, and changing money, in the temple. Lawful things, ill timed, and ill placed, may become sinful things. They sold beasts for sacrifice, for the convenience of those that could more easily bring their money with them than their beast; and they changed money for those that wanted the half shekel. This might pass for the outward business of the house of God; and yet Christ will not allow of it. Great corruptions and abuses come into the church by the practices of those whose gain is godliness, that is, who make worldly gain the end of their godliness, and counterfeit godliness their way to worldly gain (1 Tim. vi. 5). The purging out of this abuse. Christ cast them out that sold. He did it before with a scourge of small cords (John ii. 15); now he did it with a look, with a frown, with a word of command. Some reckon this none of the least of Christ's miracles, that he should himself thus clear the temple. It is an instance of his power over the spirits of men, and the hold he has of them by their own consciences. He overthrew the tables of the money-changers; he did not take the money to himself, but scattered it, threw it to the ground, the fittest place for it.

2. What he said, to justify himself, and to convict them (v. 13); It is written. The eye must be upon the scripture, and that must be adhered to as the rule, the pattern in the mount.

(1) He shows, from a scripture prophecy, what the temple should be, and was designed to be; My house shall be called the house of prayer; which is quoted from Isa. lvi. 7. All the ceremonial institutions were intended to be subservient to moral duties; the house of sacrifices was to be a house of prayer, for that was the substance and soul of all those services.

(2) He shows how they had abused the temple, and perverted the intention of it; Ye have made it a den of thieves. Markets are too often dens of thieves, so many are the corrupt and cheating practices in buying and selling; but markets in the temple are certainly so, for they rob God of his honour, the worst of thieves.

II. There, in the temple, he healed the blind and the lame, v. 14. When he had driven the buyers and sellers out of the temple, he invited the blind and lame into it. It is good coming to the temple, when Christ is there, who, as he shows himself jealous for the honour of his temple, in expelling those who profane it, so he shows himself gracious to those who humbly seek him. The blind and the lame were debarred David's palace, but were admitted into God's house. The temple was profaned and abused when it was made a market-place, but it was graced and honoured when it was made an hospital; to be doing good in God's house, is more honourable, and better becomes it, than to be getting money there. Christ's healing was a real answer to that question, Who is this? His works testified of him more than the hosannas.

There also he silenced the offence which the chief priests and scribes took at the acclamations with which he was attended, v. 15, 16. They that should have been most forward to give him honour, were his worst enemies. They were inwardly vexed at the wonderful things that he did. If they had any sense, they could not but own the miracle of them; and if any good nature, could not but be in love with the mercy of them: yet, because they were resolved to oppose him, for these they envied him, and bore him a grudge. They openly quarrelled at the children's hosannas; they thought that hereby an honour was given him, which did not belong to him. Proud men cannot bear that honour should be done to any but to themselves, and are uneasy at nothing more than at the just praises of deserving men. When Christ is most honoured, his enemies are most displeased.

Here we have him (v. 16), taking part with the children against priests and scribes.

(1) The children were in the temple. It is good to bring children betimes to the house of prayer, for of such is the kingdom of heaven. Let children be taught to keep up the form of godliness, it will help to lead them to the power of it. Christ has a tenderness for the lambs of his flock.

(2) They were there crying Hosannas to the Son of David. This they learned from those that were grown up. Little children say and do as they hear others say, and see others do; so easily do they imitate; and therefore great care must be taken to set them good examples, and no bad ones. Children will learn of those that are with them, either to curse and swear, or to pray and praise.

(3) Our Lord Jesus not only allowed it, but was very well pleased with it, and quoted a scripture which was fulfilled in it (Ps. viii. 2), or, at least, may be accommodated to it; Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast perfected praise. Christ is so far from being ashamed of the services of little children, that he takes particular notice of them (and children love to be taken notice of), and is well pleased with them. Praise is perfected out of the mouth of such; it has a peculiar tendency to the honour and glory of God for little children to join in his praises; the praise would be accounted defective and imperfect, if they had not their share in it; which is an encouragement for children to be good betimes, and to parents to teach them to be so. In the psalm it is, Thou hast ordained strength. God perfecteth praise, by ordaining strength out of the mouths of babes and sucklings. When great things are brought about by weak and unlikely instruments, God is thereby much honoured, for his strength is perfected in weakness. Christ, having thus silenced them, forsook them, v. 17. By repining at Christ's praises we drive him from us. He left them and he went out of the city to Bethany, which was a more quiet retired place; not so much that he might sleep undisturbed as that he might pray undisturbed.

Verses 18–22

I. Christ returned in the morning to Jerusalem, v. 18. Having work to do there, he returned.

II. As he went, he hungered. He was a man, and submitted to the infirmities of nature. He was a poor man, and had no present supply.

Christ therefore hungered, that he might have occasion to work this miracle and therein might give us an instance of his justice and his power.

1. See his justice, v. 19. He went to it, expecting fruit, because it had leaves; but, finding none, he sentenced it to a perpetual barrenness. All Christ's miracles hitherto were wrought for the good of men, and proved the power of his grace and blessing. Now, at last he would give a specimen of the power of his wrath and curse; yet this not on any man, woman or child, but on an inanimate tree; that is set forth for an example. This cursing of the barren fig-tree, represents the state of hypocrites in general; and so it teaches us, (1) That the fruit of fig-trees may justly be expected from those that have the leaves. Christ looks for the power of religion from those that make profession of it. (2) Christ's just expectations from flourishing professors are often frustrated and disappointed. Many have a name to live, and are not alive indeed. (3) The sin of barrenness is justly punished with the curse and plague of barrenness; Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. As one of the chiefest blessings, and which was the first, is, Be fruitful; so one of the saddest curses is, Be no more fruitful. (4) A false and hypocritical profession commonly withers in this world; the fig-tree that had no fruit, soon lost its leaves. Hypocrites may look plausible for a time, but, their profession will soon come to nothing; the gifts wither, common graces decay, and the falseness and folly of the pretender are manifested to all men. It represents the state of the nation and people of the Jews in particular; they were a fig-tree planted in Christ's way. They gave disappointment to our Lord Jesus. He came among them, expecting to find some fruit, something that would be pleasing to him. But his expectations were frustrated; he found nothing but leaves. They professed themselves expectant of the promised Messiah, but, when he came, they did not receive and entertain him. So we see the doom he passed upon them, that never any fruit should grow upon them from henceforward for ever. Never any good came from them (except the particular persons among them that believed), after they rejected Christ; they became worse and worse; blindness and hardness happened to them, and grew upon them. How soon did their fig-tree wither away, after they said, His blood be on us, and on our children!

2. See the power of Christ.

(1) The disciples admired the effect of Christ's curse (v. 20); They marvelled. They marvelled at the suddenness of the thing; How soon is the fig-tree withered away!

(2) Christ empowered them by faith to do the like (v. 21, 22). The description of this wonder-working faith; If ye have faith, and doubt not. Doubting of the power and promise of God is the great thing that spoils the efficacy and success of faith. As certain as the promise is, so confident our faith should be. The power and prevalence of it expressed figuratively; If ye shall say to this mountain, Be thou removed, it shall be done. This is a proverbial expression; intimating that we are to believe that nothing is impossible with God, and therefore that what he has promised shall certainly be performed, though to us it seem impossible. The ways and means of exercising this faith; All things whatsover ye shall ask in prayer, believing ye shall receive. Faith is the soul, prayer is the body; both together make a complete man for any service. Faith, if it be right, will excite prayer; and prayer is not right, if it do not spring from faith. This is the condition of our receiving—we must ask in prayer, believing. The requests of prayer shall not be denied; the expectations of faith shall not be frustrated. It is but ask and have, believe and receive; and what would we more? Observe, How comprehensive the promise is—all things whatsoever ye shall ask. All things, in general; whatsoever, brings it to particulars. Such is the folly of our unbelief, that, though we think we assent to promises in the general, yet we fly off when it comes to particulars, and therefore, it is thus copiously expressed, All things whatsoever.

Verses 23–27

Our Lord Jesus (like St. Paul after him) preached his gospel with much contention; and here, just before he died, we have him engaged in controversy. The great contenders with him, were, the chief priests and the elders, the judges of two distinct courts, the chief priests presided in the ecclesiastical court, the elders of the people were judges of the civil courts. These joined to attack Christ, thinking they should find or make him obnoxious either to the one or to the other. Here we have them disturbing him when he was preaching, v. 23. They would neither receive his instructions themselves, nor let others receive them.

I. As soon as he came into Jerusalem, he went to the temple, though he had been affronted there the day before, was there in the midst of enemies and in the mouth of danger.

II. In the temple he was teaching; he had called it a house of prayer (v. 13), and here we have him preaching there. Praying and preaching must go together, and neither must encroach upon, or jostle out, the other. To make up communion with God, we must not only speak to him in prayer, but hear what he has to say to us by his word; ministers must give themselves both to the word and to prayer.

III. When Christ was teaching the people, the priests and elders came upon him, and challenged him to produce his orders. Yet good was brought out of the evil, for hereby occasion was given to Christ to dispel the objections that were advanced against him; and, while his adversaries thought by their power to have silenced him, he by his wisdom silenced them.

1. How he was assaulted by their insolent demand; By what authority doest thou these things, and who gave thee this authority? Had they duly considered his miracles, and the power by which he wrought them, they needed not to have asked this question. It is good for all that take upon them to act with authority, to put this question to themselves, "Who gave us that authority?" They who run before their warrant, run without their blessing.

Christ had often said it, and proved it beyond contradiction, that he was a teacher sent of God (John iii. 2); yet, at this time of day, when that point had been so fully cleared and settled, they come to him with this question. (1) In the ostentation of their own power. How haughtily do they ask, Who gave thee this authority? Intimating that he could have no authority, because he had none from them. It is common for the greatest abusers of their power to be the most rigorous assertors of it, and to take a pride and pleasure in any thing that looks like the exercise of it. (2) It was to ensnare and entangle him. Should he refuse to answer this question, they would insinuate to the people, that his silence was a tacit confessing of himself to be a usurper: should he plead an authority from God, they would, as formerly, demand a sign from heaven, or accuse him of blasphemy for it.

2. How he answered this demand with another, which would help them to answer it themselves (v. 24, 25); I also will ask you one thing. He declined giving them a direct answer, lest they should take advantage against him; but answers them with a question.

How this question is concerning John's baptism, here put for his whole ministry; "Was this from heaven, or of men? One of the two it must be." This question was not at all shuffling, to evade theirs; but, if they answered this question, it would answer theirs: should they say, against their consciences, that John's baptism was of men, yet it would be easy to answer, John did no miracle (John x. 41), Christ did many; but should they say, as they could not but own, that John's baptism was from heaven then their demand was answered, for he bare testimony to Christ. If they refused to answer it, that would be a good reason why he should not offer proofs of his authority to men that were obstinately prejudiced against the strongest conviction.

3. How they were hereby baffled and run aground.

(1) How they reasoned with themselves, not concerning the merits of the cause; no, their care was, how to make their part good against Christ. Two things they considered and consulted—their credit, and their safety; the same things which they principally aim at, who seek their own things.

[1] They consider their own credit, which they would endanger if they should own John's baptism to be of God; for then Christ would ask them, before all the people, Why did ye not believe him?

[2] They consider their own safety, if they should say that John's baptism was of men; We fear the people, for all hold John as a prophet. It seems, then, First, That the people had truer sentiments of John than the chief priests and the elders had. This people, of whom they said in their pride that they knew not the law, and were cursed (John vii. 49), it seems, knew the gospel, and were blessed. Secondly, That the chief priests and elders stood in awe of the common people, which is an evidence that things were in disorder among them. If they had kept their integrity, and done their duty, they had kept up their authority, and needed not to fear the people. Thirdly, That it is usually the temper even of common people, to be zealous for the honour of that which they account sacred and divine. Hence the hottest contests have been about holy things. Fourthly, That the chief priests and elders were kept from an open denial of the truth, not by the fear of God, but purely by the fear of the people. Many bad people would be much worse than they are, if they durst.

(2) How they replied to our Saviour, and so dropped the question. They fairly confessed We cannot tell; that is, "We will not"; The more shame for them. When they would not confess their knowledge, they were constrained to confess their ignorance. And observe, by the way, when they said, We cannot tell, they told a lie, for they knew that John's baptism was of God. There are many who are more afraid of the shame of lying than of the sin, and therefore scruple not to speak that which they knew to be false concerning their own thoughts and apprehensions, because in those things they know nobody can disprove them.

Thus Christ avoided the snare they laid for him, and justified himself in refusing to gratify them; Neither tell I you by what authority I do these things. They were not fit to be discoursed with concerning Christ's authority; for men of such a disposition could not be convinced of the truth. Those that imprison the truths they know, in unrighteousness are justly denied the further truths they enquire after. Take away the talent from him that buried it; those that will not see, shall not see.

Verses 28–32

As Christ instructed his disciples by parables, so sometimes he convinced his adversaries by parables, which bring reproofs more close, and make men, or ever they are aware, to reprove themselves. This Christ designs here, as appears by the first words (v. 28), But what think you?

I. The parable itself, which represents two sorts of persons; some that prove better than they promise; others that promise better than they prove.

1. They had both one and the same father. There are favours which all alike receive from him, and obligations which all alike lie under to him. Yes, and yet there is a vast difference between men's characters.

2. They had both the same command given them; Son, go work today in my vineyard. God sets his children to work, though they are all heirs. (1) The work of religion, which we are called to engage in, is vineyard work, creditable, profitable, and pleasant. By the sin of Adam we were turned out to work upon the common, and to eat the herb of the field; but by the grace of our Lord Jesus we are called to work again in the vineyard. (2) The gospel call to work in the vineyard, requires present obedience; Son, go work today. We were not sent into the world to be idle, nor had we daylight given us to play by. (3) The exhortation speaketh unto us as unto children, Son, go work. It is the command of a Father, which carries with it both authority and affection, a Father that is very tender of his Son that serves him.

3. Their conduct was very different. One of the sons did better than he said, proved better than he promised. His answer was bad, but his actions were good. Here is the untoward answer that he gave to his father; he said, flat and plain, I will not. Excuses are bad, but downright denials are worse; yet such peremptory refusals do the calls of the gospel often meet with. Some love their ease, and will not work. Their hearts are so much upon their own fields, that they are not for working in God's vineyard. They love the business of the world better than the business of their religion. Here is the happy change of his mind, and of his way, upon second thoughts; Afterward he repented, and went. Afterward he repented. Repentance is μετανοία—an after-wit: and μεταμελεία—an after-care. Better late than never. When he repented, he went; that was the fruit meet for repentance. The only evidence of our repentance for our former resistance, is, immediately to comply, and set to work; and then what is past, shall be pardoned, and all shall be well. Our God waits to be gracious, and, notwithstanding our former follies, if we repent and mend, will favourably accept of us; blessed be God, we are under a covenant that leaves room for such a repentance. The other son said better than he did; his answer was good but his actions bad. To him the father said likewise, v. 30. The gospel call, though very different, is, in effect, the same to all. Observe,

(1) How fairly this other son promised; He said, I go, sir. He gives his father a title of respect, sir. He professes a ready obedience, I go; not, "I will go by and by," but, "Ready, sir, you may depend upon it, I go just now."

(2) How he failed in the performance; He went not. Saying and doing are two things; and many there are that say, and do not. Many with their mouth show much love, but their heart goes another way. Buds and blossoms are not fruit.

II. A general appeal upon the parable; Whether of the twain did the will of his father? v. 31. They both had their faults, one was rude, and the other was false. But the question is, Which was the better of the two, and the less faulty? And it was soon resolved; the first, because his actions were better than his words, and his latter end than his beginning. The tenor of the whole scripture gives us to understand that those are accepted as doing their Father's will, who, wherein they have missed it, are sorry for it, and do better.

III. A particular application of it to the matter in hand, v. 31, 32. The primary scope of the parable is, to show how the publicans and harlots entertained the doctrine, and submitted to the discipline, of John the Baptist, his forerunner, when the priests and elders slighted John the Baptist, and ran counter to the designs of his mission.

In Christ's application of this parable, observe,

1. How he proves that John's baptism was from heaven, and not of men. "If you cannot tell," saith Christ, "you might tell."

(1) By the scope of his ministry; John came unto you in the way of righteousness. Remember the rule of trial, By their fruits ye shall know them; the fruits of their doctrines, the fruits of their doings. Now it was evident that John came in the way of righteousness. In his ministry, he taught people to repent, and to work the works of righteousness.

(2) By the success of his ministry; The publicans and the harlots believed him. If God had not sent John the Baptist, he would not have crowned his labours with such wonderful success. The people's profiting is the minister's best testimonial.

2. How he reproves them for their contempt of John's baptism. To shame them for it, he sets before them the faith, repentance, and obedience, of the publicans and harlots, which aggravated their unbelief and impenitence.

(1) The publicans and harlots were like the first son in the parable, from whom little of religion was expected. They promised little good, and those that knew them promised themselves little good from them. And yet many of them were wrought upon by the ministry of John.

(2) The scribes and Pharisees, the chief priests and elders, and indeed the Jewish nation in general, were like the other son that gave good works. A hypocrite is more hardly convinced and converted than a gross sinner. It was an aggravation of their unbelief, [1] That John was such an excellent person. The better the means are, the greater will the account be, if not improved. [2] That, when they saw the publicans and harlots go before them into the kingdom of heaven, they did not afterward repent and believe. Through the pride of their countenance, they would not seek after God, after Christ.

Verses 33-46

This parable plainly sets forth the sin and ruin of the Jewish nation.

I. We have here the privileges of the Jewish church, represented by the letting out of a vineyard to the husbandmen. Observe,

1. How God established a church for himself in the world. The kingdom of God upon earth is here compared to a vineyard, furnished with all things requisite to an advantageous management and improvement of it. (1) He planted this vineyard. The church is the planting of the Lord. The earth of itself produces thorns and briars; but vines must be planted. (2) He hedged it round about. God's church in the world is taken under his special protection. It is a hedge round about. He will not have his vineyard to lie in common, that those who are without, may thrust in at pleasure; not to lie at large that those who are within, may lash out at pleasure. (3) He digged a wine-press and built a tower. God instituted ordinances in his church, for the due oversight of it, and for the promoting of its fruitfulness.

2. How he entrusted these visible church-privileges with the nation and people of the Jews; he let it out to them as husbandmen, because he would try them, and be honoured by them. And then he went into a far country. When God had in a visible appearance settled the Jewish church at mount Sinai, he did in a manner withdraw; they had no more such open vision, but were left to the written word.

II. God's expectation of rent from these husbandmen, v. 34. It was a reasonable expectation. 1. His expectations were not hasty, but staid till the time of the fruit drew near. God waits to be gracious, that he may give us time. 2. They were not high. He sent his servants to them, to remind them of their duty, and of the rent-day, and to help them in gathering in the fruit, and making return of it. 3. They were not hard; it was only to receive the fruits. He did not demand more than they could make of it, but some fruit of that which he himself planted—an observance of the laws and statutes he gave them.

III. The husbandmen's baseness in abusing the messengers that were sent to them.

1. When he sent them his servants, they abused them. The calls and reproofs of the word, if they do not engage, will but exasperate. See here what hath all along been the lot of God's faithful messengers, more or less; (1) To suffer; so persecuted they the prophets. They not only despised and reproached them, but treated them as the worst of malefactors. If they that live godly in Christ Jesus themselves shall suffer persecution, much more they that press others to it. (2) It has been their lot to suffer from their Master's own tenants; they were the husbandmen that treated them thus.

Now see, [1] How God persevered in his goodness to them. He sent other servants, more than the first; though the first sped not, but were abused. [2] How they persisted in their wickedness. They did unto them likewise. One sin makes way for another of the same kind.

2. At length, he sent them his Son: we have seen God's goodness in sending, and their badness in abusing, the servants; but in the latter instance both these exceed themselves.

(1) Never did grace appear more gracious than in sending the Son. This was done last of all. He was sent last; for if nothing else would work upon them, surely this would. Surely they will reverence my Son, and therefore I will send him. If they will but reverence the Son, the point is gained. Surely they will reverence my Son, for he comes with more authority than the servants could.

(2) Never did sin appear more sinful than in the abusing of him.

[1] How it was plotted (v. 38); When they saw the Son. This touched their copyhold, and they were resolved to make one bold push for it, and to preserve their wealth and grandeur by taking him out of the way. This is the heir, come, let us kill him. Pilate and Herod, the princes of this world, knew not. But the chief priests and elders knew that this was the heir, and therefore, Come, let us kill him. Many are killed for what they have. The chief thing they envied him, and for which they hated and feared him, was his interest in the people. Therefore let us kill him; and then, as if the premises must of course go to the occupant, let us seize on his inheritance. They thought, if they could but get rid of this Jesus, they should carry all before them. While they thought to kill him, and so to seize on his inheritance, he went by his cross to his crown.

[2] How this plot was executed, v. 39. No wonder they soon caught him, and slew him. Nay, looking upon him to be as unworthy to live, as they were unwilling he should, they cast him out of the vineyard, and out of the holy city, for he was crucified without the gate, Heb. xiii. 12. As if He had been the shame and reproach, who was the greatest glory, of his people Israel.

IV. Here is their doom read out of their own mouths, v. 40, 41. He puts it to them, When the Lord of the vineyard cometh, what will he do unto these husbandmen? He puts it to themselves, for their stronger conviction. God's proceedings are so unexceptionable, that there needs but an appeal to sinners themselves concerning the equity of them. They could readily answer, He will miserably destroy those wicked men. Many can easily prognosticate the dismal consequences of other people's sins, that see not what will be the end of their own.

1. Our Saviour, in his question, supposes that the lord of the vineyard will come, and reckon with them. Persecutors say in their hearts, He delays his coming. Though he bear long with them, he will not bear always.

2. They, in their answer, suppose that it will be a terrible reckoning.

(1) That he will miserably destroy those wicked men. Let men never expect to do ill, and fare well. This was fulfilled upon the Jews, in that miserable destruction which was brought upon them by the Romans.

(2) That he will let out his vineyard to other husbandmen. God will have a church in the world. The unbelief and frowardness of man shall not make the word of God of no effect.

V. The further illustration and application of this by Christ himself, telling them, in effect, that they had rightly judged.

1. He illustrates it by referring to a scripture fulfilled in this (v. 42); Did ye never read in the scriptures? The scripture he quotes is Ps. cxviii. 22, 23, the same context out of which the children fetched their hosannas. The same word yields matter of praise and comfort to Christ's friends and followers, which speaks conviction and terror to his enemies. Such a two-edged sword is the word of God.

(1) The builders' rejecting of the stone is the same with the husbandmen's abusing of the son that was sent to them. They would not allow Christ a place in their building; they threw him aside as a despised broken vessel, a stone that would serve only for a stepping-stone, to be trampled upon.

(2) The advancing of this stone to be the head of the corner is the same with letting out the vineyard to other husbandmen. He who was rejected by the Jews was embraced by the Gentiles; and to that church, Christ is all, and in all.

(3) The hand of God was in all this; This is the Lord's doing. It is marvellous in our eyes. The wickedness of the Jews that rejected him is marvellous. The honour done him by the Gentile world is marvellous; that he whom men despised and abhorred, should be adored by kings! But it is the Lord's doing.

2. He applies it to them, and application is the life of preaching. He applies the sentence which they had passed (v. 41), and turns it upon themselves; not the former part of it, concerning the miserable destruction of the husbandmen (he could not bear to speak of that), but the latter part, of letting out the vineyard to others. Know then,

(1) That the Jews shall be unchurched; The kingdom of God shall be taken from you. To the Jews had long pertained the adoption and the glory (Rom. ix. 4); and the sacred trust of revealed religion, and bearing up of God's name in the world; but now it shall be so no longer. They were not only unfruitful in the use of their privileges, but opposed the gospel of Christ, and so forfeited them.

(2) That the Gentiles shall be taken in. Though his vine be plucked up in one place, he will find another to plant it in. The fall of Israel was the riches of the Gentiles. They shall bring forth the fruits better than the Jews had done. When he changes, it shall not be to his loss. He applies the scripture which he had quoted (v. 42), to their terror, v. 44. We have here the doom of two sorts of people. Some, through ignorance, stumble at Christ in his estate of humiliation; they, through their blindness and carelessness, fall on it, fall over it, and they shall be broken. The unbelief of sinners will be their ruin. Others oppose Christ, and bid defiance to him in his estate of exaltation, when this Stone is advanced to the head of the corner; and on them it shall fall, for they pull it on their own heads, and it will grind them to powder. Christ's kingdom will be a burthensome stone to all those that attempt to overthrow it, or heave it out of its place. None ever hardened his heart against God and prospered.

1. They perceived that he spake of them (v. 45), and that in what they said (v. 41) they had but read their own doom. A guilty conscience needs no accuser.

2. They sought to lay hands on him. When those who hear the reproofs of the word, perceive that it speaks of them, if it do not do them a great deal of good, it will certainly do them a great deal of hurt.

3. They durst not do it, for fear of the multitude, who took him for a prophet. God has many ways of restraining the remainders of wrath, as he has of making that which breaks out redound to his praise.

CHAP. XXII

This chapter is a continuation of Christ's discourses in the temple. I. Instruction given, by the parable of the marriage-supper, concerning the rejection of the Jews (ver. 1–10), and the danger of hypocrisy in the profession of Christianity, ver. 11–14. II. Disputes, 1. Concerning paying tribute to Caesar, ver. 15–22. 2. Concerning the resurrection of the dead, and the future state, ver. 23–33. 3. Concerning the great commandment of the law, ver. 34–40. 4. Concerning the relation of the Messiah to David, ver. 41–46.

Verses 1–14

We have here the parable of the guests invited to the wedding-feast. In this it is said (v. 1), Jesus answered, not to what his opposers said, but to what they thought. Christ knows how to answer men's thoughts, for he is a discerner of them. This parable represents the gospel offer, and the entertainment it meets with.

I. Gospel preparations are here represented by a feast which a king made at the marriage of his son.

1. Here is a marriage made for his son. Christ is the Bridegroom, the church is the bride. The gospel covenant is a marriage covenant betwixt Christ and believers.

2. Here is a dinner prepared for this marriage, v. 4. All the blessings of the new covenant, pardon of sin, the favour of God, peace of conscience, the promises of the gospel, the comforts of the Spirit, and a well-grounded hope of eternal life. These are the preparations for this feast, a heaven upon earth now, and a heaven in heaven shortly.

(1) It is a feast. Oxen and fatlings are killed for this feast; no niceties, but substantial food; enough, and enough of the best. A feast was made for love, it is a reconciliation feast. It was made for laughter, it is a rejoicing feast. It was made for fulness; the design of the gospel was to fill every hungry soul with good things. It was made for fellowship.

(2) It is a wedding feast. Wedding feasts are usually rich, free, and joyful. The first miracle Christ wrought, was, to make plentiful provision for a wedding feast (John ii. 7); and surely then he will not be wanting in provision for his own wedding feast.

(3) It is a royal wedding feast; it is the feast of a king, at the marriage, not of a servant, but of a son. The provision made for believers in the covenant of grace, is such as it becomes the King of glory to give. He gives like himself; for he gives himself, a feast indeed for a soul.

II. Gospel calls and offers are represented by an invitation to this feast. Those that make a feast will have guests to grace the feast with. God's guests are the children of men. Lord, what is man, that he should be thus dignified!

Now, 1. The guests are called, bidden to the wedding. All that are within hearing of the joyful sound of the gospel, to them is the word of this invitation sent. None are excluded but those that exclude themselves.

2. The guests are called upon; for in the gospel there are not only gracious proposals made, but gracious persuasives. See how much Christ's heart is set upon the happiness of poor souls! He not only provides for them, in consideration of their want, but sends to them, in consideration of their weakness and forgetfulness. When the invited guests were slack in coming, the king sent forth other servants, v. 4. One would think it had been enough to give men an intimation that they had leave to come, and should be welcome; that, during the solemnity of the wedding, the king kept open house. Behold, the dinner is prepared, the oxen and fatlings are killed; and all things are ready; pardon is ready, peace is ready, comfort is ready; the promises are ready, and heaven, at last, is ready to receive us. Is all this ready; and shall we be unready? Is all this preparation made for us; and is there any room to doubt of our welcome?

III. The cold treatment which the gospel of Christ often meets with among the children of men, represented by the cold treatment that this message met with and the hot treatment that the messengers met with.

1. The message was basely slighted (v. 3); They would not come. The reason why sinners come not to Christ and salvation by him is, not because they cannot, but because they will not. But this was not all (v. 5); they made light of it; they thought it not worth coming for; they could feast as well at home. Multitudes perish eternally through mere carelessness, who have not any direct aversion, but a prevailing indifference, to the matters of their souls.

And the reason why they made light of the marriage feast was, because they had other things that they minded more, and had more mind to; they went their ways, one to his farm, and another to his merchandise. None turn their back on the feast, but given some plausible excuse or other, Luke xiv. 18. The country people have their farms to look after, about which there is always something or other to do; the town's people must tend their shops, and be constant upon the exchange. It is true, that both farmers and merchants must be diligent in their business, but not so as to keep them from making religion their main business. Both the city and the country have their temptations, the merchandise in the one, and the farms in the other; so that, whatever we have of the world in our hands, our care must be to keep it out of our hearts, lest it come between us and Christ.

2. The messengers were basely abused; The remnant, the scribes and Pharisees, and chief priests; these were the persecutors, these took the servants, and treated them spitefully, and slew them. In the application of the parable, it was matter of fact. The prophets and John the Baptist had been thus abused already, and the apostles and ministers of Christ must count upon the same.

IV. The utter ruin that was coming upon the Jewish church and nation is here represented by the revenge which the king, in wrath, took on these insolent recusants (v. 7); He was wroth.

1. What was the crying sin that brought the ruin; it was their being murderers. He does not say, he destroyed those despisers of his call, but those murderers of his servants; as if God were more jealous for the lives of his ministers than for the honour of his gospel. Persecution of Christ's faithful ministers fills the measure of guilt more than anything.

2. What was the ruin itself, that was coming; He sent forth his armies. The Roman armies were his armies, of his raising. God is the Lord of men's hosts, and makes what use he pleases of them, to serve his own purposes. It is set forth for an example to all that should oppose Christ and his gospel.

V. The bringing in of the Gentiles, is here represented by the furnishing of the feast with guests out of the highways, v. 8–10.

Here is, 1. The complaint of the master of the feast concerning those that were first bidden (v. 8), The wedding is ready, but they which were bidden, that is, the Jews, were not worthy, they were utterly unworthy, and had forfeited all the privileges they were invited to. It is not owing to God, that sinners perish, but to themselves.

2. The commission he gave to the servants, to invite other guests. The inhabitants of the city (v. 7) had refused; Go into the highways then; into the way of the Gentiles, which at first they were to decline, ch. x. 5. Thus by the fall of the Jews salvation is come to the Gentiles. Christ will have a kingdom in the world, though many reject the grace, and resist the power, of that kingdom. The offer of Christ and salvation to the Gentiles was, (1) Unlooked for and unexpected; such a surprise as it would be to wayfaring men upon the road to be met with an invitation to a wedding feast. To the Gentiles it was all new, what they had never heard of before (Acts xvii. 19, 20), and, consequently, what they could not conceive of as belonging to them. (2) It was universal and undistinguishing; Go, and bid as many as you find. The highways are public places. "Ask them that go by the way, ask anybody, tell them all, that they shall be welcome, whoever will, let him come, without exception."

3. The success of this second invitation (v. 10); They gathered together all, as many as they found. The design of the gospel is, (1) To gather souls together; not the nation of the Jews only, but all the children of God who were scattered abroad (John xi. 52), the other sheep that were not of that fold, John x. 16. (2) To gather them together to the wedding-feast to partake of the privileges of the new covenant. Where the dole is, there will the poor be gathered together.

Now the guests that were gathered were a multitude, all, as many as they found; so many, that the guest-chamber was filled. A mixed multitude, both bad and good; some that before their conversion were sober and well-inclined; others that had run to an excess of riot; Such were some of you; or, some that after their conversion proved bad; others that were upright and sincere, and proved of the right class. Ministers, in casting the net of the gospel, enclose both good fish and bad.

VI. The case of hypocrites, who are in the church, but not of it, is represented by the guest that had not on a wedding garment; one of the bad that were gathered in. Concerning this hypocrite observe,

1. His discovery, how he was found out, v. 11.

(1) The king came in to see the guests, to bid those welcome who came prepared, and to turn those out who came otherwise. Let this be a warning to us against hypocrisy, that disguises will shortly be stripped off, and an encouragement to us in our sincerity, that God is a witness to it. This hypocrite was never discovered to be without a wedding garment, till the king himself came in to see the guests. It is God's prerogative to know who are sound at heart in their profession, and who are not. We may be deceived in men, either one way or other; but He cannot.

(2) As soon as he came in, He saw there a man which had not on a wedding garment; he soon had his eye upon him; there is no hope of being hid in a crowd from the arrests of divine justice; he had not on a wedding garment; he had not his best clothes on. If the gospel be the wedding feast, then the wedding garment is a frame of heart, and a course of life agreeable to the gospel. This man was not naked, or in rags; some raiment he had, but not a wedding garment. Those, and those only, who put on the Lord Jesus, and to whom he is all in all, have the wedding garment.

2. His trial (v. 12). How he was arraigned (v. 12); Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having a wedding garment? A startling question to one that was priding himself in the place he securely possessed at the feast. Friend! That was a cutting word; a seeming friend, under manifold ties and obligations to be a friend. How camest thou in hither? He does not chide the servants for letting him in, but he checks his presumption in crowding in, when he knew that his heart was not upright. Despised sabbaths and abused sacraments must be reckoned for. "How camest thou to the Lord's table, at such a time, unhumbled and unsanctified? How camest thou in? Not by the door, but some other way, as a thief and a robber." It is good for those that have a place in the church, often to put it to themselves, "How came I in hither? Have I a wedding-garment?" If we would thus judge ourselves, we should not be judged. How he was convicted; he was speechless: the man stood mute, upon his arraignment, being convicted and condemned by his own conscience. They who never heard a word of this wedding feast will have more to say for themselves; their sin will be more excusable than theirs who came to the feast without the wedding garment, and so sin against the clearest light and dearest love.

3. His sentence (v. 13); Bind him hand and foot, &c.

(1) He is ordered to be pinioned, as condemned malefactors are, to be manacled and shackled. These that will not work and walk as they should, may expect to be bound hand and foot. They can neither resist nor outrun their punishment.

(2) He is ordered to be carried off from the wedding feast; Take him away. This bespeaks the punishment of loss in the other world; they shall be taken away from the king, from the kingdom, from the wedding feast. Those that walk unworthy of their christianity, forfeit all the happiness they presumptuously laid claim to.

(3) He is ordered into a doleful dungeon; Cast him into utter darkness. Hell is utter darkness, it is darkness out of heaven, the land of light; or it is extreme darkness, darkness to the last degree, without the least ray or spark of light, or hope of it. There shall be weeping, and gnashing of teeth. Weeping, an expression of great sorrow and anguish; and the gnashing of teeth is an expression of the greatest rage and indignation.

Lastly, The parable is concluded with that remarkable saying which we had before (ch. xx. 16), Many are called, but few are chosen, v. 14. Many called to the wedding feast, but few chosen to the wedding garment.

Verses 15–22

In these verses, we have him attacked by the Pharisees and Herodians with a question about paying tribute to Cæsar.

1. What the design was; They took counsel to entangle him in his talk. Now he is set upon from another quarter: the Pharisees will try whether they can deal with him by their learning in the law. It is in vain for the best and wisest of men to think that, by their ingenuity, or interest, or industry, or even by their innocence and integrity, they can escape the hatred and ill will of bad men, or screen themselves from the strife of tongues. See how unwearied the enemies of Christ and his kingdom are in their opposition!

1. They took counsel. The more there is of contrivance and consultation about sin, the worse it is. The more there is of the wicked wit in the contrivance of a sin, the more there is of the wicked will in the commission of it.

2. That which they aimed at was to entangle him in his talk. They saw him free and bold in speaking his mind, and hoped by that to get an advantage against him. It has been the old practice of Satan's agents and emissaries, to make a man an offender for a word, a word misplaced, or mistaken, or misunderstood; a word, though innocently designed, yet perverted by strained innuendos.

There are two ways by which the enemies of Christ might be revenged on him, and be rid of him; either by law or by force. By law they could not do it, unless they could make him obnoxious to the civil government. By force they could not do it, unless they could make him obnoxious to the people, but the people took Christ for a Prophet, and therefore his enemies could not raise the mob against him. The design was, to bring him into such a dilemma, that he must make himself liable to the displeasure either of the Jewish multitude, or of the Roman magistrates; let him take which side of the question he will. So they will gain their point, and make his own tongue to fall upon him.

II. The question which they put to him, v. 16, 17.

1. The persons they employed; they did not go themselves, but they sent their disciples, who would look less like tempters, and more like learners. Wicked men will never want wicked instruments to be employed in carrying on their wicked counsels.

With them they sent the Herodians, a party among the Jews, who made it their business to reconcile people to that government, and pressed all to pay their tribute. They went with the Pharisees to Christ, with this blind upon their plot, that while the Herodians demanded the tax, and the Pharisees denied it, they were both willing to refer it to Christ, as a proper Judge to decide the quarrel. Now, if he should countenance the paying of tribute, the Pharisees would incense the people against him; if he should discountenance or disallow it, the Herodians would incense the government against him. It is common for those that oppose one another, to continue in an opposition to Christ and his kingdom. Samson's foxes looked several ways, but met in one firebrand.

2. The preface; it was highly complimentary to our Saviour (v. 16); Master, we know that thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth. Note, It is a common thing for the most spiteful projects to be covered with the most specious pretences. Had they come to Christ with the most serious enquiry, and the most sincere intention, they could not have expressed themselves better. What they said of Christ was right that Jesus Christ was a faithful Teacher; Thou art true, and teachest the way of God in truth. He is the Truth itself. As for his doctrine, the matter of his teaching was the way of God that leads to happiness. The manner of it was in truth; he showed people the right way. That he was a bold Reprover. In preaching, he cared not for any; he valued no man's frowns or smiles, he did not court, he did not dread, either the great or the many. He reproved with equity, and never with partiality. Though what they said was true for the matter of it, yet there was nothing but flattery and treachery in the intention of it. They called him Master, when they were contriving to treat him as the worst of malefactors; they pretended respect for him, when they intended mischief against him; and they affronted his wisdom when they imagined that they could impose upon him with these pretences.

3. The proposal of the case; What thinkest thou? As if they had said, "Many men are of many minds in this matter; it is a case which relates to practice, and occurs daily; let us have thy thoughts freely in the matter, Is it lawful to give tribute to Cæsar, or not?" This implies a further question; Has Cæsar a right to demand it?

Now the question was, Whether it was lawful to pay these taxes voluntarily or, Whether they should not insist upon the ancient liberty of their nation, and rather suffer themselves to be distrained upon? However, by this question they hoped to entangle Christ, and, which way soever he resolved it, to expose him to the fury either of the jealous Jews, or of the jealous Romans.

III. The breaking of this snare by the wisdom of the Lord Jesus.

1. He discovered it (v. 18); He perceived their wickedness. A temptation perceived is half conquered, for our greatest danger lies from snakes under the green grass; and he said, Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Whatever vizard the hypocrite puts on, our Lord Jesus sees through it. He cannot be imposed upon, as we often are, by flatteries and fair pretences. Why tempt ye me, ye hypocrites? Those that presume to tempt Christ will certainly find him too hard for them, and that he is of more piercing eyes than not to see, and more pure eyes than not to hate the disguised wickedness of hypocrites, that dig deep to hide their counsel from him.

2. He evaded it. (Such captious malicious questions deserve a reproof, not a reply): but our Lord Jesus gave a full answer to their question, and introduced it by an argument sufficient to support it.

(1) He forced them, ere they were aware, to confess Cæsar's authority over them, v. 19, 20. In dealing with those that are captious, it is good to give our reasons, and, if possible, reasons of confessed cogency, before we give our resolutions. Thus the evidence of truth may silence gainsayers by surprise, while they only stood upon their guard against the truth itself, not against the reason of it; Show me the tribute-money. The Romans demanded their tribute in their own money, which was current among the Jews at that time: that therefore is called the tribute-money. A penny, a Roman penny in silver, the most common piece then in use: it was stamped with the emperor's image and superscription, which was the warrant of the public faith for the value of the pieces so stamped.

Christ asked them, Whose image is this? They owned it to be Cæsar's.

(2) From thence he inferred the lawfulness of paying tribute to Cæsar (v. 21); Render therefore to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; not, "Give it him" (as they expressed it, v. 17), but, "Restore it; if Cæsar fill the purses, let Cæsar command them. When once a relation is admitted, the duty of it must be performed. Render to all their due, and particularly tribute to whom tribute is due." Now by this answer, No offence was given. He did not interpose as a Judge or a Divider in matters of this nature. Christ discusses not the emperor's title, but enjoins a peaceable subjection to the powers that be. The government therefore had no reason to take offence at his determination, but to thank him, for it would strengthen Cæsar's interest with the people, who held him for a Prophet. As to the people, the Pharisees could not accuse him to them, because they themselves had, before they were aware, yielded the premises. Though truth seeks not a fraudulent concealment, yet it sometimes needs a prudent management, to prevent the offence which may be taken at it. His adversaries were reproved. Many excuse themselves from that which they must do, by arguing whether they may do it or no. They all withheld from God his dues, and are reproved for that. His disciples were instructed.

First, That the Christian religion is no enemy to civil government, but a friend to it.

Secondly, It is the duty of subjects to tender to magistrates that which, according to the laws of their country, is their due. The higher powers, being entrusted with the public welfare, are entitled, in consideration thereof, to a just proportion of the public wealth. It is doubtless a greater sin to cheat the government than to cheat a private person. My coat is my coat, by the law of man; but he is a thief, by the law of God, that takes it from me.

Thirdly, We must remember withal to render to God the things that are God's. If our purses be Cæsar's, our consciences are God's; we must render to God that which is his due, out of our time and out of our estates; from them he must have his share as well as Cæsar his; and if Cæsar's commands interfere with God's we must obey God rather than men.

Lastly, Observe how they were nonplussed by this answer; they marvelled, and left him, and went their way, v. 22. They admired his sagacity in discovering and evading a snare which they thought so craftily laid. One would think they should have marvelled and followed him; no, they marvelled and left him. There are many in whose eyes Christ is marvellous, and yet not precious. They admire his wisdom, but will not be guided by it. They went their way, as persons ashamed, and made an inglorious retreat. They quitted the field. There is nothing got by contending with Christ.

Verses 23–33

We have here Christ's dispute with the Sadducees concerning the resurrection.

I. The opposition which the Sadducees made to a very great truth of religion; they say, There is no resurrection. They lie under heavy censures among the writers of their own nation, as men of base and debauched conversations. They were the fewest in number of all the sects among the Jews, but generally persons of some rank. They said, There is no future state, no life after this; that, when the body dies, the soul is annihilated, and dies with it. They maintained, that, except God, there is no spirit (Acts xxiii. 8). The Pharisees and Sadducees were contrary to each other, and yet confederates against Christ.

II. The objection they made against the truth, which was taken from a supposed case of a woman that had seven husbands successively; now they take it for granted, that, if there be a resurrection, it must be a return to such a state as this we are now in; and if so, it is an invincible absurdity for this woman, in the future state to have seven husbands, or else an insuperable difficulty which of them should have her, he whom she had first, or he whom she had last, or he whom she loved best, or he whom she lived longest with.

1. They suggest the law of Moses in this matter (v. 24), that the next of kin should marry the widow of him that died childless (Deut. xxv. 5). It was a political law to preserve the distinction of families and inheritances.

2. They put a case upon this statute. If it had not really occurred, yet possibly it might. Now this case supposes,

(1) The desolations that death sometimes makes in families. It often sweeps away a whole fraternity in a little time.

(2) The obedience of these seven brothers to the law. The seventh, who ventured last to marry the widow (many a one would say) was a bold man. I would say, if he did it purely in obedience to God, he was a good man, and one that made conscience of his duty.

But, last of all, the woman died also. Survivorship is but a reprieve. Death's bitter cup goes round, and, sooner or later, we must all pledge in it.

3. They propose a doubt upon this case (v. 28); "In the resurrection, whose wife shall she be of the seven? You cannot tell whose; and therefore we must conclude there is no resurrection." The Pharisees, who professed to believe a resurrection, had very gross and carnal notions concerning the future state; expecting to find there the delights and pleasures of the animal life, which perhaps drove the Sadducees to deny the thing itself. While those that are erroneous deny the truth, those that are superstitious betray it to them. Let truth be set in a clear light, and then it appears in its full strength.

III. Christ's answer to this objection.

1. He reproves their ignorance (v. 29); Ye do err. Those do greatly err, in the judgment of Christ, who deny the resurrection and a future state. Here Christ reproved with the meekness of wisdom, and is not so sharp upon them (whatever was the reason) as sometimes he was upon the chief priests and elders; Ye do err, not knowing. Ignorance is the cause of error; those that are in the dark, miss their way. Ingorance is the cause of error about the resurrection and the future state. What it is in its particular instances, the wisest and best know not; it doth not yet appear what we shall be, it is a glory that is to be revealed. But that is a thing about which we are not left in the dark, blessed be God, we are not. They know not the power of God; which would lead men to infer that there may be a resurrection and a future state. The ignorance, disbelief, or weak belief, of God's power, is at the bottom of many errors, particularly theirs who deny the resurrection. When we are told of the soul's existence and agency in a state of separation from the body, we are ready to say, How can these things be? If a man die, shall he live again? And vain men, because they cannot comprehend the way of it, question the truth of it. This therefore we must fasten upon, in the first place, that God is omnipotent, and can do what he will; and then no room is left for doubting but that he will do what he has promised. His power far exceeds the power of nature. They know not the scriptures, which decidedly affirm that there shall be a resurrection and a future state. Now the scriptures speak plainly, that the soul is immortal, and there is another life after this. Christ rose again according to the scriptures (1 Cor. xv. 3); and so shall we. Ignorance of the scripture is the rise of abundance of mischief.

2. He rectifies their mistake and (v. 30) corrects those gross ideas which they had of the resurrection and a future state. It is not like the state we are now in upon earth; They neither marry, nor are given in marriage. In our present state marriage is necessary. All civilised nations have had a sense of the obligation of the marriage covenant. But, in the resurrection, there is no occasion for marriage. In heaven, where there shall be no more deaths (Rev. xxi. 4), there need be no more births.

It is like the state angels are now in, in heaven; They are as the angels of God in heaven. Man in his creation was made a little lower than the angels (Ps. viii. 5); but in his complete redemption and renovation will be as the angels; pure and spiritual as the angels, knowing and loving, ever praising God like them and with them. We should therefore desire and endeavour to do the will of God now as the angels do it in heaven, because we hope shortly to be like the angels who always behold our Father's face.

IV. Christ's argument to confirm this great truth; the matters being of great concern, he did not think it enough to discover the fallacy and sophistry of the objections, but backed the truth with a solid argument.

1. Whence he fetched his argument—from the scripture. It is written is Goliath's sword. Have ye not read that which was spoken to you by God? What the scripture speaks God speaks. What was spoken to Moses was spoken to us. It concerns us to read and hear what God hath spoken, because it is spoken to us. The latter prophets have more express proofs of a future state than the law of Moses has. No express revelation of it is made by the law of Moses; because so much of that law was peculiar to that people; but our Saviour finds a very solid argument for the resurrection even in the writings of Moses. Much scripture treasure lies underground, that must be digged for.

2. What his argument was (v. 32); I am the God of Abraham. This was not an express proof, and yet it was really a conclusive argument. Consequences from scripture, if rightly deduced, must be received as scripture,; for it was written for those that have the use of reason.

Now the drift of the argument is to prove,

(1) That there is a future state, another life after this. This is proved from what God said; I am the God of Abraham. For God to be anyone's God supposes some very extraordinary privileges and happiness. The God of Israel is a God to Irsael, a spiritual Benefactor; an all-sufficient Benefactor, a God that is enough, a complete Good, and an eternal Benefactor; for he is himself an everlasting God, and will be to those that are in covenant with him an everlasting Good. It is manifest that these good men had no such extraordinary happiness, in this life, as might look anything like the accomplishments of so great a word as that. They were strangers in the land of promise; they had not a foot of ground of their own but a burying-place, which directed them to look for something beyond this life. In present enjoyments they came far short of their neighbours that were strangers to this covenant. What was there in this world to distinguish them from other people, any whit proportionable to the dignity and distinction of this covenant? Therefore there must certainly be a future state, in which, as God will ever live to be eternally rewarding, so Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, will ever live to be eternally rewarded.

(2) That the soul is immortal, and the body shall rise again, to be united; if the former point be gained, these will follow; but they are likewise proved by considering the time when God spoke this; it was to Moses at the bush, long after Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were dead and buried; and yet God saith, not, "I was," or "have been," but, I am the God of Abraham. Now God is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Which proves the immortality of the soul in a state of bliss; and that, by consequence, infers the resurrection of the body.

Lastly, We have the issue of this dispute. The Sadducees were put to silence (v. 34), and so put to shame. But the multitude were astonished at his doctrine, v. 33. 1. Because it was new to them. They had sorry scribes, or this had been no news to them. 2. Because it had something in it very good and great. Truth often shows the brighter, and is the more admired, for its being opposed.

Verses 34-40

I. The combination of the Pharisees against Christ, v. 34. They heard that he had put the Sadducees to silence; and they were gathered together, not to return him the thanks of their party, for his effectually asserting and confirming of the truth against the Sadducees, but to tempt him, in hopes to get the reputation of puzzling him who had puzzled the Sadducees. They were more vexed that Christ was honoured, than pleased that the Sadducees were silenced. It is an instance of Pharisaical envy and malice, to be displeased at the maintaining of a confessed truth, when it is done by those we do not like.

II. The lawyer's question, which he put to Christ. The lawyers were students in, and teachers of the law of Moses, as the scribes were. This lawyer asked him a question, tempting him; not with any design to ensnare him, as appears by St. Mark's relation of the story, where we find that this was he to whom Christ said, Thou art not far from the kingdom of God, Mark xii. 34, but only to see what he would say, and to draw on discourse with him, to satisfy his own and his friend's curiosity.

1. The question was, Master, which is the greatest commandment of the law? It is true, there are some commands that are the principles of the oracles of God, more extensive and inclusive than others.

2. The design was to try him not so much his knowledge as his judgment. It was a question disputed among the critics in the law. Now they would try what Christ said to this question; and if he should magnify one commandment, they would reflecton him as vilifying the rest. The question was harmless enough; and it appears by comparing Luke x. 27, 28, that it was an adjudged point among the lawyers, that the love of God and our neighbour is the great commandment, and the sum of all the rest.

III. Christ's answer to this question. Now Christ recommends to us as the great commandments, not those which are so exclusive of others, but, which are therefore great because inclusive of others. Observe,

1. Which these great commandments are (v. 37–39); the love of God and our neighbour, which are the spring and foundation of all the rest, which (these being supposed) will follow of course.

(1) All the law is fulfilled in one word, and that is, love. See Rom. xiii. 10. All obedience begins in the affections, and nothing in religion is done right, that is not done there first. Love is the leading affection, and therefore that, as the main fort, is to be first secured and garrisoned for God. Man is a creature cut out for love; thus therefore is the law written in the heart, that it is a law of love. Love is a short and sweet word; and, if that be the fulfilling of the law, surely the yoke of the command is very easy. Love is the rest and satisfaction of the soul; if we walk in this good old way, we shall find rest.

(2) The love of God is the first and great commandment of all. Now God, being good infinitely, originally, and eternally, is to be loved in the first place, and nothing loved beside him, but what is loved for him. Love is the first and great thing that God demands from us, and therefore the first and great thing that we should devote to him.

Now here we are directed,

[1] To love God as ours; Thou shalt love the Lord thy God as thine. To love God as ours is to love him because he is ours, and to conduct ourselves to him as ours, with obedience to him, and dependence on him.

[2] To love him with all our heart, and soul, and mind. Some make these to signify one and the same thing, to love him with all our powers; others distinguish them; the heart, soul, and mind, are the will, affections, and understanding. Our love of God must be a sincere love, and not in word and tongue only. It must be a strong love, we must love him in the most intense degree. It must be a singular and superlative love, we must love him more than anything else; this way the stream of our affections must entirely run. The heart must be united to love God, in opposition to a divided heart. All our love is too little to bestow upon him, and therefore all the powers of the soul must be engaged for him, and carried out toward him. This is the first and great commandment; for obedience to this is the spring of obedience to all the rest; which is only acceptable, when it flows from love.

(3) To love our neighbour as ourselves is the second great commandment (v. 39); It is like unto that first; it is inclusive of all the precepts of the second table, as that is of the first. It is like it, for it is founded upon it, and flows from it. It is implied, that we do, and should, love ourselves. There is a self-love which is corrupt, and it must be put off and mortified: but there is a self-love which is natural, and the rule of the greatest duty, and it must be preserved and sanctified. We must love ourselves, that is, we must have a due regard to the dignity of our own natures, and a due concern for the welfare of our own souls and bodies. It is prescribed, that we love our neighbour as ourselves. We must honour and esteem all men, and must wrong and injure none; and, as we have opportunity, must do good to all. We must love our neighbour as ourselves, as truly and sincerely as we love ourselves, and in the same instances; nay, in many cases we must deny ourselves for the good of our neighbour.

2. Observe what the weight and greatness of these commandments is (v. 40); On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets. All hang upon the law of love; take away this, and all falls to the ground, and comes to nothing. Love is the more excellent way. This is the spirit of the law, which animates it; it is the root and spring of all other duties, the compendium of the whole Bible, not only of the law and the prophets, but of the gospel too. All hangs on these two commandments. Love never faileth. Into these two great commandments therefore let our hearts be delivered as into a mould; in the defence and evidence of these let us spend our zeal, and not in notions, names, and strifes of words. To the commanding power of these let everything else be made to bow.

Many questions the Pharisees had asked Christ, but now let him ask them a question; and he will do it when they are gathered together, v. 41. He took them all together, when they were in confederacy and consulting against him. God delights to baffle his enemies when they most strengthen themselves; he gives them all the advantages they can wish for, and yet conquers them.

I. Christ proposes a question to them, which they could easily answer; it was a question in their own catechism; "What think ye of Christ? Whose Son is he?" This they could easily answer, The Son of David. It was the common periphrasis of the Messiah; they called him the Son of David.

What think ye of Christ? They had put questions to him, one after another, out of the law; but he comes and puts a question to them upon the promise. Many are so full of the law, that they forget Christ, as if their duties would save them without his merit and grace. It concerns each of us seriously to ask ourselves, What think we of Christ? Some think not of him at all, some think meanly, and some think hardly, of him; but to them that believe he is precious; and how precious then are the thoughts of him!

II. He starts a difficulty upon their answer, which they could not so easily solve, v. 43–45. Many can so readily affirm the truth, that they think they have knowledge enough to be proud of, who, when they are called to confirm the truth, show they have ignorance enough to be ashamed of. The objection Christ raised was, If Christ be David's son, how then doth David, in spirit, call him Lord? He did not hereby design to ensnare them, as they did him, but to instruct them.

1. It is easy to see that David calls Christ Lord. Now, to prove that David, in spirit, called Christ Lord, he quotes Ps. cx. 1, which psalm the scribes themselves understood of Christ. It is a prophetical summary of the doctrine of Christ, it describes him executing the offices of a Prophet, Priest, and King.

Christ quotes the whole verse, which shows the Redeemer in his exaltation; (1) Sitting at the right hand of God. His sitting denotes both rest and rule; his sitting at God's right hand denotes superlative honour and sovereign power. (2) Subduing his enemies. There he shall sit, till they be all made either his friends or his footstool.

But that which this verse is quoted for is, that David calls the Messiah his Lord; the Lord, Jehovah, said unto my Lord.

2. It is not so easy for those who believe not the Godhead of the Messiah, to clear this from an absurdity, if Christ be David's son. If David call him Lord, that is laid down (v. 45) as the more evident truth. We must hold this fast, that he is David's Lord, and by that explain his being David's son.

III. We have here the success of this gentle trial which Christ made of the Pharisees' knowledge, in two things.

1. It puzzled them (v. 46); No man was able to answer him a word. Either it was their ignorance that they did not know, or their impiety that they would not own, the Messiah to be God; which truth was the only key to unlock this difficulty. Christ, as God, was David's Lord; and Christ, as Man, was David's son. This he did not now himself explain, but reserved it till the proof of it was completed by his resurrection.

2. It silenced them, and all others that sought occasion against him, Neither durst any man, from that day forth, ask him any more questions. Many are convinced, that are not converted, by the word. Had these been converted, they would have asked him more questions, especially that great question, What must we do to be saved? But since they could not gain their point, they would have no more to do with him.

CHAP. XXIII

In the foregoing chapter, we had our Saviour's discourses with the scribes and Pharisees; here we have his discourse concerning them. I. He allows their office, ver. 2, 3. II. He warns his disciples not to imitate their hypocrisy and pride, ver. 4–12. III. He exhibits a charge against them for divers high crimes and misdemeanours, and to each article he prefixes a woe, ver. 13–33. IV. He passes sentence upon Jerusalem, ver. 34–39.

Verses 1–12

We find not Christ, in all his preaching, so severe upon any sort of people as upon these scribes and Pharisees. Yet these were the idols and darlings of the people, who thought, if but two men went to heaven, one would be a Pharisee. Now Christ directs his discourse here to the multitude, and to his disciples (v. 1), to rectify their mistakes concerning these scribes and Pharisees, by painting them out in their true colours. It is good to know the true characters of men, that we may not be imposed upon by great and mighty names, titles, and pretensions to power. Even the disciples need these cautions; for good men are apt to have their eyes dazzled with worldly pomp.

I. Christ allows their office as expositors of the law; The scribes and Pharisees sit in Moses' seat (v. 2), as public teachers and interpreters of the law. They were as judges, or a bench of justices; teaching and judging seem to be equivalent. Or, we may apply it, not to the Sanhedrim, but to the other Pharisees and scribes, that expounded the law, and taught the people how to apply it to particular cases. Moses had those in every city (so the expression is, Acts xv. 21), who preached him; this was their office, and it was just and honourable; it was requisite that there should be some at whose mouth the people might enquire the law. Many a good place is filled with bad men. The men are not so much honoured by the seat as the seat is dishonoured by the men. Good and useful offices and powers are not therefore to be condemned and abolished, because they fall sometimes into the hands of bad men, who abuse them.

Hence he infers (v. 3), "Whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do. As far as they sit in Moses' seat, that is, read and preach the law that was given by Moses, so far you must hearken to them." Now Christ would have the people to make use of the helps they gave them for the understanding of the scripture, and do accordingly. As long as their comments did illustrate the text, did make plain, and not make void, the commandment of God; so far they must be observed and obeyed. We must not think the worse of good truths for their being preached by bad ministers; nor of good laws for their being executed by bad magistrates. Though it is most desirable to have our food brought by angels, yet, if God send it to us by ravens, if it be good and wholesome, we must take it, and thank God for it.

II. He condemns the men. He had ordered the multitude to do as they taught; not to do as they did, to beware of their leaven; Do not ye after their works. As we must not swallow corrupt doctrines for the sake of any laudable practices of those that teach them, so we must not imitate any bad examples for the sake of the plausible doctrines of those that set them.

Our Saviour here, and in the following verses, specifies divers particulars of their works, wherein we must not imitate them. In general, they are charged with hypocrisy, dissimulation, or double-dealing in religion.

Four things are in these verses charged upon them.

1. Their saying and doing were two things. They say, and do not; they teach out of the law that which is good, but their conversation gives them the lie. Those are of all sinners most inexcusable that allow themselves in the sins they condemn in others, or in worse. This doth especially touch wicked ministers; for what greater hypocrisy can there be, than to press that upon others, which they themselves disbelieve and disobey; pulling down in their practice what they build up in their preaching; when in the pulpit, preaching so well that it is a pity they should ever come out; but, when out of the pulpit, living so ill that it is a pity they should ever come in; like bells, that call others to church, but hang out of it themselves.

It is applicable to all others that say, and do not; that make a plausible profession of religion, but do not live up to that profession. Great talkers, but little doers.

2. They were very severe in imposing upon others those things which they were not themselves willing to submit to the burthen of (v. 4); They bind heavy burthens. and grievous to be borne; not only insisting upon the minute circumstances of the law, but by imposing their own inventions and traditions, under the highest penalties. They loved to show their authority and to exercise their domineering faculty.

But see their hypocrisy; They themselves will not move them with one of their fingers. They pressed upon the people a strictness in religion which they themselves would not be bound by. They indulged their pride in giving law to others; but consulted their ease in their own practice. They would not ease the people in these things, nor put a finger to lighten their burthen, when they saw it pinched them.

3. They were all for show, and nothing for substance, in religion (v. 5); All their works they do, to be seen of men. We must do such good works, that they who see them may glorify God; but we must not proclaim our good works, with design that others may see them, and glorify us. All their end was to be praised of men, and therefore all their endeavour was to be seen of men. The form of godliness will get them a name to live, which is all they aim at, and therefore they trouble not themselves with the power of it, which is essential to a life indeed. He that does all to be seen does nothing to the purpose.

He specifies two things which they did to be seen of men.

(1) They made broad their phylacteries. Those were little scrolls of paper or parchment, wherein were written, with great niceness, these four paragraphs of the law, Exod. xiii. 2–11; xiii. 11–16; Deut. vi. 4–9; xi. 13–21. These were sewn up in leather, and worn upon their foreheads and left arms. Now the Pharisees made broad these phylacteries, that they might be thought more holy, and strict, and zealous for the law, than others. It is a gracious ambition to covet to be really more holy than others, but it is a proud ambition to covet to appear so. It is good to excel in real piety, but not to exceed in outward shows.

(2) They enlarged the borders of their garments. God appointed the Jews to make borders or fringes upon their garments (Num. xv. 38), to be a memorandum to them of their being a peculiar people; but the Pharisees were not content to have these borders like other people's; they must be larger than ordinary, to answer their design of making themselves to be taken notice of; as if they were more religious than others.

4. They much affected pre-eminence and superiority. Pride was the darling reigning sin of the Pharisees. He describes their pride, v. 6, 7. They courted, and coveted places of honour and respect. In all public appearances, as at feasts, and in the synagogues, they expected, and had, to their hearts' delight, the uppermost rooms and the chief seats. They took place of all others, and precedency was adjudged to them, as persons of the greatest note and merit. It is not possessing the uppermost rooms, nor sitting in the chief seats, that is condemned (somebody must sit uppermost), but loving them. What is that but making an idol of ourselves, and then falling down and worshipping it—the worst kind of idolatry! It is bad anywhere, but especially in the synagogues. There to seek honour to ourselves, where we appear in order to give glory to God, and to humble ourselves before him, is indeed to mock God instead of serving him. It savours much of pride and hypocrisy, when people do not care for going to church, unless they can look fine and make a figure there.

Titles of honour and respect. They loved greetings in the markets, loved to have people put off their hats to them, and show them respect when they met them in the streets. This was meat and drink and dainties to them. The greetings would not have done them half so much good, if they had not been in the markets, where everybody might see how much they were respected, and how high they stood in the opinion of the people. For him that is taught in the word to give respect to him that teaches is commendable enough in him that gives it; but for him that teaches to love it, and demand it, is sinful and abominable; and, instead of teaching he has need to learn the first lesson in the school of Christ, which is humility. He cautions his disciples against being herein like them; "But be not ye called so, for ye shall not be of such a spirit," v. 8, &c.

Here is, A prohibition of pride. They are here forbidden to challenge titles of honour and dominion to themselves, v. 8–10. It is repeated twice; Be not called Rabbi, neither be ye called Master or Guide. Christ's ministers must not affect the name of Rabbi or Master, by way of distinction from other people; it is not agreeable to the simplicity of the gospel. They must not assume the authority and dominion implied in those names. The reasons for this prohibition are,

(1) One is your Master, even Christ, v. 8, and again, v. 10. Christ only is our Master, ministers are but ushers in the school.

(2) All ye are brethren. Ye are brethren, as ye are all disciples of the same Master. School-fellows are brethren, and, as such, should help one another in getting their lesson; but it will by no means be allowed that one of the scholars step into the master's seat, and give law to the school. They are forbidden to ascribe such titles to others (v. 9); "Call no man your father upon the earth; constitute no man the father of your religion." God only must be allowed as the Father of our spirits, Heb. xii. 9. Our religion must not be derived from, or made to depend upon, any man. We must not pin our faith on any man's sleeve, because we know not whither he will carry it. St. Paul calls himself a Father (1 Cor. iv. 15; Phil. 10); but he uses that title to denote, not authority, but affection: therefore he calls them not his obliged, but his beloved, sons, 1 Cor. iv. 14.

The reason given is, One is your Father, who is in heaven. He is the Fountain of it, and its Founder; the Life of it, and its Lord; from whom alone, as the Original, our spiritual life is derived, and on whom it depends. Christ having taught us to say, Our Father, who art in heaven; let us call no man Father upon earth. Here is a precept of humility and mutual subjection (v. 11); He that is greatest among you shall be your servant. Take it as a promise; "He shall stand highest in the favour of God, that is most submissive and serviceable": or as a precept; "He that is advanced to any place of dignity, let him be your servant." He that is greatest is not a lord, but a minister. Here is a good reason for all this, v. 12. Consider,

First, The punishment intended for the proud; Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be abased. If God give them repentance, they will be abased in their own eyes, and will abhor themselves for it; if they repent not, sooner or later they will be abased before the world.

Secondly, The preferment intended for the humble; He that shall humble himself shall be exalted. In this world the humble have the honour of being accepted with the holy God, and respected by all wise and good men; of being qualified for, and often called out to, the most honourable services; for honour is like the shadow, which flees from those that pursue it, and grasp at it, but follows those that flee from it. However, in the other world, they that have humbled themselves in contrition for their sin, shall be exalted to inherit the throne of glory.

Verses 13–33

In these verses we have eight woes levelled directly against the scribes and Pharisees by our Lord Jesus Christ, like so many claps of thunder, or flashes of lightning, from mount Sinai. Here are eight woes, in opposition to the eight beatitudes, Matt. v. 3. These woes are the more remarkable because of the meekness and gentleness of him that denounced them. He came to bless, and loved to bless; but, if his wrath be kindled, there is surely cause for it.

This is here the burthen of the song, and it is a heavy burthen; Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites. The scribes and Pharisees were hypocrites; that is it in which all the rest of their bad characters are summed up. A hypocrite is a stage-player in religion (that is the primary signification of the word); he personates or acts the part of one that he neither is nor may be, or perhaps that he neither is nor would be.

Now each of these woes against the scribes and Pharisees has a reason annexed to it, justifying the judgment of Christ upon them; for his woes, his curses, are never causeless.

I. They were sworn enemies to the gospel of Christ, and consequently to the salvation of the souls of men (v. 13); They shut up the kingdom of heaven, against men. Christ came to open the kingdom of heaven to bring men to be subjects of that kingdom. Now the scribes and Pharisees, who sat in Moses's seat, and pretended to the key of knowledge, ought to have contributed their assistance herein. They that undertook to expound Moses and the prophets should have showed the people how they testified of Christ. Thus they might have facilitated that great work, and have helped thousands to heaven; but, instead of this, they shut up the kingdom of heaven; they made it their business to beget and nourish up in the minds of the people prejudices against Christ and his doctrine.

1. They would not go in themselves; Have any of the rulers, or of the Pharisees, believed on him? John vii. 48. No; they were too proud to stoop to his meanness; they did not like a religion which insisted so much on humility. Repentance was the door of admission into this kingdom, and nothing could be more disagreeable to the Pharisees than to repent. Therefore they went not in themselves; but that was not all.

2. They would not suffer them that were entering to go in. It is bad to keep away from Christ ourselves, but it is worse to keep others from him. Their not going in themselves was a hindrance to many; multitudes rejected the gospel only because their leaders did. They opposed both Christ's entertaining of sinners (Luke vii. 39), and sinners' entertaining of Christ; and used all their wit and power to serve their malice against him; and thus they shut up the kingdom of heaven, so that they who would enter into it must suffer violence (ch. xi. 12), and press into it (Luke xvi. 16).

II. They made religion and the form of godliness a cloak and stalking-horse to their covetous practices and desires, v. 14. Observe here,

1. What their wicked practices were; they devoured widows' houses, either by quartering themselves and their attendants upon them for entertainment; or by insinuating themselves into their affections, and so getting to be the trustees of their estates, which they could make an easy prey of. The thing they aimed at was to enrich themselves. And doubtless they did all this under colour of law; for they did it so artfully that it passed uncensured.

2. What was the cloak with which they covered this wicked practice; For a pretence they made long prayers; very long indeed, if it be true which some of the Jewish writers tell us, that they spent three hours at a time in the formalities of meditation and prayer, and did it thrice every day. By this craft they got their wealth, and maintained their grandeur. Christ doth not here condemn long prayers, as in themselves hypocritical. Christ himself continued all night in prayer to God. Where there are many sins to be confessed, and many wants to pray for the supply of, and many mercies to give thanks for, there is occasion for long prayers. But the Pharisees' long prayers were for a pretence; by them they got the reputation of pious devout men, that loved prayer, and were the favourites of Heaven; and by this means people were made to believe it was not possible that such men as they should cheat them. Thus, while they seemed to soar heaven-ward, upon the wings of prayer, their eye, like the kite's, was all the while upon their prey on the earth, some widow's house or other that lay convenient for them. It is no new thing for the show and form of godliness to be made a cloak to the greatest enormities.

3. The doom passed upon them for this; Therefore ye shall receive the greater damnation. The pretences of religion, with which hypocrites disguise or excuse their sin now, will aggravate their condemnation shortly.

III. They shut up the kingdom of heaven against those that would turn to Christ, but at the same time compassed sea and land to make proselytes to themselves, v. 15.

1. Their commendable industry in making proselytes to the Jewish religion; for this, for one such, though but one, they compass sea and land. And what did they aim at? Not the glory of God, and the good of souls; but that they might have the credit of making them proselytes. The making of proselytes, if it be to the truth and serious godliness, and be done with a good design, is a good work. Such is the value of souls, that nothing must be thought too much to do, to save a soul from death. The industry of the Pharisees herein may show the negligence of many who would be thought to act from better principles, but will be at no pains or cost to propagate the gospel.

2. Their cursed impiety in abusing their proselytes when they were made. "Ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves." They are called children of hell, because of their rooted enmity to the kingdom of heaven, which was the principle and genius of Pharisaism. Perverted proselytes are commonly the greatest bigots; the scholars outdid their masters, (1) In fondness of ceremony. Weak heads commonly admire those shows and ceremonies which wise men cannot but think meanly of. (2) In fury against Christianity. Paul, a disciple of the Pharisees, was exceedingly mad against the Christians (Acts xxvi. 11), when his master, Gamaliel, seems to have been more moderate.

IV. They led the people into dangerous mistakes, particularly in the matter of oaths; which have been by all nations accounted sacred (v. 16); Ye blind guides. Christ denounces a woe to the blind guides that have the blood of so many souls to answer for.

(1) He lays down the doctrine they taught. They distinguished between an oath by the temple and an oath by the gold of the temple; an oath by the altar and an oath by the gift upon the altar; making the latter binding, but not the former. Here was a double wickedness; First, That there were some oaths which they dispensed with, and made light of, and reckoned a man was not bound by to assert the truth, or perform a promise. That doctrine cannot be of the God of truth which gives countenance to the breach of faith in any case whatsoever. Oaths are edge-tools and are not to be jested with. Secondly, That they preferred the gold before the temple, and the gift before the altar, to encourage people to bring gifts to the altar, and gold to the treasures of the temple, which they hoped to be gainers by.

(2) He shows the folly and absurdity of this distinction (v. 17–19); Ye fools, and blind.

To convict them of folly, he appeals to themselves, Whether is greater, the gold or the temple that sanctifies the gold; the gift, or the altar that sanctifies the gift? They that sware by the gold of the temple had an eye to it as holy; but what was it that made it holy but the holiness of the temple, to the service of which it was appropriated? And therefore the temple cannot be less holy than the gold, but must be more so.

(3) He rectifies the mistake (v. 20–22), by reducing all the oaths they had invented to the true intent of an oath, which is, By the name of the Lord: so that though an oath by the temple, or the altar, or heaven, be formally bad, yet it is binding. He that swears by the altar shall be interpreted by it and by all things thereon. And, the things thereon being offered up to God, to swear by it and them was, in effect, to call God himself to witness: for it was the altar of God; and he that went to that, went to God. He that swears by the temple, if he understand what he does, cannot but apprehend that the ground of such a respect to it is because it is the house of God, the place which he has chosen to put his name there; and therefore he swears by it, and by him that dwells therein. If a man swears by heaven, he sins (ch. v. 34); yet he shall not therefore be discharged from the obligation of his oath; no, God will make him know that the heaven he swears by, is his throne (Isa. lxvi. 1); and he that swears by the throne, appeals to him that sits upon it.

V. They were very strict and precise in the smaller matters of the law, but as careless and loose in the weightier matters, v. 23, 24. They were partial in the law. Sincere obedience is universal, and he that from a right principle obeys any of God's precepts, will have respect to them all. The partiality of the scribes and Pharisees appears here, in two instances.

1. They observed smaller duties, but omitted greater; they were very exact in paying tithes, when it came to mint, anise, and cummin, their exactness in tithing of which would not cost them much, but would be cried up, and they should buy reputation cheap. The Pharisee boasted of this, I give tithes of all that I possess, Luke xviii. 12. Paying tithes was their duty; Christ tells them they ought not to leave it undone. All ought in their places to contribute to the support and maintenance of a standing ministry. They that are taught in the word, and do not communicate to them that teach them, that love a cheap gospel, come short of the Pharisees.

But that which Christ here condemns them for, is, that they omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. All the things of God's law are weighty, but those are most weighty, which are most expressive of inward holiness in the heart. Judgment and mercy toward men, and faith toward God, are the weightier matters of the law, the good things which the Lord our God requires (Mic. vi. 8), to do justly, and love mercy, and humble ourselves by faith to walk with God. This is the obedience which is better than sacrifice or tithe. Mercy also is preferred before sacrifice, Hos. vi. 6. Nor will judgment and mercy serve without faith in divine revelation; for God will be honoured in his truths as well as in his laws.

2. They avoided lesser sins, but committed greater (v. 24); Ye blind guides; so he had called them before (v. 16), for their corrupt teaching; here he calls them so for their corrupt living. They were blind and partial; they strained at a gnat, and swallowed a camel. In their doctrine they strained at gnats, warned people against every least violation of the tradition of the elders. In their practice they strained at gnats, heaved at them, with a seeming dread, as if they had a great abhorrence of sin, and were afraid of it in the least instance; but they made no difficulty of those sins which, in comparison with them, were as a camel to a gnat. It is not the scrupling of a little sin that Christ here reproves, if it be a sin, though but a gnat, it must be strained at, but the doing of that, and then swallowing a camel.

VI. They were all for the outside, and not at all for the inside, of religion. This is illustrated by two similitudes.

1. They are compared to a vessel that is clean washed on the outside, but all dirt within, v. 25, 26. Now what a foolish thing would it be for a man to wash only the outside of a cup, which is to be looked at, and to leave the inside dirty, which is to be used; so they do who only avoid scandalous sins, that would spoil their reputation with men, but allow themselves in heart-wickedness, which renders them odious to the pure and holy God. In reference to this, observe,

(1) The practice of the Pharisees; they made clean the outside. In those things which fell under the observation of their neighbours, they seemed very exact; people generally took them for very good men. But within they were full of extortion and excess. While they would seem to be godly, they were neither sober nor righteous. And that we are really, which we are inwardly.

(2) The rule Christ gives, in opposition to this practice, v. 26. Those are blind, in Christ's account, who are strangers, and no enemies, to the wickedness of their own hearts; who see not, and hate not, the secret sin that lodgeth there. Self-ignorance is the most shameful and hurtful ignorance. The rule is, Cleanse first that which is within. The main business of a Christian lies within, to get cleansed from the filthiness of the spirit. Those sins must be conscientiously abstained from, which the eye of God only is a witness to, who searcheth the heart. Cleanse first that which is within; not that only, but that first; because, if due care be taken concerning that, the outside will be clean also. If renewing, sanctifying grace make clean the inside, that will have an influence upon the outside, for the commanding principle is within. If the heart be well kept, all is well, for out of it are the issues of life. First cleanse that which is within; we then make sure work, when this is our first work.

2. They are compared to whited sepulchres, v. 27, 28.

(1) They were fair without, like sepulchres, which appear beautiful outward. Some make it to refer to the custom of the Jews to whiten graves, that people might avoid them, because of the ceremonial pollution contracted by the touch of a grave. The formality of hypocrites doth but make all wise and good men the more careful to avoid them. It rather alludes to the custom of whitening the sepulchres of eminent persons, for the beautifying of them. It is said here (v. 29), that they garnished the sepulchres of the righteous. Now the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees was like the ornaments of a grave, only for show. The top of their ambition was to appear righteous before men, and to be applauded and had in admiration by them.

(2) They were foul within, like sepulchres, full of dead men's bones, and all uncleanness. Thus were they full of hypocrisy and iniquity. It is possible for those that have their hearts full of sin, to have their lives free from blame, and to appear very good. But what will it avail us, to have the good work of our fellow-servants, if our Master doth not say, Well done?

VII. They pretended a deal of kindness for the memory of the prophets that were dead and gone, while they hated and persecuted those that were present with them. God is jealous for his honour in his laws and ordinances; but he has often expressed an equal jealousy for his honour in his prophets and ministers. Therefore, when our Lord Jesus comes to this head, he speaks more fully than upon any of the other (v. 29–37).

1. The respect which the scribes and Pharisees pretended for the prophets that were gone, v. 29, 30.

(1) They honoured the relics of the prophets, they built their tombs, and garnished their sepulchres. The memory of the just is blessed, when the names of those that hated and persecuted them shall be covered with shame. This is an instance of the hypocrisy of the scribes and Pharisees, who paid their respect to them. They can pay respect to the writings of the dead prophets, which tell them what they should be; but not the reproofs of the living prophets, which tell them what they are.

(2) They protested against the murder of them (v. 30); If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them. No, not they, they would sooner have lost their right hands than have done any such thing. And yet they were at this time plotting to murder Christ, to whom all the prophets bore witness. The deceitfulness of sinners' hearts appears very much in this, that, while they go down the stream of the sins of their own day, they fancy they should have swum against the stream of the sins of the former days; that, if they had had other people's opportunities, they should have improved them more faithfully. We are sometimes thinking, if we had lived when Christ was upon earth, how constantly we would have followed him; we would not have despised and rejected him, as they then did; and yet Christ in his Spirit, in his word, in his ministers, is still no better treated.

2. Their enmity and opposition to Christ and his gospel, notwithstanding, and the ruin they were bringing upon themselves and upon that generation thereby, v. 31–33. Observe here,

(1) The indictment proved; Ye are witnesses against yourselves. Sinners cannot hope to escape the judgment of Christ for want of proof against them, when it is easy to find them witnesses against themselves. By their own confession, it was the great wickedness of their forefathers, to kill the prophets. They who condemn sin in others, and yet allow the same or worse in themselves, are of all others most inexcusable, Rom. i. 32–ii. 1. By their own confession, these notorious persecutors were their ancestors; Ye are the children of them. Christ turns it upon them, that they were so by spirit and disposition. They are, as you say, your fathers, and you take after your fathers; it is the sin that runs in the blood among you.

(2) The sentence passed upon them. Christ here proceeds,

[1] To give them up to sin as irreclaimable (v. 32); Fill ye up then the measure of your fathers. Christ knew they were now contriving his death, and in a few days would accomplish it; "Well," saith he, "go on with your plot, walk in the way of your heart and in the sight of your eyes, and see what will come of it. You will but fill up the measure of guilt. First, There is a measure of sin to be filled up. God will bear long, but the time will come when he can no longer forbear. Secondly, Children fill up the measure of their father's sins when they are gone, if they persist in the same or the like. That national guilt which brings national ruin is made up of the sin of many in several ages. God justly visits the iniquity of the fathers upon the children that tread in the steps of it. Thirdly, Persecuting Christ, and his people and ministers, is a sin that fills the measure of a nation's guilt sooner than any other. Fourthly, It is just with God to give those up to their own heart's lusts, who obstinately persist in the gratification of them.

[2] He proceeds to give them up to ruin as irrecoverable, to a personal ruin in the other world (v. 33); Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell? These are strange words to come from the mouth of Christ, into whose lips grace was poured. But he can and will speak terror.

Here is, First, Their description; Ye serpents. Doth Christ call names? Yes, but this doth not warrant us to do so. He infallibly knew what was in man. They were a generation of vipers; they and those that joined with them, were a generation of envenomed, enraged, spiteful adversaries to Christ and his gospel. Christ calls them serpents and vipers; for he gives men their true characters, and delights to put contempt upon the proud.

Secondly, Their doom. How can ye escape the damnation of hell? Christ himself preached hell and damnation, for which his ministers have often been reproached by those that care not to hear of it. This doom coming from Christ, was more terrible than coming from all the prophets and ministers that ever were, for he is the Judge, into whose hands the keys of hell and death are put. There is a way of escaping this damnation. Repentance and faith are necessary to that escape; and how will they be brought to these, who are so conceited of themselves, and so prejudiced against Christ and his gospel, as they were? Publicans and harlots, who were sensible of their disease and applied themselves to the Physician, were more likely to escape the damnation of hell than those who, though they were in the high road to it, were confident they were in the way to heaven.

Verses 34–39

We have left the blind leaders fallen into the ditch; let us see what will become of the blind followers, and particularly Jerusalem.

I. Jesus Christ designs yet to try them with the means of grace; I send unto you prophets, and wise men, and scribes. One would think it should follow, "Therefore you shall never have a prophet sent to you any more;" but no, "Therefore I will send unto you prophets, to see if you will yet at length be wrought upon, or else to leave you inexcusable."

1. It is Christ that sends them; I send. By this he avows himself to be God, having power to gift and commission prophets. It is an act of kingly office. After his resurrection, he made this word good, when he said, So send I you, John xx. 21.

2. He sends them to the Jews first; "I send them to you." They began at Jerusalem; and, wherever they went, they observed this rule, to make the first tender of gospel grace to the Jews, Acts xiii. 46.

3. Those he sends are called prophets, wise men, and scribes, Old Testament names for New Testament officers. We may take the apostles and evangelists for the prophets and wise men, and the pastors and teachers for the scribes, instructed to the kingdom of heaven (ch. xiii. 52); for the office of a scribe was honourable till the men dishonoured it.

II. He foresees and foretells the ill usage that his messengers would meet with among them; "Some of them ye shall kill and crucify, and yet I will send them." Christ knows beforehand how ill his servants will be treated, and yet sends them; yet he loves them never the less, for he designs to glorify himself by their sufferings, and them after them; he will counter-balance them, though not prevent them.

1. The cruelty of these persecutors; Ye shall kill and crucify them. It is no less than the blood, the life-blood, that they thirst after. Thus did the members partake of the sufferings of the Head, he was killed and crucified, and so were they. Christians must expect to resist unto blood.

2. Their unwearied industry; Ye shall persecute them from city to city. As the apostles went from city to city, to preach the gospel, the Jews dodged them, and haunted them, and stirred up persecution against them, Acts xiv. 19; xvii. 13.

3. The pretence of religion in this; they scourged them in their synagogues, so that they did it as a piece of service to the church.

III. He imputes the sin of their fathers to them, because they imitated it; That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, v. 35, 36. Though God bear long with a persecuting generation, he will not bear always; and patience abused, turns into the greatest wrath.

Observe, 1. The extent of this imputation; it takes in all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, that is, the blood shed for righteousness' sake. He dates the account from the blood of righteous Abel. How early did martyrdom come into the world! He extends it to the blood of Zacharias, the son of Barachias (v. 36), as is most probable, Zechariah the son of Jehoiada, who was slain in the court of the Lord's house, 2 Chron. xxiv. 20, 21. His father is called Barachias, which signifies much the same with Jehoiada; and it was usual among the Jews for the same person to have two names; whom ye slew, ye of this nation, though not of this generation.

2. The effect of it; All these things shall come; all the guilt of this blood, all the punishment of it, it shall all come upon this generation. The destruction shall be so dreadful, as if God had once for all arraigned them for all the righteous blood shed in the world. It shall come upon this generation; which intimates, that it shall come quickly; some here shall live to see it. The sorer and nearer the punishment of sin is, the louder is the call to repentance and reformation.

IV. He laments the wickedness of Jerusalem, and justly upbraids them with the many kind offers he had made them, v. 37. See with what concern he speaks of that city; O Jerusalem, Jerusalem! The repetition is emphatic, and bespeaks abundance of commiseration. A day or two before Christ had wept over Jerusalem, now he sighed and groaned over it. Jerusalem, the vision of peace (so it signifies), must now be the seat of war and confusion. But wherefore will the Lord do all this to Jerusalem? Why? Jerusalem hath grievously sinned.

1. She persecuted God's messengers; Thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them that are sent unto thee. This sin is especially charged upon Jerusalem; because there the Sanhedrim, or great council, sat, who took cognizance of church matters, and therefore a prophet could not perish but in Jerusalem, Luke xiii. 33. They killed the prophets in popular tumults, mobbed them, as Stephen, and put the Roman powers on to kill them. At Jerusalem, where the gospel was first preached, it was first persecuted (Acts viii. 1), and that place was the headquarters of the persecutors; and thither the saints were brought bound, Acts ix. 2. Thou stonest them. There was abundance of other wickedness in Jerusalem; but this was the sin that made the loudest cry, and which God had an eye to more than any other.

2. She refused and rejected Christ, and gospel offers. The former was a sin without remedy, this against the remedy. The wonderful grace and favour of Jesus Christ toward them; How often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings! The favour proposed was the gathering of them. Christ's design is to gather poor souls, gather them in from their wanderings, gather them home to himself. It is here illustrated by a humble similitude; as a hen clucks her chickens together. Christ would have gathered them, First, With such a tenderness of affection as the hen does, which has, by instinct, a peculiar concern for her young ones. Christ's gathering of souls, comes from his love, Jer. xxxi. 3. Secondly, For the same end. The hen gathered her chickens under her wings, for protection and safety, and for warmth and comfort. The chickens naturally run to the hen for shelter, when they are threatened by the birds of prey; perhaps Christ refers to that promise (Ps. xci. 4), He shall cover thee with his feathers. There is healing under Christ's wings; that is more than the hen has for her chickens. The forwardness of Christ to confer this favour. His offers are, First, Very free; I would have done it. Secondly, Very frequent; How often! Christ often came up to Jerusalem, preached, and wrought miracles there. As often as we have heard the sound of the gospel, as often as we have felt the strivings of the Spirit, so often Christ would have gathered us. Their wilful refusal of this grace and favour; Ye would not. I would, and ye would not. He was willing to save them, but they were not willing to be saved by him.

V. He reads Jerusalem's doom (v. 38, 39); Therefore behold your house is left unto you desolate. Both the city and the temple, God's house and their own, all shall be laid waste. But it is especially meant of the temple, which they boasted of, and trusted to.

1. Their house shall be deserted; It is left unto you. Christ was now departing from the temple, and never came into it again. They doated on it, would have it to themselves; Christ must have no room or interest there. "Well," saith Christ, "it is left to you; take it, and made your best of it; I will never have anything more to do with it." Their city also was left to them, destitute of God's presence and grace.

2. It shall be desolate; It is left unto you desolate. It was immediately, when Christ left it, in the eyes of all that understood themselves, a very dismal melancholy place. Christ's departure makes the best furnished, best replenished place a wilderness. For what comfort can there be where Christ is not? This comes of men's rejecting Christ, and driving him away from them. It was, not long after, destroyed and ruined, and not one stone left upon another. The temple, that holy and beautiful house, became desolate. When God goes out, all enemies break in.

Lastly, Here is the final farewell that Christ took of them and their temple; Ye shall not see me henceforth, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh. This bespeaks,

3. His departure from them. The time was at hand, when he should leave the world, to go to his Father, and be seen no more. After his resurrection, he was seen only by a few chosen witnesses, and they saw him not long, but he soon removed to the invisible world, and there will be till the time of the restitution of all things, when his welcome at his first coming will be repeated with loud acclamations; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord. Would we have our lot in that day with those that say, Blessed is he that cometh? let us be with them now, with them that truly worship, and truly welcome, Jesus Christ.

4. Their continued blindness and obstinacy; Ye shall not see me, that is, not see the light of the truth concerning me, nor the things that belong to your peace, till ye shall say, Blessed is he that cometh. Wilful blindness is often punished with judicial blindness. If they will not see, they shall not see. With this word he concludes his public preaching. When the Lord comes with ten thousand of his saints, he will convince all. They who now reproach and ridicule the hosannas of the saints will be of another mind shortly; it were therefore better to be of that mind now.

CHAP. XXIV

In this chapter, we have a prophetical discourse, intended, not to gratify the curiosity of his disciples, but to guide their consciences. I. The occasion of his discourse, ver. 1–3. II. The discourse itself, in which we have, 1. The prophecy of divers events, especially referring to the destruction of Jerusalem; the prefaces to that destruction, the concomitants and consequences of it; yet looking further, to Christ's coming at the end of time, and the consummation of all things, ver. 4–31. 2. The practical application of this prophecy, ver. 32–51.

Verses 1–3

I. Christ's quitting the temple, and his public work there. He had said, in the close of the foregoing chapter, Your house is left unto you desolate; and here he made his words good; He went out, and departed from the temple. He departed from it, never to return to it any more; and then immediately follows a prediction of its ruin. That house is left desolate indeed, which Christ leaves. But Christ departed not till they drove him away; did not reject them, till they first rejected him.

II. His private discourse with his disciples; he left the temple, but he did not leave the twelve. When he left the temple, his disciples left it too, and came to him. It is good being where Christ is, and leaving that which he leaves.

1. His disciples came to him, to show him the buildings of the temple. It was a stately and beautiful structure. It was richly furnished with gifts and offerings. They showed Christ these things, and desired him to take notice of them, either,

(1) As being greatly pleased with them themselves, and expecting he should be so too. They had lived mostly in Galilee, at a distance from the temple, had seldom seen it, and therefore were the more struck with admiration at it, and thought he should admire as much as they did all this glory. Even good men are apt to be too much enamoured with outward pomp and gaiety, and to overvalue it, even in the things of God. The temple was indeed glorious, but, [1] Its glory was sullied and stained with the sin of the priests and people. [2] Its glory was eclipsed and outdone by the presence of Christ in it.

Or, (2) As grieving that this house should be left desolate; they showed him the buildings, as if they would move him to reverse the sentence. Christ had lately looked upon the precious souls, and wept for them, Luke xix. 41. The disciples look upon the pompous buildings, and are ready to weep for them. In this, as in other things, his thoughts are not like ours.

2. Christ, hereupon, foretells the utter ruin and destruction that were coming upon this place, v. 2. A believing foresight of the defacing of all worldly glory will help to take us off from overvaluing it. See ye not all these things? They would have Christ look upon them, and be as much in love with them as they were. There is such a sight of these things as will do us good; so to see them as to see through them and see to the end of them.

Christ, instead of reversing the decree, ratifies it; Verily, I say unto you, there shall not be left one stone upon another. He speaks of it as a certain ruin; "I say unto you." I, that know what I say. He speaks of it as an utter ruin. The temple shall not only be stripped, and plundered, and defaced, but utterly demolished and laid waste; Not one stone shall be left unto another. Though Titus, when he took the city, did all he could to preserve the temple, yet he could not restrain the enraged soldiers from destroying it utterly; and it was done to that degree, that Turnus Rufus ploughed up the ground on which it had stood.

3. The disciples enquire more particularly of the time when it should come to pass, and the signs of its approach, v. 3.

(1) Where they made this enquiry; privately, as he sat upon the mount of Olives; probably, he was returning to Bethany, and there sat down by the way, to rest him; the mount of Olives directly faced the temple, and from thence he might have a full prospect of it at some distance.

(2) What the enquiry itself was; When shall these things be; and what shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world? Here are three questions.

[1] Some think these questions do all point at one and the same thing—the destruction of the temple. Or, they thought the destruction of the temple must needs be the end of the world.

[2] Others think their question, When shall these things be? refers to the destruction of Jerusalem, and the other two to the end of the world. They had very confused thoughts of future events; so that perhaps it is not possible to put any certain construction upon this question of theirs.

Verses 4–31

The disciples had asked concerning the times, When shall these things be? Christ gives them no answer to that. But they had asked, What shall be the sign? That question he answers fully. Now the prophecy primarily respects the events near at hand; but as the prophecies of the Old Testament, which have an immediate reference to the affairs of the Jews, do certainly look further, to the gospel church and the kingdom of the Messiah, and are so expounded in the New Testament, so this prophecy, under the type of Jerusalem's destruction, looks as far forward as the general judgment. What Christ here saith to his disciples tends more to engage their caution than to satisfy their curiosity; more to prepare them for the events that should happen than to give them a distinct idea of the events themselves.

I. Christ begins with a caution, Take heed that no man deceive you. They expected to be told when these things should be, to be let into that secret; but this caution is a check to their curiosity, "What is that to you? Mind you your duty, follow me, and be not seduced from following me." Seducers are more dangerous enemies to the church than persecutors.

Three times in this discourse he mentions the appearing of false prophets, which was, 1. A presage of Jerusalem's ruin. Justly were they who killed the true prophets, left to be ensnared by false prophets; and they who crucified the true Messiah, left to be deceived and broken by false Christs and pretended Messiahs. 2. It was a trial to the disciples of Christ, and therefore agreeable to their state of probation, that they which are perfect, may be made manifest.

Now concerning these deceivers, observe here,

(1) The pretences they should come under. Satan acts most mischievously, when he appears as an angel of light: the colour of the greatest good is often the cover of the greatest evil. There should appear false prophets (v. 11–24); the deceivers would pretend to divine inspiration, when it was all a lie. Some think, the seducers here pointed to were such as had been settled teachers in the church, and revolted to error; and from such the danger is the greater, because least suspected. One false traitor in the garrison may do more mischief than a thousand avowed enemies without. There should appear false Christs, coming in Christ's name (v. 5), assuming to themselves the name peculiar to him, and saying, I am Christ, pseudo-christs, v. 24. There was at that time a general expectation of the appearing of the Messias; they spoke of him; as he that should come; but when he did come, the body of the nation rejected him; which those who were ambitious of making themselves a name, took advantage of, and set up for Christs. These false Christs and false prophets would have their agents and emissaries busy in all places to draw people unto them, v. 23. Then when public troubles are great and threatening, and people will be catching at anything that looks like deliverance, then Satan will take the advantage of imposing on them; then they will say, Lo, here is a Christ, or there is one. The true Christ did not strive, nor cry; nor was it said of him, Lo, here! or Lo, there! (Luke xvii. 21). Christ is All in all, not here or there, but meets his people with a blessing in every place where he records his name.

(2) The proof they should offer for the making good of these pretences; They shall show great signs and wonders (v. 24), not true miracles, those are a divine seal, and with those the doctrine of Christ stands confirmed. It is not said, They shall work miracles, but, They shall show great signs; they are but a show.

(3) The success they should have in these attempts, They shall deceive many (v. 5), and again, v. 11. The devil and his instruments may prevail far in deceiving poor souls; few find the strait gate, but many are drawn into the broad way. They shall deceive, if it were possible, the very elect, v. 24. This bespeaks, First, The strength of the delusion; it is such as many shall be carried away by (so strong shall the stream be), even those that were thought to stand fast. Nothing but the almighty grace of God, pursuant to his eternal purpose, will be a protection. Secondly, The safety of the elect in the midst of this danger, which is taken for granted in that parenthesis, If it were possible, plainly implying that it is not possible, for they are kept by the power of God. Used proverbially by Galen; when he would express a thing very difficult and morally impossible, he saith, "You may sooner draw away a Christian from Christ."

(4) The repeated cautions which our Saviour gives; therefore he gave them warning, that they might watch (v. 25); Behold, I have told you before. He that is told before where he will be assaulted, may save himself. Christ's warnings are designed to engage our watchfulness. We are kept through faith, faith in Christ's word, which he has told us before. We must not believe those who say, Lo, here is Christ; or, Lo, he is there, v. 23. We believe that the true Christ is at the right hand of God, and that his spiritual presence is where two or three are gathered together in his name. There is not a greater enemy to true faith than vain credulity. The simple believeth every word, and runs after every cry. We must not go forth after those that say, He is in the desert, or, He is in the secret chambers, v. 26. We must not follow everyone that puts up the finger to point us to a new Christ, and a new gospel. Many a man's vain curiosity to go forth hath led him into a fatal apostasy.

II. He foretells wars and great commotions among the nations, v. 6, 7. When Christ was born, there was a universal peace in the empire, the temple of Janus was shut; but think not that Christ came to send, or continue such a peace (Luke xii. 51); no, his city and his wall are to be built even in troublesome times, and even wars shall forward his work.

1. A prediction of the event of the day; You will now shortly hear of wars, and rumours of wars. When wars are, they will be heard. See how terrible it is. Even the quiet in the land cannot but hear the rumours of war. See what comes of refusing the gospel! Those that will not hear the messengers of peace, shall be made to hear the messengers of war.

2. A prescription of the duty of the day; See that ye be not troubled. Is it possible to hear such sad news, and not be troubled? Yet, where the heart is fixed, trusting in God, it is kept in peace, and is not afraid. It is against the mind of Christ, that his people should have troubled hearts even in troublous times.

We must not be troubled, for two reasons.

(1) Because we are bid to expect this: the Jews must be punished; by this the justice of God and the honour of the Redeemer must be asserted; and therefore all those things must come to pass. God is but performing the thing that is appointed for us. Let us therefore acquiesce. The old house must be taken down (though it cannot be done without noise, and dust, and danger), ere the new fabric can be erected: the things that are shaken (and ill shaken they were) must be removed, that the things which cannot be shaken may remain, Heb. xii. 27.

(2) Because we are still to expect worse; The end is not yet; the end of time is not, and, while time lasts, we must expect trouble, or, "The end of these troubles is not yet. Do not give way to fear and trouble, sink not under the present burthen, but rather gather in all the strength and spirit you have, to encounter what is yet before you." If running with the footmen weary us, how shall we contend with horses? And if we be frightened at a little brook in our way, what shall we do in the swellings of Jordan? Jer. xii. 5.

III. He foretells other judgments more immediately sent of God—famines, pestilences, and earthquakes. These were the three judgments which David was to choose one out of; and he was in a great strait, for he knew not which was the worst. Beside war (and that is enough), there shall be, Famine, signified by the black horse under the third seal, Rev. vi. 5, 6. The sorest famine was in Jerusalem during the siege. Pestilences, signified by the pale horse, and death upon him, and the grave at his heels, under the fourth seal, Rev. vi. 7, 8. Earthquakes in divers places. Great desolations have sometimes been made by earthquakes, they have been the death of many, and the terror of more. But here they are spoken of as dreadful judgments, and yet but the beginning of sorrows.

IV. He foretells the persecution of his own people and ministers, and a general apostasy and decay in religion thereupon, v. 9, 10, 12.

1. The cross itself foretold, v. 9. Of all future events we are as much concerned, though commonly as little desirous, to know of our own sufferings as of anything else. Christ had told his disciples what hard things they should suffer; but they had hitherto experienced little of it, and therefore he reminds them again.

(1) They shall be afflicted with bonds and imprisonments.

(2) They shall be killed.

(3) They shall be hated of all nations for Christ's name's sake, as he had told them before, ch. x. 22. The world was generally leavened with enmity and malignity to Christians. What shall we think of this world, when the best men had the worst usage in it? It is the cause that makes the martyr, and comforts him; it was for Christ's sake that they were thus hated.

2. The offence of the cross, v. 10–12. Three ill effects of persecution are here foretold.

(1) The apostasy of some. When the profession of Christianity begins to cost men dear, then shall many be offended, shall first fall out with, and then fall off from, their profession. It is no new thing (though it is a strange thing) for those that have known the way of righteousness, to turn aside out of it. Suffering times are shaking times; and those fall in the storm, that stood in fair weather. Many will follow Christ in the sunshine, who will shift for themselves, and leave him to do so too, in the cloudy dark day.

(2) The malignity of others. Then they shall betray one another, that is, "Those that have treacherously deserted their religion, shall hate and betray those who adhere to it." Apostates have commonly been the most bitter and violent persecutors. Persecuting times are discovering times. Wolves in sheep's clothing will then throw off their disguise, and appear wolves: they shall betray one another, and hate one another.

(3) The general declining and cooling of most, v. 12. Expect these two things,

[1] The abounding of iniquity; though the world always lies in wickedness, yet there are some times in which it may be said, that iniquity doth in a special manner abound.

[2] The abating of love; this is the consequence of the former; Because iniquity shall abound the love of many shall wax cold. Understand it in general of true serious godliness, which is all summed up in love; it is too common for professors of religion to grow cool in their profession, when the wicked are hot in their wickedness. Or, it may be understood more particularly of brotherly love. When iniquity abounds, seducing iniquity, persecuting iniquity, this grace commonly waxes cold. Christians begin to be shy and suspicious one of another, and so love comes to nothing.

This gives a melancholy prospect of the times, that there shall be such a great decay of love; but, First, It is of the love of many, not of all. In the worst of times, God has his remnant that hold fast their integrity, and retain their zeal, as in Elijah's days, when he thought himself left alone. Secondly, This love is grown cold, but not dead. There is life in the root, which will show itself when the winter is past.

3. Comfort administered in reference to this offence of the cross, for the support of the Lord's people under it (v. 13); He that endures to the end, shall be saved. It is comfortable to those who wish well to the cause of Christ in general, that, though many are offended, yet some shall endure to the end. It is comfortable to those who do thus endure to the end, and suffer for their constancy, that they shall be saved. Perseverance wins the crown, through free grace, and shall wear it. They shall be saved. The crown of glory will make amends for all. Choose rather to die at a stake with the persecuted, than to live in a palace with the persecutors.

V. He foretells the preaching of the gospel in all the world (v. 14); This gospel shall be preached, and then shall the end come. It is called the gospel of the kingdom, because it reveals the kingdom of grace, which leads to the kingdom of glory. This gospel, sooner or later, is to be preached in all the world, to every creature. The gospel is preached for a witness to all nations, that is, a faithful declaration of the mind and will of God.

1. It is intimated that the gospel should be, if not heard, yet at least heard of, throughout the then known world, before the destruction of Jerusalem. Within forty years after Christ's death, the sound of the gospel was gone forth to the ends of the earth, Rom. x. 18. St. Paul fully preached the gospel from Jerusalem, and round about unto Illyricum; and the other apostles were not idle. The persecuting of the saints at Jerusalem helped to disperse them, so that they went everywhere, preaching the word, Acts viii. 1–4.

2. It is likewise intimated that even in times of temptation, trouble, and persecution, the gospel of the kingdom shall force its way through the greatest opposition. Though the enemies of the church grow very hot, and many of her friends very cool, yet the gospel shall be preached. Then the people that do know their God, shall be strengthened to do the greatest exploits of all.

3. That which seems chiefly intended here, is, that the end of the world shall be then, and not till then, when the gospel has done its work in the world. When the mystery of God shall be finished, the mystical body completed, then shall the end come, of which he had said before (v. 6, 7), not yet.

VI. He foretells more particularly the ruin that was coming upon the people of the Jews, their city, temple, and nation, v. 15, &c. What he said here, would be of use to his disciples, both for their conduct and for their comfort, in reference to that great event.

1. The Romans setting up the abomination of desolation in the holy place, v. 15. Some understand by this an image, or statue, set up in the temple by some of the Roman governors, which was very offensive to the Jews. Since the captivity in Babylon, nothing was, nor could be, more distasteful to the Jews than an image in the holy place. Others choose to expound it by the parallel place (Luke xxi. 20), when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies. Jerusalem was the holy city, Canaan the holy land, the Mount Moriah, which lay about Jerusalem, for its nearness to the temple was, they thought, in a particular manner holy ground; on the country lying round about Jerusalem the Roman army was encamped, that was the abomination that made desolate. Now this is said to be spoken of by Daniel, the prophet, who spoke more plainly of the Messiah and his kingdom than any of the Old Testament prophets did. Christ refers them to that prophecy of Daniel, that they might see how the ruin of their city and temple was spoken of in the Old Testament, which would confirm his prediction. As Christ by his precepts confirmed the law, so by his predictions he confirmed the prophecies of the Old Testament, and it will be of good use to compare both together.

Reference being here had to a prophecy, which is commonly dark and obscure, Christ inserts this memorandum, "Whoso readeth, let him understand." Those that read the scriptures, should labour to understand the scriptures, else their reading is to little purpose; we cannot use that which we do not understand. And we must not despair of understanding even dark prophecies; the great New-Testament prophecy is called a revelation, not a secret. Now things revealed belong to us, and therefore must be humbly and diligently searched into.

2. The means of preservation which thinking men should betake themselves to (v. 16, 20); Then let them which are in Judæa, flee. We may take this, as a prediction of the ruin itself; that it should be irresistible; that it would be impossible for the stoutest hearts to make head against it, but they must have recourse to the last shift, getting out of the way. Christ here, to show how fruitless it would be to stand it out, bids everyone make the best of his way. We may take it as a direction to the followers of Christ what to do. Let them acquiesce in the decree that was gone forth, and with all speed quit the city and country, as they would quit a falling house or a sinking ship, as Lot quitted Sodom. He shows them, whither they must flee—from Judæa to the mountains. In times of imminent peril and danger, it is not only lawful, but our duty, to seek our own preservation by all good and honest means; and if God opens a door of escape, we ought to make our escape, otherwise we do not trust God but tempt him. While we only go out of the way of danger, not out of the way of duty, we may trust God to provide. He that flees, may fight again. See what haste they must make, v. 17, 18. The life will be in danger; and therefore he that is on the house-top, when the alarm comes, let him not come down into the house, but go the nearest way down, to make his escape; and so he that shall be in the field, will find it his wisest course to run immediately, for two reasons, First, Because the time which would be taken up in packing up his things, would delay his flight. When death is at the door, delays are dangerous. Secondly, Because the carrying of his clothes, and his other moveables and valuables with him, would but burthen him, and clog his flight. The Syrians, in their flight, cast away their garments, 2 Kings vii. 15. Those who carried off least, were safest in their flight. He that has grace in his heart carries his all along with him, when stripped of all.

Now those to whom Christ said this immediately, did not live to see this dismal day, none of all the twelve but John only; but they left the direction to their successors in profession, who pursued it, and it was of use to them; for when the Christians in Jerusalem and Judæa saw the ruin coming on, they all retired to a town called Pella, on the other side Jordan, where they were safe, so that of the thousands that perished in the destruction of Jerusalem, there was not so much as one Christian. Note, whom it would go hard with at that time (v. 19); Woe to them that are with child, and to them that give suck. To this same event that saying of Christ at his death refers (Luke xxiii. 29), They shall say, Blessed are the wombs that never bare, and the paps that never gave suck. To them the famine would be most grievous. To them the sword would be most terrible, when in the hand of worse than brutal rage. To them also the flight would be most afflictive; the women with child cannot make haste, or go far; the sucking child cannot be left behind, or, if it should, can a woman forget it, that she should not have compassion on it? If it be carried along, it retards the mother's flight, and so exposes her life. What they should pray against at that time—that your flight be not in the winter, nor on the sabbath day, v. 20. In general, it becomes Christ's disciples, in times of public trouble and calamity, to be much in prayer; that is a salve for every sore, never out of season. There is no remedy but you must flee, the decree is gone forth. Labour to make the best of that which is; and when you cannot in faith pray that you may not be forced to flee, yet pray that the circumstances of it may be graciously ordered, that, though the cup may not pass from you, yet the extremity of the judgment may be prevented. God has the disposing of the circumstances of events, which sometimes makes a great alteration one way or other; and therefore in those our eyes must be ever toward him. Christ's bidding them pray for this favour, intimates his purpose of granting it to them; and in a general calamity we must see and own wherein it might have been worse. When trouble is in prospect, at a great distance, it is good to lay in a stock of prayers beforehand; they must pray, First, That their flight, if it were the will of God, might not be in the winter, when the days are short, the weather cold, the ways dirty, and therefore travelling very uncomfortable, especially for whole families. Though the ease of the body is not to be mainly consulted, it ought to be duly considered; though we must take what God sends, and when he sends it, yet we may pray against bodily inconveniences, and are encouraged to do so. Secondly, That it might not be on the sabbath day. For the sabbath he often showed a concern. It intimates likewise that the sabbath is ordinarily to be observed as a day of rest from travel and worldly labour; but that works of necessity were lawful on the sabbath day, as this of fleeing from an enemy to save our lives. But it intimates, likewise, that it is very uneasy and uncomfortable to a good man, to be taken off by any work of necessity from the solemn service and worship of God on the sabbath day. We should pray that we may have quiet undisturbed sabbaths, and may have no other work than sabbath work to do on sabbath days; that we may attend upon the Lord without distraction. To flee in the winter is uncomfortable to the body; but to flee on the sabbath day is so to the soul.

3. The greatness of the troubles which should immediately ensue (v. 21); Then shall be great tribulation; when the measure of iniquity is full, then come the troubles. There shall be great tribulation. Great, indeed, when within the city plague and famine raged, and (worse than either) faction and division, so that every man's sword was against his fellow; then and there it was that the hands of the pitiful women flayed their own children. Josephus's History of the Wars of the Jews, has in it more tragical passages than perhaps any history whatsoever.

(1) It was a desolation unparalleled, such as was not since the beginning of the world, nor ever shall be. Many a city and kingdom has been made desolate, but never any with a desolation like this. No wonder that the ruin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled ruin, when the sin of Jerusalem was an unparalleled sin—even their crucifying Christ. The nearer any people are to God in profession and privileges, the greater and heavier will his judgments be upon them.

(2) It was a desolation which, if it should continue long, would be intolerable, so that no flesh should be saved, v. 22. No flesh shall be saved; he doth not say, "No soul shall be saved," for the destruction of the flesh may be for the saving of the spirit in the day of the Lord Jesus."

But here is one word of comfort in the midst of all this terror—that for the elects' sake these days shall be shortened, not made shorter than what God had determined, but shorter than what he might have decreed, if he had dealt with them according to their sins. In times of common calamity God manifests his favour to the elect remnant; his peculiar treasure, which he will secure when the lumber is abandoned to the spoiler. The shortening of calamities is a kindness God often grants. Instead of complaining that our afflictions last so long, if we consider our defects, we shall see reason to be thankful that they do not last always; when it is bad with us, it becomes us to say, "Blessed be God that it is no worse."

And now comes in the repeated caution to take heed of being ensnared by false Christs, and false prophets (v. 23, &c.). Times of great trouble are times of great temptation and therefore we have need to double our guard then. Do not heed them, it is all but talk.

VII. He foretells the sudden spreading of the gospel in the world, about the time of these great events (v. 27, 28); As the lightning comes out of the east, so shall the coming of the Son of man be.

1. It seems primarily to be meant of his coming to set up his spiritual kingdom in the world. The gospel would be remarkable for two things.

(1) Its swift spreading; it shall fly as the lightning. The gospel is light (John iii. 19); and it is not in this as the lightning, that it is a sudden flash, and away, for it is sunlight, and daylight. It is as lightning in these respects:

[1] It is light from heaven, as the lightning. It is God, and not man, that sends the lightnings, and summons them.

[2] It is visible and conspicuous as the lightning. Truth seeks no corners, however it may sometimes be forced into them. Christ preached his gospel openly (John xviii. 20), and his apostles on the housetop (ch. x. 27).

[3] It was sudden and surprising to the world as the lightning. The powers of darkness were dispersed and vanquished by the gospel lightning.

[4] It spread far and wide, and that quickly and irresistibly, like the lightning, which comes, suppose, out of the east (Christ is said to ascend from the east), and lighteneth to the west. Gospel light rose with the sun, and went with the same, so that the beams of it reached to the ends of the earth. Though it was fought against, it could never be cooped up in a desert, or in a secret place, as the seducers were; but by this, according to Gamaliel's rule, proved itself to be of God, that it could not be overthrown, Acts v. 38, 39. How soon did the gospel lightning reach this island of Great Britain! Tertullian, who wrote in the second century, takes notice of it, The fastnesses of Britain, though inaccessible to the Romans, were occupied by Jesus Christ. This was the Lord's doing.

(2) Another thing remarkable concerning the gospel, was, its strange success in those places to which it was spread; it gathered in multitudes. The lifting up of Christ from the earth, that is, the preaching of Christ crucified, which, one would think, should drive all men from him, will draw all men to him (John xii. 32). Whither should the soul go but to Jesus Christ, who has the words of eternal life? Those who have spiritual senses exercised, will know the voice of the good Shepherd from that of a thief and a robber. Saints will be where the true Christ is, not the false Christs. A living principle of grace is a kind of natural instinct in all the saints, drawing them to Christ to live upon him.

2. Some understand these verses of the coming of the Son of man to destroy Jerusalem.

Now here are two things intimated concerning it.

(1) That to the most it would be as unexpected as a flash of lightning, which indeed gives warning of the clap of thunder which follows, but is itself surprising.

(2) That it might be as justly expected as that the eagle should fly to the carcases. The desolation will come as certainly as the birds of prey to a dead carcase. The Jews were so corrupt and degenerate that they were become a carcase, obnoxious to the righteous judgment of God. The Romans were as an eagle, and the ensign of their armies was an eagle. The destruction shall find out the Jews wherever they are, as the eagle scents the prey.

3. It is very applicable to the day of judgment, the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ in that day. Now see here,

(1) How he shall come; as the lightning. Therefore those that enquire after Christ must not go into the desert or the secret places, nor listen to everyone that will put up the finger to invite them to a sight of Christ; but let them look upward, for the heavens must contain him, and thence we look for the Saviour.

(2) How the saints shall be gathered to him with the greatest swiftness and alacrity imaginable.

VIII. He foretells his second coming at the end of time, v. 29–31. The sun shall be darkened, &c.

1. Some think this is to be understood only of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jewish nation; the darkening of the sun, moon, and stars, denotes the eclipse of the glory of that state. The sign of the Son of man (v. 30) means a signal appearance of the power and justice of the Lord Jesus in it, and the gathering of his elect (v. 31) signifies the delivering of a remnant from this sin and ruin.

2. It seems rather to refer to Christ's second coming. The only objection against this, is, that it is said to be immediately after the tribulation of those days; but as to that, (1) It is usual in the prophetical style to speak of things great and certain as near and just at hand, only to express the greatness and certainty of them. (2) A thousand years are in God's sight but as one day, 2 Pet. iii. 8. It is there urged, with reference to this very thing, and so it might be said to be immediately after.

Now concerning Christ's second coming, it is here foretold,

[1] That there shall be then a great and amazing change of the creatures, and particularly the heavenly bodies (v. 29). The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light. The stars shall fall; and the powers of heaven shall be shaken. This intimates,

First, That there shall be a great change, in order to the making of all things new.

Secondly, It shall be a visible change, and such as all the world must take notice of; for such the darkening of the sun and moon cannot but be: and it would be an amazing change. The days of heaven, and the continuance of the sun and moon, are used to express that which is lasting and unchangeable, yet they shall thus be shaken.

Thirdly, It shall be a universal change. Nature shall sustain a general shock and convulsion, which yet shall be no hindrance to the joy and rejoicing of heaven and earth before the Lord, when he cometh to judge the world.

Fourthly, The sun was darkened at the death of Christ, for then was in one sense the judgment of this world (John xii. 31).

Fifthly, The glorious appearance of our Lord Jesus, will darken the sun and moon, as a candle is darkened in the beams of the noon-day sun.

Sixthly, The sun and moon shall be then darkened, because there will be no more occasion for them. To the saints that had their treasure above, such light of joy and comfort will be given as shall supersede that of the sun and moon, and render it useless.

[2] That then shall appear the sign of the Son of man in heaven (v. 30), the Son of man himself, as it follows here, They shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds. At his first coming, he was set for a Sign that should be spoken against (Luke ii. 34), but at his second coming, a sign that should be admired.

[3] That then all the tribes of the earth shall mourn, v. 30. Some of all the tribes and kindreds of the earth shall mourn, while the chosen remnant shall lift up their heads with joy, knowing that their redemption draws nigh, and their Redeemer. Penitent sinners look to Christ, and mourn after a godly sort; and they who sow in those tears, shall shortly reap in joy.

[4] That then they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven, with power and great glory. First, The judgment of the great day will be committed to the Son of man. Secondly, The Son of man will at that day come in the clouds of heaven. Much of the intercourse between heaven and earth is by the clouds; drawn by heaven from the earth, distilled by heaven upon the earth. Christ went to heaven in a cloud, and will in like manner come again, Acts i. 9, 11. Thirdly, He will come with power and great glory: his first coming was in weakness and great meanness (2 Cor. xiii. 4). Fourthly, Therefore the Son of man will be the Judge, that he may be seen, that sinners thereby may be the more confounded. "Is this he whom we have slighted, and rejected, and rebelled against; whom we have crucified to ourselves afresh; who might have been our Saviour, but is our Judge?"

[5] That he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, v. 31. The angels shall be attendants upon Christ at his second coming; they shall be obliged to wait upon him. They are now ministering Spirits sent forth by him (Heb. i. 14), and will be so then. Their ministration will be ushered in with a great sound of a trumpet. Very fitly therefore shall there be the sound of a trumpet at the last day, when the saints shall enter upon their eternal jubilee.

[6] That they shall gather together his elect from the four winds. At the second coming of Jesus Christ, there will be a general meeting of all the saints. The gifts of love to eternity follow the thoughts of love from eternity; and the Lord knows them that are his. The angels shall be employed to bring them together, as Christ's servants, and as the saints' friends. They shall be gathered from one end of heaven to the other; the elect of God are scattered abroad (John xi. 52), but when that great gathering day comes, there shall not one of them be missing; distance of place shall keep none out of heaven, if distance of affection do not.

Verses 32–51

We have here the practical application of the foregoing prediction; in general, we must expect and prepare for the events here foretold.

I. We must expect them; "Now learn a parable of the fig-tree, v. 32, 33. Now learn what use to make of the things you have heard; that you may provide accordingly." The parable of the fig-tree is no more than this, that its budding and blossoming are a presage of summer. Thus when God begins to fulfil prophecies, he will make an end. After the branch grows tender, we expect the March winds, and the April showers, before the summer comes; however, we are sure it is coming; "so likewise ye, when the gospel day shall dawn, the perfect day will come. Know that it is near." When the trees of righteousness begin to bud and blossom, when God's people promise faithfulness, it is a happy presage of good times. In them God begins his work, first prepares their heart, and then he will go on with it.

Now touching the events foretold here, which we are to expect,

1. Christ here assures us of the certainty of them (v. 35); Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away. The word of Christ is more sure and lasting than heaven and earth. We may build with more assurance upon the word of Christ than we can upon the pillars of heaven, or the strong foundations of the earth; for, when they shall be no more, the word of Christ shall remain. In God's time, which is the best time, and in God's way, which is the best way, it shall certainly be fulfilled. Every word of Christ is very pure, and therefore very sure.

2. He here instructs us as to the time of them, v. 34, 36.

(1) As to these things, especially the ruin of the Jewish nation; "This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be fulfilled (v. 34); there are those now alive, that shall see Jerusalem destroyed. Because it might seem strange, he backs it with a solemn asseveration; "Verily, I say unto you. You may take my word for it, these things are at the door."

(2) But as to that day and hour which will put a period to time, that knoweth no man, v. 36. There is a certain day and hour fixed for the judgment to come; it is called the day of the Lord. That day and hour are a great secret. No man knows it; not the wisest by their sagacity, not the best by any divine discovery. None knows but my Father only. The uncertainty of the time of Christ's coming, is, to those who are watchful, a savour of life unto life, and makes them more watchful; but to those who are careless, it is a savour of death unto death, and makes them more careless.

II. To this end we must expect these events, that we may prepare for them, v. 37–41. In these verses we have such an idea given us of the judgment day, as may serve to startle and awaken us.

It will be a surprising day, and a separating day.

1. It will be a surprising day, as the deluge was to the old world, v. 37–39. Besides his first coming, to save, he has other comings to judge. He saith (John ix. 39), For judgment I am come; and for judgment he will come.

Now this here is applicable,

(1) To temporal judgments, particularly that which was now hastening upon the nation and people of the Jews; though they had fair warning given them of it, yet it found them secure, crying, Peace and safety. Men's unbelief shall not make God's threatenings of no effect.

(2) To the eternal judgment; so the judgment of the great day is called, Heb. vi. 2. Now Christ here shows what were the temper and posture of the old world when the deluge came.

[1] They were sensual and worldly; they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage. They were all of them, except Noah, over head and ears in the world, and regardless of the word of God, and this ruined them. Universal neglect of religion is a more dangerous symptom to any people than particular instances here and there of daring irreligion. Eating and drinking are necessary to the preservation of man's life; marrying and giving in marriage are necessary to the preservation of mankind. They were unreasonable in it, inordinate and entire in the pursuit of the delights of sense. They were in these things as in their element, as if they had their being for no other end than to eat and drink. They were unreasonable in it; they were entire and intent upon the world and the flesh. They were eating and drinking, when they should have been repenting and praying.

[2] They were secure and careless; they knew not, until the flood came, v. 39. Knew not! Surely they could not but know. Did he not call them to repentance while his long-suffering waited? Their not knowing is joined with their eating, and drinking, and marrying; for, First, Therefore they were sensual, because they were secure. Secondly, Therefore they were secure, because they were sensual; were so taken up with things seen and present, that they had neither time nor heart to mind the things not seen as yet, which they were warned of. They knew not, until the flood came. The flood did come, though they would not foresee it. The evil day is never the further off for men's putting it far off from them. They did not know it till it was too late to prevent it. Judgments are most terrible and amazing to the secure, and those that have made a jest of them.

The application of this, concerning the old world, we have in these words; So shall the coming of the Son of man be. Security and sensuality are likely to be the epidemical diseases of the latter days. All are off their watch, and at their ease. As the flood took away the sinners of the old world, irresistibly and irrecoverably; so shall secure sinners, that mocked at Christ and his coming, be taken away.

2. It will be a separating day (v. 40, 41); Then shall two be in the field.

(1) We may apply it to the success of the gospel, especially at the first preaching of it; it divided the world; some believed the things which were spoken, and were taken to Christ; others believed not, and were left to perish in their unbelief.

When ruin came upon Jerusalem, a distinction was made by Divine Providence, according to that which had been before made by divine grace; for all the Christians among them were saved from perishing in that calamity. If we are safe when thousands fall on our right hand and our left, are not consumed when others are consumed round about us, so that we are as brands plucked out of the fire, we have reason to say, It is of the Lord's mercies, and it is a great mercy.

(2) We may apply it to the second coming of Jesus Christ, and the separation which will be made in that day. He had said before (v. 31), that the elect will be gathered together. Here it is applied to them who shall be found alive. Christ will come unlooked for, will find people busy at their usual occupations, in the field, at the mill. And it speaks abundance of comfort to the Lord's people. Are they mean and despised in the world, as the man-servant in the field, or the maid at the mill (Exod. xi. 5)? Yet they shall not be forgotten or overlooked in that day. Are they dispersed in distant and unlikely places, where one would not expect to find the heirs of glory, in the field, at the mill? Yet the angels will find them there. A very great change it will be, to go to heaven from ploughing and grinding. Are they weak, and unable of themselves to move heavenward? They shall be taken. Those whom Christ has once apprehended and laid hold on, he will never lose his hold of. Are they intermixed with others, linked with them in the same habitations, societies, employments? Let not that discourage any true Christian; God knows how to separate the wheat and chaff in the same floor.

III. Here is a general exhortation to us, to watch, and be ready, v. 42, &c.

1. The duty required; Watch, and be ready, v. 42, 44.

(1) Watch therefore, v. 42. It is the great duty and interest of all the disciples of Christ to watch, to be awake and keep awake. As a sinful state or way is compared to sleep, senseless and inactive, so a gracious state or way is compared to watching and waking. We must watch for our Lord's coming. To watch implies not only to believe that our Lord will come, but to desire that he would come, to be often thinking of his coming. To watch for Christ's coming, is to maintain that gracious temper and disposition of mind which we should be willing that our Lord, when he comes, should find us in. Watching is supposed to be in the night, which is sleeping time; while we are in this world, it is night with us, and we must take pains to keep ourselves awake.

(2) Be ye also ready, We wake in vain, if we do not get ready. It is not enough to look for such things; but we must therefore give diligence. There is an inheritance which we then hope to enter upon, and we must have ourselves ready, made meet to partake of it.

2. The reasons to induce us to this watchfulness; which are two.

(1) Because the time of our Lord's coming is very uncertain. Let us consider then,

[1] That we know not what hour he will come, v. 42. We cannot know that we have a long time to live; nor can we know how little a time we have to live, for it may prove less than we expect.

[2] That he may come at such an hour as we think not, v. 44. Though we know not when he will come, we are sure he will come. In such an hour as you think not, that is, such an hour as they who are unready and unprepared, think not (v. 50); nay, such an hour as the most lively expectants perhaps thought least likely.

[3] That the children of this world are thus wise in their generation. This he shows in a particular instance, v. 43. If the master of a house had notice that a thief would come such a night, and such a watch of the night, though it were the midnight-watch, when he was most sleepy, yet he would be up, and listen to every noise in every corner, and he ready to give him a warm reception. Though we know not just when our Lord will come, yet, knowing that he will come, it concerns us to watch always. The day of the Lord comes by surprise, as a thief in the night. If Christ, when he comes, finds us asleep and unready, our house will be broken up, and we shall lose all we are worth. Be ye also ready; as ready at all times as the good man of the house would be at the hour when he expected the thief.

(2) Because the issue of our Lord's coming will be very happy and comfortable to those that shall be found ready, but very dismal and dreadful to those that shall not, v. 45, &c. This is represented by the different state of good and bad servants, when their lord comes to reckon with them. Now this parable seems especially intended as a warning to ministers; for the servant spoken of is a steward. Now observe what Christ here saith,

[1] Concerning the good servant; he shows here what he is—a ruler of the household; what, being so, he should be—faithful and wise; and what, if he be so, he shall be eternally—blessed.

First, We have here his place and office. He is one whom his Lord has made ruler over his household, to give them meat in due season. The church of Christ is his household, or family, standing in relation to him as the Father and Master of it. Gospel ministers are appointed rulers in this household; not as princes but as stewards, or other subordinate officers; not as lords, but as guides. They are rulers by Christ; what power they have is derived from him. The work of gospel ministers is to give to Christ's household their meat in due season, as stewards. Their work is to give, not take to themselves, but give to the family what the Master has bought, to dispense what Christ has purchased. It is to give meat; not to give law (that is Christ's work), but to deliver those doctrines to the church which, if duly digested, will be nourishment to souls. They must give the meat that is sound and wholesome. It must be given in due season, that is, whenever any opportunity offers itself; or time after time, according as the duty of every day requires.

Secondly, His right discharge of this office. The good servant will be a good steward.

1. He is faithful; stewards must be so. He that is trusted, must be trusty; and the greater the trust is, the more is expected from them. It is a great good thing that is committed to ministers; and they must be faithful. Christ counts those ministers, and those only, that are faithful. A faithful minister of Jesus Christ is one that sincerely designs his master's honour, not his own; regards the meanest, reproves the greatest, and doth not respect persons.

2. He is wise to understand his duty. In guiding of the flock there is need, not only of the integrity of the heart, but the skilfulness of the hands. Honesty may suffice for a good servant, but wisdom is necessary to a good steward.

3. He is doing. The ministry is a good work, and they whose office it is, have always something to do; they must not indulge themselves in ease, but be doing, and doing to the purpose; not talking, but doing.

4. He is found doing when his Master comes; which intimates, (1) Constancy at his work. At what hour soever his Master comes, he is found busy at the work of the day. As with a good God the end of one mercy is the beginning of another, so with a good man, a good minister, the end of one duty is the beginning of another. (2) Perseverance in his work till the Lord come.

Thirdly, The recompence of reward intended him for this.

1. He shall be taken notice of. This is intimated in these words, Who then is that faithful and wise servant? Which supposes that there are but few who answer this character. Those who thus distinguish themselves now, Christ will in the great day both dignify and distinguish by the glory conferred on them.

2. He shall be blessed? Blessed is that servant. All the dead that die in the Lord are blessed, Rev. xiv. 13. But there is a peculiar blessedness secured to them that approve themselves faithful stewards, and are found so doing. Next to the honour of those who die in the field of battle, suffering for Christ as the martyrs, is the honour of those that die in the field of service, ploughing, and sowing, and reaping, for Christ.

3. He shall be preferred (v. 47); He shall make him ruler over all his goods. Great men, if the stewards of their house conduct themselves well in that place, commonly prefer them to be the managers of their estates. But the greatest honour which the kindest master ever did to his most tried servants in this world, is nothing to that weight of glory which the Lord Jesus will confer upon his faithful watchful servants in the world to come.

[2] Concerning the evil servant. Here we have,

First, His description given (v. 48, 49). The vilest of creatures is a wicked man, the vilest of men is a wicked Christian, and the vilest of them a wicked minister.

1. The cause of his wickedness; He hath said in his heart, My Lord delays his coming; and therefore he begins to think he will never come. The delay of Christ's coming, though it is a gracious instance of his patience, is greatly abused by wicked people. They that walk by sense, are ready to say of the unseen Jesus, as the people did of Moses when he tarried in the mount upon their errand, We wot not what is become of him, and therefore up, make us gods, the world a god, the belly a god, anything but him that should be.

2. The particulars of his wickedness; he is a slave to his passions and his appetites.

(1) Persecution is here charged upon him. He begins to smite his fellow servants. It is no new thing to see evil servants smiting their fellow servants; both private Christians and faithful ministers. He smites them, either because they reprove him, or because they will not bow, and do him reverence. The steward, when he smites his fellow servants, does it under colour of his Master's authority, and in his name; but he shall know that he could not put a greater affront upon his Master.

(2) Profaneness and immorality; He begins to eat and drink with the drunken. He associates with the worst of sinners. The drunken are the merry and jovial company, and those he is for, and thus he hardens them in their wickedness. He does like them; eats, and drinks, and is drunken. This is an inlet to all manner of sin. Drunkenness is a leading wickedness; they who are slaves to that, are never masters of themselves in anything else. Well, this is the description of a wicked minister, who yet may have the common gifts of learning and utterance above others; and, as hath been said of some, may preach so well in the pulpit, that it is a pity he should ever come out, and yet live so ill out of the pulpit, that it is a pity he should ever come in.

Secondly, His doom read, v. 50, 51. Observe,

1. The surprise that will accompany his doom (v. 50); The Lord of that servant will come. Our putting off the thoughts of Christ's coming will not put off his coming. Whatever fancy he deludes himself with, his Lord will come. The coming of Christ will be a most dreadful surprise to secure and careless sinners, especially to wicked ministers; He shall come in a day when he looketh not for him. Behold, he has told us before.

2. The severity of his doom, v. 51. It is not more severe than righteous, but it is a doom that carries in it utter ruin.

(1) Death. His Lord shall cut him asunder, "he shall cut him off from the land of the living," from the congregation of the righteous, shall separate him unto evil. Death cuts off a good man, as a choice imp is cut off to be grafted in a better stock; but it cuts off a wicked man, as a withered branch is cut off for the fire. Or, as we read it, shall cut him asunder, that is, part body and soul. The soul and body of a godly man at death part fairly, the one cheerfully lifted up to God, the other left to the dust; but the soul and body of a wicked man at death are cut asunder, torn asunder.

(2) Damnation. He shall appoint him his portion with the hypocrites, and a miserable portion it will be, for there shall be weeping. There is a place and state where there is nothing but weeping and gnashing of teeth; which speaks the soul's tribulation and anguish under God's indignation and wrath. The divine sentence will appoint this place and state as the portion of those who by their own sin were fitted for it. He that is now the Saviour, will then be the Judge, and the everlasting state of the children of men will be as he appoints. When Christ would express the most severe punishment in the other world, he calls it the portion of hypocrites. Wicked ministers will have their portion in the other world with the worst of sinners, even with the hypocrites, and justly, for they are the worst of hypocrites. Son, remember, will be as cutting a word to a minister if he perish as to any other sinner whatsoever. Let them therefore who preach to others, fear, lest they themselves should be castaways.

CHAP. XXV

This chapter continues and concludes our Saviour's discourse concerning his second coming and the end of the world. This was his farewell sermon of caution. The application of that discourse, was, Watch therefore, and be ye also ready. We have three parables, the scope of which is the same—to quicken us all with the utmost care and diligence to get ready for Christ's second coming. I. That we may then be ready to attend upon him; and this is shown in the parable of the ten virgins, ver. 1–13. II. That we may then be ready to give up our account to him; and this is shown in the parable of the three servants, ver. 14–30. III. That we may then be ready to receive from him our final sentence, and that it may be to eternal life; and this is shown in a more plain description of the process of the last judgment, ver. 31–46.

Verses 1–13

I. That in general which is to be illustrated is, the kingdom of heaven. Some of Christ's parables had shown us what it is like now in the present reception of it, as ch. xiii. This tells us what it shall be like, when the mystery of God shall be finished, and that kingdom delivered up to the Father.

II. That by which it is illustrated, is, a marriage solemnity. It was a custom sometimes used among the Jews on that occasion, that the bridegroom came, attended with his friends, late in the night, to the house of the bride, where she expected him, attended with her bride-maids; who, upon notice given of the bridegroom's approach, were to go out with lamps in their hands, to light him into the house with ceremony and formality, in order to the celebrating of the nuptials with great mirth.

1. The Bridegroom is our Lord Jesus Christ. It bespeaks his singular and superlative love to, and his faithful and inviolable covenant with, his spouse the church.

2. The virgins are the professors of religion, members of the church; but here represented as her companions.

3. The office of these virgins is to meet the bridegroom, which is as much their happiness as their duty. They come to wait upon the bridegroom when he appears, and in the meantime to wait for him. As Christians, we profess ourselves to be, (1) Attendants upon Christ, to do him honour. Hold up the name, and hold forth the praise of the exalted Jesus; this is our business. (2) Expectants of Christ, and of his second coming. The second coming of Christ is the centre in which all the lines of our religion meet, and to which the whole of the divine life hath a constant reference and tendency.

4. Their chief concern is to have lights in their hands, when they attend the bridegroom, thus to do him honour and do him service. Christians are children of light.

Now concerning these ten virgins, we may observe,

(1) Their different character, with the proof and evidence of it. Their character was, that five were wise, and five foolish (v. 2). Those of the same profession and denomination among men, may yet be of characters vastly different in the sight of God. Those are wise or foolish indeed, that are so in the affairs of their souls. True religion is true wisdom; sin is folly. The evidence of this character was in the very thing which they were to attend to.

First, It was the folly of the foolish virgins, that they took their lamps, and took no oil with them, v. 3. They had just oil enough to make their lamps burn for the present, to make a show with, as if they intended to meet the bridegroom; but no cruse or bottle of oil with them for a recruit if the bridegroom tarried; thus hypocrites.

[1] They have no principle within. They have a lamp of profession in their hands, but have not in their hearts that stock which is necessary to carry them through the services and trials of the present state.

[2] They have no prospect of, nor make provision for, what is to come. They took lamps for a present show, but not oil for after use. They do not provide for hereafter, as the ant does, nor lay up for the time to come, 1 Tim. vi. 19.

Secondly, It was the wisdom of the wise virgins, that they took oil in their vessels with their lamps, v. 4. They had a good principle within, which would maintain and keep up their profession. The heart is the vessel, which it is our wisdom to get furnished; for, out of a good treasure there, good things must be brought; but if that root be rottenness, the blossom will be dust. Grace is the oil which we must have in this vessel. Our light must shine before men, in good works, but this cannot be, or not long, unless there be a fixed active principle in the heart, of faith in Christ, and love to God and our brethren. They that took oil in their vessels, did it upon supposition that perhaps the bridegroom might tarry. In looking forward it is good to prepare for the worst, to lay in for a long siege.

(2) Their common fault, during the bridegroom's delay; They all slumbered and slept, v. 5. The bridegroom tarried, that is, he did not come out so soon as they expected. What we look for as certain, we are apt to think is very near. Christ, as to us, seems to tarry, and yet really does not. But though Christ tarry past our time, he will not tarry past the due time. While he tarried, those that waited for him, grew careless, and forgot what they were attending; They all slumbered and slept; as if they had given over looking for him. Those that inferred the suddenness of it from its certainty, when that answered not their expectation, were apt from the delay to infer its uncertainty. The wise virgins kept their lamps burning, but did not keep themselves awake. Too many good Christians, when they have been long in profession, grow remiss, their graces are not lively, nor their works found perfect before God; and though all love be not lost, yet the first love is left.

(3) The surprising summons given them, to attend the bridegroom (v. 6); At midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the bridegroom cometh. Though Christ tarry long, he will come at last; though he seem slow, he is sure. His friends shall find, to their comfort, that the vision is for an appointed time. The year of the redeemed is fixed, and it will come. Christ's coming will be at our midnight, when we least look for him. His coming for the relief and comfort of his people, often is when the good intended seems to be at the greatest distance. Christ will come when he pleases, to show his sovereignty, and will not let us know when, to teach us our duty. When Christ comes, we must go forth to meet him. Go ye forth to meet him, is a call to those who are habitually prepared, to be actually ready. The notice given of Christ's approach, and the call to meet him, will be awakening; There was a cry made. His first coming was not with any observation at all, nor did they say, Lo, here is Christ, or Lo, he is there; he was in the world, and the world knew him not; but his second coming will be with the observation of all the world.

(4) The address they all made to answer this summons (v. 7); They all arose, and trimmed their lamps, snuffed them and supplied them with oil, and went about with all expedition to receive the bridegroom. This, in the wise virgins, bespeaks an actual preparation for the Bridegroom's coming. Even those that are best prepared for death, have work to do, to get themselves actually ready, that they may be found in peace (2 Pet. iii. 14), found doing (ch. xxiv. 46), and not found naked, 2 Cor. v. 3. It will be a day of search and enquiry; and it concerns us to think how we shall then be found. In the foolish virgins, it denotes a vain confidence, and conceit of the goodness of their state, and their readiness for another world.

(5) The distress which the foolish virgins were in, for want of oil, v. 8, 9. This bespeaks, [1] The apprehensions which some hypocrites have of the misery of their state, even on this side death, when God opens their eyes to see their folly. Or, however, [2] The real misery of their state on the other side death, and in the judgment.

First, Their lamps are gone out. The lamps of hypocrites often go out in this life; when they who have begun in the spirit, end in the flesh. The profession withers, and the credit of it is lost; the hopes fail, and the comfort of them is gone. The gains of a hypocritical profession will not follow a man to judgment, ch. vii. 22, 23.

Secondly, They wanted oil to supply them when they were going out. An external profession well humoured may carry a man far, it may light him along this world, but the dams of the valley of the shadow of death will put it out.

Thirdly, They would gladly be beholden to the wise virgins for a supply out of their vessels; Give us of your oil. Those who now hate the strictness of religion, will, at death and judgment, wish for the solid comforts of it. Those who care not to live the life, yet would die the death, of the righteous. Give us of your oil; that is, "Speak a good word for us"; so some; but there is no occasion for vouchers in the great day, the Judge knows what is every man's true character. Those will see their need of grace hereafter, when it should save them, who will not see their need of grace now, when it should sanctify and rule them. It comes too late. There is no buying when the market is over, no bidding when the inch of candle is dropped.

Fourthly, They were denied a share in their companions' oil. The wise answered, Not so; that peremptory denial is not in the original, but supplied by the translators: these wise virgins would rather give a reason without a positive refusal, than (as many do) give a positive refusal without a reason. They were well inclined to help their neighbours in distress; but, We must not, we cannot, we dare not, do it, lest there be not enough for us and you; charity begins at home; but go, and buy for yourselves. Those that would be saved, must have grace of their own. Though we have benefit by the communion of saints, and the faith and prayers of others, yet our own sanctification is indispensably necessary to our own salvation. Every man shall give account of himself; for he cannot get another to muster for him in that day. Those that have most grace, have none to spare; all we have, is little enough for ourselves to appear before God in. The best have need to borrow from Christ, but they have none to lend to any of their neighbours. These wise virgins do not upbraid the foolish with their neglect, but give them the best advice the case will bear, Go ye rather to them that sell. When ministers attend such as have been mindless of God and their souls all their days, but are under death-bed convictions; and direct them to repent, and turn to God, and close with Christ; they do but as these wise virgins did by the foolish, even make the best of bad. They can but tell them what is to be done. It is good advice now, if it be taken in time, Go to them that sell, and buy for yourselves.

(6) The coming of the bridegroom, and the issue of all this.

[1] While they went out to buy, the bridegroom came. With regard to those that put off their great work to the last, it is a thousand to one, that they have not time to do it then. Getting grace is a work of time, and cannot be done in a hurry. While the poor awakened soul addresses itself, upon a sick bed, to repentance and prayer, in awful confusion, it scarcely knows which end to begin at. This comes of having oil to buy when we should burn it, and grace to get when we should use it.

The bridegroom came. Our Lord Jesus will come to his people, at the great day, as a Bridegroom; will come in pomp and rich attire, attended with his friends.

[2] They that were ready, went in with him to the marriage. To be eternally glorified is to be in his immediate presence, and in the most intimate fellowship and communion with him. Those, and those only, shall go to heaven hereafter, that are made ready for heaven here.

[3] The door was shut, as is usual when all the company is come. The door was shut, First, To secure those that were within. Adam was put into paradise, but the door was left open and so he went out again; but when glorified saints are put into the heavenly paradise, they are shut in. Secondly, To exclude those that were out. Now the gate is strait, yet it is open; but then it will be shut and bolted, and a great gulf fixed.

[4] The foolish virgins came when it was too late (v. 11); Afterward came also the other virgins. There are many that will seek admission into heaven when it is too late; as profane Esau, who afterward would have inherited the blessing. The vain confidence of hypocrites will carry them very far in their expectations of happiness. They go to heaven-gate, and demand entrance, and yet are shut out.

[5] They were rejected, as Esau was (v. 12); I know you not. We are all concerned to seek the Lord while he may be found. Time was, when, Lord, Lord, open to us, would have sped well, by virtue of that promise, Knock, and it shall be opened to you; but now it comes too late.

Lastly, Here is a practical inference drawn from this parable (v. 13); Watch therefore. We had it before (ch. xxiv. 42), and here it is repeated as the most needful caution. Our great duty is to watch. Be awake, and be wakeful. It is a good reason for our watching, that the time of our Lord's coming is very uncertain; we know neither the day nor the hour.

Verses 14–30

We have here the parable of the talents committed to three servants; this implies that we are in a state of work and business, as the former implies that we are in a state of expectancy. That showed the necessity of habitual preparation, this of actual diligence in our present work and service. 1. The Master is Christ. 2. The servants are Christians, his own servants, so they are called.

We have three things, in general, in this parable.

I. The trust committed to these servants; Their master delivered to them his goods: having appointed them to work (for Christ keeps no servants to be idle), he left them something to work upon. 1. Christ's servants have and receive their all from him; nor have anything they can call their own but sin. 2. Our receiving from Christ is in order to our working for him. 3. Whatever we receive to be made use of for Christ, still the property is vested in him.

(1) On what occasion this trust was committed to these servants; The master was travelling into a far country. When he ascended on high, he gave gifts unto men. When Christ went to heaven, he was as a man travelling into a far country. When he went, he took care to furnish his church with all things necessary for it during his personal absence. Thus Christ, at his ascension, left his goods to his church.

(2) In what proportion this trust was committed. He gave talents. Christ's gifts are rich and valuable, the purchases of his blood inestimable, and none of them mean. He gave to some more, to others less; to everyone according to his several ability. When Divine Providence has made a difference in men's ability, grace dispenses spiritual gifts accordingly, but still the ability itself is from him. Everyone had some one talent at least, and that is not a despicable stock for a poor servant to begin with. A soul of our own is the one talent we are every one of us entrusted with, and it will find us with work. It is the duty of a man to render himself beneficial to those around him. He that is useful to others, may be reckoned a common good. All had not alike, for they had not all alike abilities and opportunities. Some are cut out for service in one kind, others in another, as the members of the natural body.

II. The different management and improvement of this trust, v. 16–18.

1. Two of the servants did well.

(1) They were diligent and faithful; They went, and traded; as soon as ever their master was gone, they immediately applied themselves to their business.

Those that have so much work to do, as every Christian has, need to set about it quickly, and lose no time. They went, and traded. A true Christian is a spiritual tradesmen. A tradesman is one who, having made his trade his choice, and taken pains to learn it, makes it his business to follow it, makes all other affairs bend to it, and lives upon the gain of it. We have no stock of our own to trade with, but trade as factors with our master's stock. The endowments of the mind—the enjoyments of the world—must be improved for the honour of Christ. The ordinances of the gospel, and our opportunities of attending them, must be improved for the end for which they were instituted, and communion with God kept up by them, and the gifts and graces of the Spirit must be exercised.

(2) They were successful; they doubled their stock. The hand of the diligent makes rich in graces, and comforts, and treasures of good works. There is a great deal to be got by industry in religion. The returns were in proportion to the receivings. The greater gifts any have, the more pains they ought to take, as those must that have a large stock to manage. From those to whom he has given but two talents, he expects only the improvement of two; if they lay out themselves to do good according to the best of their capacity and opportunity, they shall be accepted, though they do not so much good as others.

2. The third did ill (v. 18); He that had received one talent, went, and hid his lord's money. The unfaithful servant was he that had but one talent: doubtless there are many that have five talents, and bury them all; great abilities, great advantages, and yet do no good with them: but Christ would hint to us, (1) That if he that had but one talent, be reckoned with thus for burying that one, much more will they be accounted offenders, that have more, that have many, and bury them. (2) That those who have least to do for God, frequently do least of what they have to do. Some make it an excuse, because they have not wherewithal to do what they say they would, they will not do what we are sure they can, and so sit down and do nothing; it is really an aggravation of their sloth, that when they have but one talent to take care about, they neglect that one.

He digged in the earth, and hid the talent, for fear it should be stolen. Money is like manure (so my Lord Bacon used to say), good for nothing in the heap, but it must be spread; and so it is in spiritual gifts; many have them, and make no use of them for the end for which they were given them.

He hid his lord's money; had it been his own, he might have done as he pleased. His fellow-servants were busy and successful in trading, and their zeal should have provoked his. Are others active, and shall we be idle?

III. The account of this improvement, v. 19. The account is deferred; it is not till after a long time that they are reckoned with. Yet the day of account comes at last; The lord of those servants reckoneth with them. We must all be reckoned with—what good we have got to our own souls, and what good we have done to others.

1. The good account of the faithful servants. The servants giving up the account (v. 20, 22); "Lord, thou deliveredst to me five talents, and to me two; behold, I have gained five talents, and I two talents more."

Christ's faithful servants acknowledge with thankfulness his vouchsafements to them; Lord, thou deliveredst to me such and such things. It is good to remember what we have received, that we may know what is expected from us, and may render according to the benefit. We must never look upon our improvements but with a general mention of God's favour to us, of the honour he has put upon us, in entrusting us with his goods. For the truth is, the more we do for God, the more we are indebted to him for making use of us.

They produce, as an evidence of their faithfulness, what they have gained. God's good stewards have something to show for their diligence; Show me thy faith by thy works. He that is a good man, let him show it, James iii. 13. And it is observable that he who had but two talents, gave up his account as cheerfully as he who had five; for our comfort, in the day of account, will be according to our faithfulness, our sincerity, not our success; according to the uprightness of our hearts, not according to the degree of our opportunities.

The master's acceptance and approbation of their account, v. 21, 23.

First, He commended them; Well done, good and faithful servant. Those that own and honour God now, he will own and honour shortly. Christ will give them their just characters, of good and faithful. Their performances will be accepted; Well done. Christ will call those, and those only, good servants, that have done well. If we do that which is good, and do it well, we shall have praise of the same. Some masters are so morose, that they will not commend their servants; it is thought enough not to chide: but Christ will commend his servants that do well; whether their praise be of men or no, it is of him. If he saith, Well done, we are happy.

Secondly, He rewards them. All their work and labour of love shall be rewarded.

Now this reward is here expressed two ways.

(1) In one expression agreeable to the parable; Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things. It is usual in the courts of princes, and families of great men, to advance those to higher offices, that have been faithful in lower. Christ is a master that will prefer his servants who acquit themselves well. Christ has honour in store for those that honour him. Here they are beggars; in heaven they shall be rulers.

Observe the disproportion between the work and the reward; there are but few things in which the saints are serviceable to the glory of God, but there are many things wherein they shall be glorified with God. What charge we receive from God, what work we do for God in this world, is but little, very little, compared with the joy set before us.

(2) In another expression, which slips out of the parable into the thing signified by it; Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord. The state of the blessed is a state of joy. Where there are the vision and fruition of God, a perfection of holiness, and the society of the blessed, there cannot but be a fulness of joy. This joy is the joy of their Lord; the joy which he himself has purchased and provided for them; the joy of the redeemed, bought with the sorrow of the Redeemer. Christ admits his faithful stewards into his own joy, to be joint-heirs with him. Glorified saints shall enter into this joy, shall have a full and complete possession of it, as they that were ready, went in to the marriage feast. Shortly they shall enter into it, shall be in it to eternity, as in their element.

2. The bad account of the slothful servant.

(1) His apology for himself, v. 24, 25. Though he had received but one talent, for that one he is called to account. None shall be called to an account for more than they have received; but for what we have, we must all account.

First, What he confides in. "Lo, there thou hast that is thine; if I have not made it more, as the others have done, yet this I can say, I have not made it less." This, he thinks, may serve to bring him off, if not with praise, yet with safety. Slothful professors, that are afraid of doing too much for God, yet hope to come off as well as those that take so much pains in religion. This servant thought that this account would pass well enough, because he could say, There thou hast that is thine. Many that are called Christians, build great hopes for heaven upon their being able to make such an account; as if no more were required, or could be expected.

Secondly, What he confesses. He owns the burying of his talent; I hid thy talent in the earth. He speaks as if that were no great fault; nay, as if he deserved praise for his prudence in putting it in a safe place, and running no hazards with it.

Thirdly, What he makes his excuse; I knew that thou wert a hard man, and I was afraid. Good thoughts of God would beget love, and that love would make us diligent and faithful; but hard thoughts of God beget fear, and that fear makes us slothful and unfaithful. His excuse bespeaks,

[1] The sentiments of an enemy; I knew thee, that thou art a hard man. Thus his defence is his offence. Observe how confidently he speaks; I knew thee to be so. How could he know him to be so? Does not all the world know the contrary, that he is so far from being a hard master, that the earth is full of his goodness, so far from reaping where he sowed not, that he sows a great deal where he reaps nothing? For he causes the sun to shine, and his rain to fall, upon the evil and unthankful, and fills their hearts with food and gladness who say to the Almighty, Depart from us. This suggestion bespeaks the common reproach which wicked people cast upon God, as if all the blame of their sin and ruin lay at his door, for denying them his grace. But if we perish, it is owing to ourselves.

[2] The spirit of a slave; I was afraid. This ill affection toward God arose from his false notions of him. Hard thoughts of God drive us from, and cramp us in his service. Those who think it impossible to please him, and in vain to serve him, will do nothing to purpose in religion.

(2) His Lord's answer to this apology. His plea is made to turn against him, and he is struck speechless with it.

First, His conviction, v. 26, 27. Two things he is convicted of.

[1] Slothfulness; Thou wicked and slothful servant. Slothful servants are wicked servants. He that is careless in God's work, is near akin to him that is busy in the devil's work. Omissions are sins, and must come into judgment; slothfulness makes way for wickedness. When the house is empty, the unclean spirit takes possession. When men sleep, the enemy sows tares.

[2] Self-contradiction (v. 26, 27); Thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not: thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers. Three ways this may be taken; a. "Suppose I had been so hard a master, shouldest not thou therefore have been the more diligent and careful to please me, if not for love, yet for fear?" b. "If thou didst think me to be a hard master, and therefore durst not trade with the money thyself, for fear of losing by it, yet thou mightest have brought it to the bank, and then at my coming I should have received my own with usury." If we could not find in our hearts to venture upon more difficult and hazardous services, yet will that justify us in shrinking from those that were more safe and easy? Something is better than nothing; if we fail of showing our courage in bold enterprises, yet we must not fail to testify our goodwill in honest endeavours. c. "Suppose I did reap where I sowed not, yet that is nothing to thee, for I had sowed upon thee, and the talent was my money which thou wast entrusted with, not only to keep, but to improve."

Secondly, His condemnation. The slothful servant is sentenced,

[1] To be deprived of his talent (v. 28, 29); Take therefore the talent from him. And the meaning of this part of the parable we have in the reason of the sentence (v. 29), To every one that hath shall be given. This may be applied, a. To the blessings of this life —worldly wealth and possessions. These we are entrusted with, to be used for the glory of God, and the good of those about us. But from him that hath not, that is, that hath these things as if he had them not, they shall be taken away. b. We may apply it to the means of grace. They who are diligent in improving the opportunities they have, God will enlarge them. c. We may apply it to the common gifts of the Spirit. He that hath these, and doeth good with them, shall have abundance; these gifts improve by exercise, and brighten by being used; the more we do, the more we may do, in religion; but those who stir not up the gift that is in them their gifts rust, and decay, and go out like a neglected fire.

[2] He is sentenced to be cast into outer darkness, v. 30.

(1) His character is that of an unprofitable servant. Slothful servants will be reckoned with as unprofitable servants. A slothful servant is a withered member in the body, he is good for nothing. In one sense, we are all unprofitable servants (Luke xvii. 10); we cannot profit God. It is not enough not to do hurt, but we must do good, must bring forth fruit, and though thereby God is not profited, yet he is glorified, John xv. 8.

(2) His doom is, to be cast into outer darkness. Their state is, [1] Very dismal; it is outer darkness. In the dark no man can work, a fit punishment for a slothful servant. It is outer darkness, out from the light of heaven, out from the joy of their Lord, into which the faithful servants were admitted; out from the feast. [2] Very doleful; there is weeping and gnashing of teeth. This will be the portion of the slothful servant.

Verses 31-46

We have here a description of the process of the last judgment in the great day. It is, as it were, the explanation of the former parables.

I. The placing of the judge upon the judgment-seat (v. 31); When the Son of man shall come.

1. That there is a judgment to come, in which every man shall be sentenced according to what he did in this world of trial and probation.

2. The administration of the judgment of the great day is committed to the Son of man. Here, as elsewhere, when the last judgment is spoken of, Christ is called the son of man, because he is to judge the sons of men (and, being himself of the same nature, he is the more unexceptionable).

3. Christ's appearing to judge the world will be splendid and glorious. Christ will come to the judgment-seat in real glory; and all the world shall see what the saints only do now believe—that he is the brightness of his Father's glory. His first coming was under a black cloud of obscurity; his second will be in a bright cloud of glory.

4. When Christ comes in his glory to judge the world, he will bring all his holy angels with him. This glorious person will have a glorious retinue, his holy myriads.

5. He will then sit upon the throne of his glory. He is now set down with the Father upon his throne; and it is a throne of grace, to which we may come boldly; but then he will sit upon the throne of glory, the throne of judgment. Christ, in the days of his flesh, was arraigned as a prisoner at the bar; but at his second coming, he will sit as a judge upon the bench.

II. The appearing of all the children of men before him (v. 32); Before him shall be gathered all nations. The judgment of the great day will be a general judgment. All must be summoned before Christ's tribunal; all nations, all those nations of men that are made of one blood, to dwell on all the face of the earth.

III. The distinction that will then be made; He shall separate them one from another, as the tares and wheat are separated at the harvest, the good fish and the bad at the shore, the corn and chaff in the floor. Wicked and godly here dwell together and are not certainly distinguishable one from another: but in that day they will be separated, and parted for ever. They cannot separate themselves one from another in this world (1 Cor. v. 10), nor can anyone else separate them (ch. xiii. 29); but the Lord knows them that are his, and he can separate them. This is compared to a shepherd's dividing between the sheep and the goats. 1. Jesus Christ is the great Shepherd; he now feeds his flock like a shepherd, and will shortly distinguish between those that are his, and those that are not. 2. The godly are like sheep—innocent, mild, patient, useful: the wicked are like goats, a baser kind of animal, unsavoury and unruly. The sheep and goats are here feeding all day in the same pasture, but will be coted at night in different folds. Being thus divided, he will set the sheep on his right hand, and the goats on his left, v. 33. Christ puts honour upon the godly, as we show respect to those we set on our right hand. All other divisions and subdivisions will then be abolished; but the great distinction of men into saints and sinners, sanctified and unsanctified, will remain for ever.

IV. The process of the judgment concerning each of these.

1. Concerning the godly, on the right hand. Observe here,

(1) The glory conferred upon them (v. 34); The king shall say unto them. He that was the Shepherd (which bespeaks the care and tenderness wherewith he will make this disquisition), is here the King. Where the word of this King is, there is power. Here are two things in this sentence:

[1] The acknowledging of the saints to be the blessed of the Lord; Come, ye blessed of my Father. He pronounces them blessed; and his saying they are blessed, makes them so. Blessed of his Father; reproached and cursed by the world, but blessed of God. All our blessings in heavenly things flow to us from God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, Eph. i. 3. He calls them to come: this come is, in effect, "Welcome, ten thousand welcomes, to the blessings of my Father; come to me, come to be for ever with me; you that followed me bearing the cross, now come along with me wearing the crown." We now come boldly to the throne of grace, but we shall then come boldly to the throne of glory.

[2] The admission of the saints into the blessedness and kingdom of the Father; Inherit the kingdom prepared for you.

First, The happiness they shall be possessed of is very rich.

a. It is a kingdom; which is reckoned the most valuable possession on earth, and includes the greatest wealth and honour. They that here are beggars, prisoners, accounted as the off-scouring of all things, shall then inherit a kingdom.

b. It is a kingdom prepared: the happiness must needs be great, for it is the product of the divine counsels.

c. It is prepared for them. This bespeaks, (a) The suitableness of this happiness. (b) Their property and interest in it. It is prepared on purpose for them; not only for such as you, but for you, you by name.

d. It is prepared from the foundation of the world. This happiness was designed for the saints, and they for it, before time began, from all eternity, Eph. i. 4.

Secondly, The tenure by which they shall hold and possess it is very good, they shall come and inherit it. It is God that makes heirs, heirs of heaven. We come to an inheritance by virtue of our sonship, our adoption; if children, then heirs. A title by inheritance is the sweetest and surest title. Saints, in this world, are as heirs under age, tutored and governed till the time appointed of the Father (Gal. iv. 1, 2); and then they shall be put in full possession of that which now through grace they have a title to; Come, and inherit it.

(2) The ground of this (v. 35, 36), For I was an hungered, and ye gave me meat. We cannot hence infer that any good works of ours merit the happiness of heaven; but it is plain that Jesus Christ will judge the world by the same rule by which he governs it, and therefore will reward those that have been obedient to that law. This happiness will be adjudged to obedient believers, upon the promise of God purchased by Jesus Christ. It is the purchase and promise that give the title, the obedience is only the qualification of the person designed.

Now the good works here mentioned are such as we commonly call works of charity to the poor, and it teaches us this in general, that faith working by love is all in all in Christianity; Show me thy faith by thy works. The good works here described imply three things, which must be found in all that are saved.

[1] Self-denial, and contempt of the world; reckoning the things of the world no further good things, than as we are enabled to do good with them: and those who have not wherewithal to do good, must show the same disposition, by being contentedly and cheerfully poor.

[2] Love to our brethren; which is the second great commandment. We must give proof of this love by our readiness to do good, and to communicate; good wishes are but mockeries without good works. Those that have not to give, must show the same disposition some other way.

[3] A believing regard to Jesus Christ. That which is here rewarded is the relieving of the poor for Christ's sake, out of love to him. Those good works shall then be accepted which are done in the name of the Lord Jesus, Col. iii. 17.

I was hungry, and you gave them meat. It is no new thing for those that are feasted with the dainties of heaven to be hungry and thirsty, and to want daily food; for those that are at home in God, to be strangers in a strange land; for those that have put on Christ, to want clothes to keep them warm; for those that have healthful souls, to have sickly bodies; and for those to be in prison, that Christ has made free. Works of charity and beneficence, according as our ability is, are necessary to salvation. These must be the proofs of our love, and of our professed subjection to the gospel of Christ. But they that show no mercy, shall have judgment without mercy.

Now this reason is modestly excepted against by the righteous, but is explained by the Judge himself.

a. It is questioned by the righteous, v. 37–39. Not as if they were loth to inherit the kingdom, or were ashamed of their good deeds. Christ has a mighty regard to works of charity, and is especially pleased with kindnesses done to his people for his sake They bespeak the humble admiration which glorified saints will be filled with, to find such poor and worthless services, as theirs are, so highly celebrated, and richly rewarded: Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, and fed thee? Gracious souls are apt to think meanly of their own good deeds; especially as unworthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed. Saints in heaven will wonder what brought them thither, and that God should so regard them and their services. "When saw we thee an hungered? We have seen the poor in distress many a time; but when saw we thee?" Christ is more among us than we think he is.

b. It is explained by the Judge himself (v. 40); Inasmuch as ye have done it to these my brethren, to the least, to one of the least of them, ye have done it unto me. The good works of the saints, when they are produced in the great day, (a) Shall all be remembered; and not the least overlooked, no not a cup of cold water. (b) They shall be interpreted most to their advantage. As Christ makes the best of their infirmities, so he makes the most of their services.

But what will become of the godly poor, that had not wherewithal to do so? Must they be shut out? No, Christ will own them, even the least of them, as his brethren; he will not be ashamed, nor think it any disparagement to him, to call them brethren. In the height of his glory, he will not disown his poor relations. He will take the kindness done to them, as done to himself; Ye have done it unto me; which shows a respect to the poor that were relieved, as well as to the rich that did relieve them.

2. Here is the process concerning the wicked, those on the left hand. And in that we have,

(1) The sentence passed upon them, v. 41. He shall say to them, Depart from me, ye cursed.

[1] To be so near to Christ was some satisfaction, though under his frowns; but that will not be allowed, Depart from me. In this world they were often called to come to Christ, to come for life and rest, but they turned a deaf ear to his calls. Here they said to the Almighty, Depart from us; then he will say to them, Depart from me.

[2] If they must depart, and depart from Christ, might they not be dismissed with a blessing, with one kind and compassionate word at least? No, Depart, ye cursed. They that would not come to Christ, to inherit a blessing, must depart from him under the burthen of a curse. The righteous are called the blessed of my Father; for their blessedness is owing purely to the grace of God and his blessing, but the wicked are called only ye cursed, for their damnation is of themselves.

[3] If they must depart may they not go into some place of ease and rest? Will it not be misery enough for them to bewail their loss? They must depart into fire. This fire is the wrath of the eternal God.

[4] If into fire, prepared fire, O let it be but of short continuance, let them but pass through fire. No for the streams of mercy and grace being for ever excluded, there is nothing to extinguish it.

[5] If they must be doomed to such a state of endless misery, yet may they not have some good company there? No, none but the devil and his angels. They served the devil while they lived, and therefore are justly sentenced to be where he is, as those that served Christ, are taken to be with him where he is.

The reason of this sentence assigned.

[1] All that is charged upon them, on which the sentence is grounded, is, omission; as, before, the servant was condemned, not for wasting his talent, but for burying it. "When I was in these distresses, you were so selfish that you did not minister as you might have done to my relief and succour." Omissions are the ruin of thousands.

[2] It is the omission of works of charity to the poor; for omitting the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith. Uncharitableness to the poor is a damning sin. They shall have judgment without mercy, that have showed no mercy. Sinners will be condemned, at the great day, for the omission of that good which it was in the power of their hand to do. Now this reason of the sentence is,

First, Objected against by the prisoners (v. 44); Lord, when saw we thee an hungered, or athirst? Condemned sinners, though they have no plea that will bear them out, will yet in vain offer excuses. When saw we thee hungry, or thirsty, or naked? They care not to repeat the full charge, as conscious to themselves of their own guilt. The matter of their plea bespeaks their former inconsideration of that which they might have known, but would not till now that it was too late. They imagined it was only a company of poor, weak, silly, and contemptible people that they put those slights upon; but they who do so, will be made to know that it was Jesus whom they persecuted.

Secondly, Justified by the Judge. He goes by this rule (v. 45); Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me. What is done against the faithful disciples and followers of Christ, even the least of them, he takes as done against himself. In all their afflictions he is afflicted. He that touches them, touches him in a part no less tender than the apple of his eye.

Lastly, Here is the execution of both these sentences, v. 46.

a. The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment. Sentence will then be executed speedily. It can neither be thought that sinners should change their own natures, nor that God should give his grace to change them, when in this world the day of grace was misspent.

b. The righteous shall go away into life eternal; that is, they shall inherit the kingdom, v. 34. Heaven is life, it is all happiness. It is eternal life. There is no death to put a period to the life itself, nor old age to put a period to the comfort of it, or any sorrow to embitter it. Thus life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, are set before us, that we may choose our way; and so shall our end be.

CHAP. XXVI

The narrative of the death and sufferings of Christ is more particularly and fully recorded by all the four evangelists than any part of his history. And this chapter begins that memorable narrative. In this chapter, we have, I. The preliminaries, or prefaces, to Christ's sufferings. 1. The previous notice given by him to his disciples, ver. 1, 2. 2. The rulers' conspiracy against him, ver. 3–5. 3. The anointing of his head at a supper in Bethany, ver. 6–13. 4. Judas's bargain with the priests to betray him, ver. 14–16. 5. Christ eating the passover with his disciples, ver. 17–25. 6. His instituting the Lord's supper, and his discourse with his disciples, after it, ver. 26–35. II. His entrance upon them, and some of the particulars of them. 1. His agony in the garden, ver. 36–46. 2. The seizing of him by the officers, with Judas's help, ver. 47–56. 3. His arraignment before the chief priest, and his condemnation in his court, ver. 57–68. 4. Peter's denying him, ver. 69–75.

Verses 1–5

Here is, 1. The notice Christ gave his disciples of the near approach of his sufferings, v. 1, 2. He had often told them of his sufferings at a distance, now he speaks of them as at the door; after two days. Observe,

(1) The time when he gave this alarm; when he had finished all these sayings. Christ's witnesses die not till they have finished their testimony. He had bid his disciples to expect sad times, bonds and afflictions, and then tells them, The Son of man is betrayed; to intimate that they should fare no worse than he should, and that his sufferings should take the sting out of theirs.

(2) The thing itself he gave them notice of; The Son of man is betrayed. The thing was not only so sure, but so near, that it was as good as done. It is good to make sufferings that are yet to come, as present to us.

2. The plot of the chief priests, and scribes, and elders of the people, against the life of our Lord Jesus,

v. 3–5. Many consultations had been held against the life of Christ; but this plot was laid deeper than any yet, for the grandees were all engaged in it. (1) The place where they met; in the palace of the high priest. (2) The plot itself; to take Jesus by subtlety, and kill him; nothing less than his blood, his lifeblood, would serve their turn. (3) The policy of the plotters; Not on the feastday. Lest there should be an uproar among the people. They were awed, not by the fear of God, but by the fear of the people; all their concern was for their own safety, not God's honour.

Verses 6–13

I. The singular kindness of a good woman to our Lord Jesus in anointing his head, v. 6, 7. It was in Bethany, a village hard by Jerusalem, and in the house of Simon the leper. Probably he was one who had been miraculously cleansed from his leprosy by our Lord Jesus, and he would express his gratitude to Christ by entertaining him; nor did Christ disdain to come in to him, and sup with him. The woman that did this, is supposed to have been Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus. She had a box of ointment very precious, which she poured upon the head of Christ as he sat at meat. This, among us, would be a strange sort of compliment. But it was then accounted the highest piece of respect. Now this may be looked upon,

1. As an act of faith in our Lord Jesus, the Christ, the Messiah, the anointed.

2. As an act of love and respect to him. Some think that this was she who loved much at first, and washed Christ's feet with her tears (Luke vii. 38, 47). Where there is true love in the heart to Jesus Christ, nothing will be thought too good, no, nor good enough, to bestow upon him.

II. The offence which the disciples took at this. They had indignation (v. 8, 9).

1. See how they expressed their offence at it. They said, To what purpose is this waste? Now this bespeaks,

(1) Want of tenderness toward this good woman, in interpreting her over-kindness (suppose it was so) to be wastefulness. Charity teaches us to put the best construction upon everything that it will bear. It is true, there may be over-doing in well-doing; but thence we must learn not to be censorious of others; because that which we may impute to the want of prudence, God may accept as an instance of abundant love. We must not say, Those do too much in religion, that do more than we do, but rather aim to do as much as they.

(2) Want of respect to their Master. It did not become them to call it waste, when they perceived that he admitted and accepted it as a token of his friend's love. We must take heed of thinking anything waste, which is bestowed upon the Lord Jesus, either by others or by ourselves.

2. See how they excused their offence at it; This ointment might have been sold for much, and given to the poor.

III. The reproof Christ gave to his disciples for the offence at this good woman (v. 10, 11); Why trouble ye the woman? Note, It is a great trouble to good people to have their good works censured and misconstrued; and it is a thing that Jesus Christ takes very ill. He here took part against all his disciples; so heartily does he espouse the cause of the offended little ones, ch. xviii. 10.

Observe his reason; You have the poor always with you.

1. There are some opportunities of doing and getting good which are constant, and which we must give constant attendance to the improvement of. Those who have a heart to do good, never need complain for want of opportunity.

2. There are other opportunities of doing and getting good, which come but seldom, and which ought to be preferred before the other; "Me ye have not always, therefore use me while ye have me." Sometimes special works of piety and devotion should take place of common works of charity.

IV. Christ's approbation and commendation of the kindness of this good woman. He calls it a good work (v. 10), and says more in praise of it than could have been imagined; particularly,

1. That the meaning of it was mystical (v. 12); She did it for my burial. Some think that she intended it so, and that the woman better understood Christ's frequent predictions of his death and sufferings than the apostles did. Christ interpreted it so; and he is always willing to make the best, to make the most of his people's well-meant words and actions.

2. That the memorial of it should be honourable (v. 13); This shall be told for a memorial. This act of faith and love was so remarkable, that the preachers of Christ crucified, and the inspired writers of the history of his passion, could not choose but take notice of this passage. None of all the trumpets of fame sound so loud and so long as the everlasting gospel. Though the honour of Christ is principally designed in the gospel, yet the honour of his saints and servants is not altogether overlooked. The memorial of this woman was to be preserved by mentioning her faith and piety in the preaching of the gospel, for example to others.

Verses 14–16

Immediately after an instance of the greatest kindness done to Christ, follows an instance of the greatest unkindness; such mixture is there of good and bad among the followers of Christ.

I. The traitor was Judas Iscariot; he is said to be one of the twelve, as an aggravation of his villainy. When the number of the disciples was multiplied (Acts vi. 1), no marvel if there were some among them that were a shame and trouble to them; but when there were but twelve, and one of them was a devil, surely we must never expect any society perfectly pure on this side heaven. The twelve were Christ's chosen friends, and yet one of them betrayed him. No bonds of duty or gratitude will hold those that have a devil.

II. Here is the proffer which he made to the chief priests; he went to them, and said, What will ye give me? v. 15. They did not send for him, nor make the proposal to him; they could not have thought that one of Christ's own disciples should be false to him.

1. What Judas promised; "I will deliver him unto you; that you may seize him without noise, or danger of an uproar." In their conspiracy against Christ, this was it they were at a loss about, v. 4, 5. They durst not meddle with him in public, and knew not where to find him in private. Here the matter rested, and the difficulty was insuperable, till Judas came, and offered them his services. Those that give up themselves to be led by the devil, find him readier than they imagine to help them at a dead lift. Though the rulers, by their power and interest, could kill him when they had him in their hands, yet none but a disciple could betray him.

I will deliver him unto you. He did not offer himself to be a witness against Christ, though they wanted evidence, v. 59. This is an evidence of the innocency of our Lord Jesus, that his own disciple, who was false to him, could not charge him with anything criminal, though it would have served to justify his treachery.

2. What he asked in consideration of this undertaking; What will ye give me? This was the only thing that made Judas betray his Master; he hoped to get money by it. It was not the hatred of his Master, nor any quarrel with him, but purely the love of money; that, and nothing else, made Judas a traitor.

What will ye give me? Why, what did he want? Neither bread to eat, nor raiment to put on; neither necessaries nor conveniences. This covetous wretch could not be content, but comes basely cringing to the priests with, What will ye give me? It is not the lack of money, but the love of money, that is the root of all evil.

III. Here is the bargain which the chief priests made with him; they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. By the law (Exod. xxi. 32), thirty pieces of silver was the price of a slave—a goodly price, at which Christ was valued! They covenanted with him—they paid it down, so some; gave him his wages in hand, to secure him and to encourage him.

IV. Here is the industry of Judas, in pursuance of his bargain (v. 16); he sought opportunity to betray him, his head was still working to find out how he might do it effectually. It is a very wicked thing to seek opportunity to sin, and to devise mischief; for it argues the heart fully set in men to do evil. He had time to repent; but now by his covenant the devil tells him that he must be true to his word, though ever so false to his Master.

Verses 17–25

We have here an account of Christ's keeping the passover.

I. The time when Christ ate the passover, was the usual time appointed by God, and observed by the Jews (v. 17); the first day of the feast of unleavened bread.

II. The place was particularly appointed by himself to the disciples, upon their enquiry (v. 17): they asked, Where wilt thou that we prepare the passover?

1. They took it for granted that their Master would eat the passover, though he was at this time persecuted by the chief priests, and his life sought; they knew that he would not be put by his duty, either by frightenings without or fears within.

2. They knew very well that there must be preparation made for it, and that it was their business; Where wilt thou that we prepare? Before solemn ordinances there must be solemn preparation.

3. They knew that he had no house of his own wherein to eat the passover.

4. They would not pitch upon a place without direction from him, and from him they had direction; he sent them to such a man (v. 18), who probably was a friend and follower of his, and to his house he invited himself and his disciples.

(1) Tell him, My time is at hand; he means the time of his death. He knew when it was at hand, and was busy accordingly; we know not our time (Eccles. ix. 12), and therefore must never be off our watch; our time is always ready (John vii. 6), and therefore we must be always ready. When our Lord Jesus invited himself to this good man's house, he sent him this intelligence, that his time was at hand. Christ's secret is with them that entertain him in their hearts.

(2) Tell him, I will keep the passover at thy house. This was an instance of his authority, as the Master; he did not beg, but command, the use of his house for this purpose. Thus, when Christ by his Spirit comes into the heart, he demands admission, as one whose own the heart is and cannot be denied. His people shall be willing, for he makes them so. I will keep the passover with my disciples. Wherever Christ is welcome, he expects that his disciples should be welcome too. When we take God for our God, we take his people for our people.

III. The preparation was made by the disciples (v. 19); They did as Jesus had appointed. They made ready the passover; they got the lamb killed, and everything set in readiness for such a sacred solemn feast.

IV. They ate the passover according to the law (v. 20); He sat down. His sitting down, denotes the composedness of his mind, when he addressed himself to this solemnity; He sat down with the twelve, Judas not excepted. By the law, they were to take a lamb for a household; Christ's disciples were his household. They whom God has charged with families, must have their houses with them in serving the Lord.

V. We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples at the passover-supper. The usual subject was the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 26, 27); but the great Passover is now ready to be offered, and the discourse of that swallows up all talk of the other.

1. The general notice Christ gives his disciples of the treachery that should be among them (v. 21); One of you shall betray me. Christ knew it. We know not what troubles will befall us, nor whence they will arise: but Christ knew all his. It magnifies his love, that he knew all things that should befall him, and yet did not draw back. When there was occasion, he let those about him know it. He had often told them that the Son of man should be betrayed; now he tells them that one of them should do it.

2. The disciples' feelings on this occasion, v. 22.

(1) They were exceedingly sorrowful. It troubled them much to hear that their Master should be betrayed. When Peter was first told of it, he said, Be it far from thee. It troubled them more to hear that one of them should do it. Gracious souls grieve for the sins of others, especially of those that have made a more than ordinary profession of religion. It troubled them most of all, that they were left at uncertainty which of them it was.

(2) They began every one of them to say, Lord, is it I? They were not apt to suspect Judas. Though he was a thief, yet, it seems, he had carried it so plausibly, that none of them so much as looked upon him, much less said, Lord, is it Judas? It is possible for a hypocrite to go through the world, not only undiscovered, but unsuspected; like bad money so ingeniously counterfeited that nobody questions it.

They were apt to suspect themselves; Lord, is it I? They feared the worst, and asked Him who knows us better than we know ourselves, Lord is it I? We know not how strongly we may be tempted, nor how far God may leave us to ourselves, and therefore have reason, not to be high-minded, but fear.

3. Further information given them concerning this matter (v. 23, 24), where Christ tells them, (1) That the traitor was a familiar friend; He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, that is, One of you that are now with me at the table. It is base ingratitude to dip with Christ in the dish, and yet betray him. (2) That this was according to the scripture, which would take off the offence at it. The more we see of the fulfilling of the scripture in our troubles, the better we may bear them. (3) That it would prove a very dear bargain to the traitor; Woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed. Though God can serve his own purposes by the sins of men, that doth not make the sinner's condition the less woeful; It had been good for that man, if he had not been born.

4. The conviction of Judas, v. 25. He asked, Is it I? to avoid coming under the suspicion of guilt by his silence. He knew very well that it was he, and yet wished to appear a stranger to such a plot. Note, Many whose consciences condemn them are very industrious to justify themselves before men, and put a good face on it, with, Lord, is it I? Christ soon answered this question; Thou hast said. It was enough to convict him, and, if his heart had not been wretchedly hardened, to have broken the neck of his plot, when he saw it discovered to his Master, and discovered by him.

Verses 26–30

We have here the institution of the great gospel ordinance of the Lord's supper.

I. The time when it was instituted—as they were eating. At the latter end of the passover-supper, before the table was drawn, because it was to come in the room of that ordinance. Christ is to us the Passover-sacrifice by which atonement is made (1 Cor. v. 7); Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us.

II. The institution itself. A sacrament must be instituted; it has both its being and significancy from the institution, from a divine institution. Hence the apostle (1. Cor. xi. 23, &c.), in that discourse of his concerning this ordinance, all along calls Jesus Christ the Lord, because, as Lord, he appointed this ordinance.

1. The body of Christ is signified and represented by bread; he had said formerly (John vi. 35), I am the bread of life. As the life of the body is supported by bread, so the life of the soul is supported and maintained by Christ's mediation.

(1) He took bread—the loaf; some loaf that lay ready at hand, fit for the purpose. His taking the bread was a solemn action, and was, probably, done in such a manner as to be observed by them that sat with him.

(2) He blessed it; set it apart for this use by prayer and thanksgiving. We do not find any set form of words used by him upon this occasion. Christ could command the blessing, and we, in his name, are emboldened to beg the blessing.

(3) He brake it; which denotes, [1] The breaking of Christ's body for us, that it might be fitted for our use; He was bruised for our iniquities. [2] The breaking of Christ's body to us, as the father of the family breaks the bread to the children.

(4) He gave it to his disciples, as the Master of the family, and the Master of this feast. To the disciples, because all the disciples of Christ have a right to this ordinance; and those shall have the benefit of it who are his disciples indeed; yet he gave it to them as he did the multiplied loaves, by them to be handed to all his other followers.

(5) He said, Take, eat; this is my body, v. 26. He here tells them,

[1] What they should do with it; "Take, eat; accept of Christ as he is offered to you, receive the atonement, approve of it, consent to it." Believing on Christ is expressed by receiving him (John i. 12), and feeding upon him, John vi. 57, 58. Meat looked upon, or the dish ever so well garnished, will not nourish us; it must be fed upon: so must the doctrine of Christ.

[2] What they should have with it; This is my body, not ὄντος—this bread, but τοῦτο—this eating and drinking. Believing carries all the efficacy of Christ's death to our souls. This is my body, spiritually and sacramentally; this signifies and represents my body. He employs sacramental language. We partake of the sun, not by having the bulk and body of the sun put into our hands, but the beams of it darted down upon us; so we partake of Christ by partaking of his grace, and the blessed fruits of the breaking of his body.

2. The blood of Christ is signified and represented by the wine (v. 27, 28); He took the cup, the grace-cup, which was set ready to be drank, after thanks returned, according to the custom of the Jews at the passover. He gave thanks, to teach us, not only in every ordinance, but in every part of the ordinance, to have our eyes up to God.

This cup he gave to the disciples,

(1) With a command; Drink ye all of it. Thus he welcomes his guests to his table, obliges them all to drink of his cup.

(2) With an explication; For this is my blood of the New Testament. Hitherto the blood of Christ had been represented by the blood of beasts, real blood: but, after it was actually shed, it was represented by the blood of grapes, metaphorical blood.

[1] It is my blood of the New Testament. The covenant God is pleased to make with us, and all the benefits and privileges of it, are owing to the merits of Christ's death.

[2] It is shed; it was not shed till next day, but it was now upon the point of being shed, it is as good as done.

[3] It is shed for many. Christ came to confirm a covenant with many. The blood of the Old Testament was shed for a few. But Jesus Christ is a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, 1 John ii. 2.

[4] It is shed for the remission of sins, that is, to purchase remission of sins for us. The new covenant which is procured and ratified by the blood of Christ, is a charter of pardon, an act of indemnity, in order to a reconciliation between God and man. The pardon of sin is that great blessing which is, in the Lord's supper, conferred upon all true believers; it is the foundation of all other blessings, and the spring of everlasting comfort, ch. ix. 2, 3. A farewell is now bidden to the fruit of the vine, v. 29. How good to be here! Never such a heaven upon earth as was at this table; but it was not intended for a perpetuity.

First, He takes leave of such communion; I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine. Farewell this fruit of the vine, this passover-cup, this sacramental wine. Dying saints take their leave of sacraments, and the other ordinances of communion which they enjoy in this world, with comfort, for the joy and glory they enter into supersede them all; when the sun rises, farewell the candles.

Secondly, He assures them of a happy meeting again at last. Until that day when I drink it new with you. Some understand it of the interviews he had with them after his resurrection. Others understand it of the joys and glories of the future state, which the saints shall partake of in everlasting communion with the Lord Jesus. Christ will himself partake of those pleasures; it was the joy set before him, which he had in his eye, and all his faithful friends and followers shall partake with him.

Lastly, Here is the close of the solemnity with a hymn (v. 30); They sang a hymn or psalm. Singing of psalms is a gospel-ordinance. It is very proper after the Lord's supper, as an expression of our joy in God through Jesus Christ, and a thankful acknowledgment of that great love wherewith God has loved us in him. It is not unseasonable, no, not in times of sorrow and suffering. Our spiritual joy should not be interrupted by outward afflictions.

When this was done, they went out into the mount of Olives. He would not stay in the house to be apprehended, lest he should bring the master of the house into trouble; but he retired into the adjacent country, the mount of Olives. They had the benefit of moonlight for this walk, for the passover was always at the full moon. After we have received the Lord's supper, it is good for us to retire for prayer and meditation, and to be alone with God.

Verses 31–35

We have here Christ's discourse with his disciples upon the way.

I. A prediction of the trial which both he and his disciples were now to go through. He here foretells,

1. A dismal scattering storm just arising, v. 31.

(1) That they should all be offended because of Christ that very night; they would not have the courage to cleave to him but would all basely desert him. Offences will come among the disciples of Christ in an hour of trial and temptation; it cannot be but they should, for they are weak. Even they whose hearts are upright may sometimes be overtaken with an offence. There are some temptations and offences, the effects of which are general, All you shall be offended. Though there will be but one traitor, they will be all deserters. We have need to prepare for sudden trials, which may come to extremity in a very little time. How soon may a storm arise! The cross of Christ is the great stumbling-block to many that pass for his disciples.

(2) That herein the scripture would be fulfilled; I will smite the Shepherd. It is quoted from Zech. xiii. 7. Here is the smiting of the Shepherd in the sufferings of Christ, and the scattering of the sheep, thereupon, in the flight of the disciples. It was each one's care to shift for himself, and happy he that could get furthest from the cross.

2. He gives them the prospect of a comfortable gathering together again after this storm (v. 32); "After I am risen again, I will go before you. Though you will forsake me, I will not forsake you; though you fall, I will take care you shall not fall finally: we shall have a meeting again in Galilee, I will go before you, as the shepherd before the sheep." The captain of our salvation knows how to rally his troops, when, through their cowardice, they have been put into disorder.

II. The presumption of Peter (v. 33); Though all men be offended, yet will I never be offended. Peter had a great stock of confidence, and was upon all occasions forward to speak; sometimes it did him a kindness, but at other times it betrayed him, as it did here.

1. How he bound himself with a promise, that he would never be offended in Christ. Before the Lord's supper, Christ's discourse led his disciples to examine themselves with, Lord, is it I? For that is our preparatory duty; after the ordinance, his discourse leads them to an engaging of themselves to close walking, for that is the subsequent duty.

2. How he fancied himself better armed against temptation than anyone else, Though all men shall be offended yet will not I. Peter supposes it possible that some, nay that all, might be offended, and yet he escape better than any. We should rather say, If it be possible that others may be offended, there is danger that I may be so.

III. The particular warning Christ gave Peter of what he would do, v. 34. He imagined that in the hour of temptation he should come off better than any of them, and Christ tells him that he should come off worse. "Verily, I say unto thee; take my word for it, who know thee better than thou knowest thyself." He tells him,

1. That he should deny him. He said, "Though all men, yet not I"; and he did it sooner than any.

2. How quickly he should do it; this night, before to-morrow, nay, before cock-crowing. As we know not how near we may be to trouble, so we know not how near we may be to sin; if God leave us to ourselves, we are always in danger.

3. How often he should do it; thrice. Christ tells him that he would do it again and again; for, when once our feet begin to slip, it is hard to recover our standing again.

IV. Peter's repeated assurances of his fidelity (v. 35); Though I should die with thee. He knew what he should do—rather die with Christ than deny him; and he thought what he would do—never be false to his Master, whatever it cost him; yet, it proved, he was. It is easy to talk boldly and carelessly of death at a distance; but it is not so soon done as said, when it comes to the setting-to, and death shows itself in its own colours.

What Peter said the rest subscribed to; likewise also said all the disciples. There is a proneness in good men to be over-confident of their own strength and stability. Those often fall soonest and foulest that are most confident of themselves. Those are least safe that are most secure.

Verses 36–46

In these verses we have the story of his agony in the garden. The clouds had been gathering a good while, and looked black. But now the storm began in good earnest.

I. The place where he underwent this mighty agony; it was in a place called Gethsemane. The name signifies an olive-mill, a press for olives, like a wine-press, where they trod the olives. There our Lord Jesus began his passion; there it pleased the Lord to bruise him, and crush him, that fresh oil might flow to all believers from him.

II. The company he had with him, when he was in this agony.

1. He took all the twelve disciples with him to the garden, except Judas, who was at this time otherwise employed.

2. He took only Peter, and James, and John, with him into that corner of the garden where he suffered his agony. He left the rest at some distance, with this charge, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder. Christ went to pray alone, though he had lately prayed with his disciples, John xvii. 1. He took these three with him, because they had been the witnesses of his glory in his transfiguration (ch. xvii. 1, 2), and that would prepare them to be the witnesses of his agony. Those are best prepared to suffer with Christ, that have by faith beheld his glory. If we hope to reign with him, why should we not expect to suffer with him?

III. The agony itself that he was in; He began to be sorrowful, and very heavy. It is called an agony (Luke xxii. 44), a conflict. It was not any bodily pain or torment that he was in, it was from within; he troubled himself, John xi. 33. The words here used are very emphatical; he began to be sorrowful, and in a consternation. He had like a weight of lead upon his spirits.

But what was the cause of all this? What was it that put him into this agony? Why art thou cast down, blessed Jesus, and why disquieted? Certainly, it was nothing of despair or distrust of his Father, much less any conflict or struggle with him. As the Father loved him because he laid down his life for the sheep, so he was entirely subject to his Father's will in it. But,

1. He engaged in an encounter with the powers of darkness; so he intimates (Luke xxii. 53). As the Father gave me commandment, so I do; however it be, I must have a struggle with him, therefore arise, let us go hence, let us hasten to the field of battle, and meet the enemy. Christ, when he works salvation, is described like a champion taking the field, Isa. lix. 16–18.

2. He was now bearing the iniquities which the Father laid upon him, and, by his sorrow and amazement, he accommodated himself to his undertaking. The sufferings he was entering upon were for our sins; they were all made to meet upon him, and he knew it. As we are obliged to be sorry for our particular sins, so was he grieved for the sins of us all.

3. He had a full and clear prospect of all the sufferings that were before him. He foresaw the treachery of Judas, the unkindness of Peter, the malice of the Jews, and their base ingratitude. Death in its most dreadful appearances, death in pomp, attended with all its terrors, looked him in the face; and this made him sorrowful, especially because it was the wages of our sin, which he had undertaken to satisfy for. It is true, the martyrs have suffered for Christ without any such sorrow and consternation. But then, (1) Christ was now denied the supports and comforts which they had; that is, he denied them to himself. Their cheerfulness under the cross was owing to the divine favour, which, for the present, was suspended from the Lord Jesus. (2) His sufferings were of another nature from theirs. On the saints' cross there is a blessing pronounced, which enables them to rejoice under it (ch. v. 10, 12); but to Christ's cross there was a curse annexed, which made him sorrowful and very heavy under it. And his sorrow under the cross was the foundation of their joy under it.

IV. His complaint of this agony. He goes to his disciples (v. 38), and,

1. He acquaints them with his condition; My soul is exceedingly sorrowful, even unto death. It gives some little ease to a troubled spirit, to have a friend ready to unbosom itself to, and give vent to its sorrows. Christ here tells them, (1) What was the seat of his sorrow; it was his soul that was now in an agony. Christ suffered in soul as well as in body. (2) What was the degree of his sorrow. He was exceedingly sorrowful. It was sorrow in the highest degree, even unto death; it was a killing sorrow, such sorrow as no mortal man could bear and live. (3) The duration of it; it will continue even unto death. He now began to be sorrowful, and never ceased to be so till he said, It is finished. It was prophesied of Christ, that he should be a Man of sorrows (Isa. liii. 3).

2. He bespeaks their company and attendance; Tarry ye here, and watch with me. Surely he was destitute indeed of help, when he entreated theirs, who, he knew, would be but miserable comforters. It is good to have, and therefore good to seek, the assistance of our brethren, when at any time we are in an agony.

V. What passed between him and his Father when he was in this agony; Being in an agony, he prayed. Prayer is never out of season, but it is especially seasonable in an agony.

1. The place where he prayed; He went a little further, withdrew from them. He retired for prayer; a troubled soul finds most ease when it is alone with God, who understands the broken language of sighs and groans. Christ has hereby taught us that secret prayer must be made secretly.

2. His posture in prayer; He fell on his face; his lying prostrate denotes, (1) The agony he was in, and the extremity of his sorrow. (2) His humility in prayer.

3. The prayer itself; wherein we may observe three things.

(1) The title he gives to God; O my Father. Thick as the cloud was, he could see God as a Father through it. It is a pleasing string to harp upon at such a time, My Father; whither should the child go, when anything grieves him, but to his father?

(2) The favour he begs; If it be possible, let this cup pass from me. He calls his sufferings a cup; not a river, not a sea, but a cup, which we shall soon see the bottom of. When we are under troubles, we should make the best, the least, of them, and not aggravate them. He begs that this cup might pass from him, that is, that he might avoid the sufferings now at hand; or, at least, that they might be shortened. This intimates no more than that he was really and truly Man, and as a Man he could not but be averse to pain and suffering. A prayer of faith against an affliction, may very well consist with the patience of hope under affliction. But observe the proviso; If it be possible. If God may be glorified, man saved, and the ends of his undertaking answered, without his drinking of this bitter cup, he desires to be excused; otherwise not. What we cannot do with the securing of our great end, we must reckon to be in effect impossible; Christ did so.

(3) His entire submission to, and acquiescence in, the will of God; Nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt. Our Lord Jesus, though he had a quick sense of the extreme bitterness of the sufferings he was to undergo, yet was freely willing to submit to them for our redemption and salvation. The reason of Christ's submission to his sufferings, was, his Father's will; as thou wilt, v. 39. He grounds his own willingness upon the Father's will. He did what he did, and did it with delight, because it was the will of God. This he had often referred to, as that which put him upon, and carried him through, his whole undertaking. In conformity to this example of Christ, we must drink of the bitter cup which God puts into our hands, be it ever so bitter; though nature struggle, grace must submit.

4. The repetition of the prayer; He went away again the second time, and prayed (v. 42), and again the third time (v. 44). Though we may pray to God to prevent and remove an affliction, yet our chief errand must be, that he will give us grace to bear it well. It should be more our care to get our troubles sanctified, and our hearts satisfied under them, than to get them taken away. He prayed, saying, Thy will be done. Prayer is the offering up, not only of our desires, but of our resignations, to God. The third time he said the same words. It should seem by v. 40 that he continued an hour in his agony and prayer; but, whatever more he said, it was to this effect, deprecating his approaching sufferings, and yet resigning himself to God's will in them.

But what answer had he to this prayer? Certainly it was not made in vain; he that heard him always, did not deny him now. It is true, the cup did not pass from him, but he had an answer to his prayer; for, He was strengthened with strength in his soul; and that was a real answer, Luke xxii. 43. In answer to his prayer, God provided that he should not fail or be discouraged.

VI. What passed between him and his three disciples at this time.

1. The fault they were guilty of; that when he was in his agony, they were so little concerned, that they could not keep awake; he comes, and finds them asleep, v. 40. Much more should their love to their Master, and their care concerning him, have obliged them to a more close and vigilant attendance on him; yet they were so dull, that they could not keep their eyes open. What had become of us, if Christ had been now as sleepy as his disciples were? Christ engaged them to watch with him, as if he expected some succour from them, and yet they slept; surely it was the unkindest thing that could be. His enemies, who watched for him, were wakeful enough (Mark xiv. 43); but his disciples, who should have watched with him, were asleep.

2. Christ's favour to them, notwithstanding. Persons in sorrow are too apt to be cross and peevish with those about them, but Christ in his agony is as meek as ever and is not apt to take things ill.

When Christ's disciples put this slight upon him,

(1) He came to them, as if he expected to receive some comfort from them. They added grief to his sorrow; and yet he came to them, more careful for them than they were for themselves; when he was most engaged, yet he came to look after them; for those that were given him, were upon his heart, living and dying.

(2) He gave them a gentle reproof; he directed it to Peter, who used to speak for them; let him now hear for them. What! could ye not watch with me one hour? He speaks as one amazed to see them so stupid. Consider, [1] Who they were; "Could not ye watch—ye, my disciples and followers? From you I expected better things." [2] Who he was; "Watch with me." He awoke out of his sleep, to help them when they were in distress (ch. viii. 36); and could not they keep awake, at least to show their goodwill to him? [3] How small a thing it was that he expected from them—only to watch with him. If he had bid them do some great thing, or die with him, they thought they could have done it; and yet they could not do it, when he only desired them to watch with him. [4] How short a time it was that he expected it—but one hour; they were not set upon the guard whole nights, only one hour.

(3) He gave them good counsel; Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation, v. 41. There was an hour of temptation drawing on, and very near; the troubles of Christ were temptations to his followers to disbelieve and distrust him, to deny and desert him, and renounce all relation to him. There was danger of their entering into the temptation, as into a snare or trap. He therefore exhorts them to watch and pray; Watch with me, and pray with me. While they were sleeping they lost the benefit of joining in Christ's prayer. "Watch yourselves, and pray yourselves. Pray that you may watch; beg of God by his grace to keep you awake, now that there is occasion."

(4) He kindly excused for them; The spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. We do not read of one word they had to say for themselves; but then he had a tender word to say on their behalf; in this he sets us an example of that love which covers a multitude of sins. He considered their frame, and did not chide them, for he remembered that they were but flesh; and the flesh is weak, though the spirit be willing. It is the unhappiness and burthen of Christ's disciples, that their bodies cannot keep pace with their souls in works of piety and devotion, but are many a time a cloud and clog to them; that, when the spirit is free and disposed to that which is good, the flesh is averse and indisposed. Yet it is our comfort, that our Master graciously considers this, and accepts the willingness of the spirit, and pities and pardons the weakness and infirmity of the flesh; for we are under grace, and not under the law.

(5) Though they continued dull and sleepy, he did not any further rebuke them for it; for, though we daily offend, yet he will not always chide. When he came to them the second time, we do not find that he said anything to them (v. 43); he findeth them asleep again. One would have thought that he had said enough to them to keep them awake; but it is hard to recover from a spirit of slumber. Their eyes were heavy, which intimates that they strove against it as much as they could, but were overcome by it, and therefore their Master looked upon them with compassion. When he came the third time, he left them to be alarmed with the approaching danger (v. 45, 46); Sleep on now, and take your rest. See here how Christ deals with those that suffer themselves to be overcome by security, and will not be awakened out of it. Sometimes he gives them up to the power of it; Sleep on now. He that will sleep, let him sleep still. The curse of spiritual slumber is the just punishment of the sin of it. Many times he sends some startling judgment. Those who will not be alarmed by reasons and arguments, had better be alarmed by swords and spears than left to perish in their security. Let those that would not believe, be made to feel.

As to the disciples here, their Master gave them notice of the near approach of his enemies. The Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. And again, He is at hand that doth betray me. Christ's sufferings were no surprise to him. He called them to rise, and be going: not, "Rise, and let us flee from the danger"; but, "Rise, and let us go meet it". He intimates to them their folly, in sleeping away the time which they should have spent in preparation; now the event found them unready, and was a terror to them.

Verses 47–56

We are here told how the blessed Jesus was seized, and taken into custody; this followed immediately upon his agony, while he yet spake; for from the beginning to the close of his passion he had not the least intermission or breathing-time.

Now concerning the apprehension of the Lord Jesus,

I. Who the persons were, that were employed in it. Here was Judas, one of the twelve, at the head of this infamous guard: he was guide to them that took Jesus (Acts i. 16); without his help they could not have found him in this retirement. Here was with him a great multitude. This multitude was made up partly of a detachment out of the guards. these were Gentiles, sinners, as Christ calls them, v. 45. The rest were the servants and officers of the High Priest, and they were Jews; they that were at variance with each other, agreed against Christ.

II. How they were armed for this enterprise.

1. What weapons they were armed with; They came with swords and staves. They were not regular troops, but a tumultuous rabble. But wherefore is this ado? His hour being come for him to give up himself, all this force was needless. When a butcher goes into the field to take out a lamb for the slaughter, does he raise the militia, and come armed? No, he needs not; yet is there all this force used to seize the Lamb of God.

2. What warrant they were armed with; They came from the chief priests, and elders of the people. He was taken up by a warrant from the great sanhedrim, as a person obnoxious to them. Pilate, the Roman governor, gave them no warrant; but they were men who pretended to religion, and presided in the affairs of the church, that were active in this prosecution, and were the most spiteful enemies Christ had. Pilate upbraided him with it; Thine own nation and the chief priests delivered thee to me, John xviii. 35.

III. The manner how it was done, and what passed at that time.

1. How Judas betrayed him; he did his business effectually, and his resolution in this wickedness may shame us who fail in that which is good.

(1) The instructions he gave to the soldiers (v. 48). He gave them a sign, lest by mistake they should seize one of the disciples instead of him. That same is he; and when they had him in their hands, not to lose him—Hold him fast; for he had sometimes escaped from those who thought to secure him; as Luke iv. 30. And Judas by his kiss intended not only to distinguish him, but to detain him, while they came behind him, and laid hands on him.

(2) The dissembling compliment he gave his Master. He came close up to Jesus; surely when he comes to look him in the face, he will either be awed by its majesty, or charmed by its beauty. Dares he to come into his very sight and presence, to betray him? Peter denied Christ, but when the Lord turned and looked upon him, he relented presently; but Judas comes up to his Master's face, and betrays him. He said, Hail, Master; and kissed him. A kiss is a token of allegiance and friendship. But Judas, when he broke all the laws of love and duty, profaned this sacred sign to serve his purpose.

(3) The entertainment his Master gave him, v. 50. He calls him friend. He would teach us under the greatest provocation to forbear bitterness. He calls Christ was brought into the judgment both of Jews and Gentiles, and both had a hand in his death.

II. The money which they had paid to Judas for betraying Christ, is by him delivered back to them, and Judas, in despair, hangs himself. The chief priests and elders supported themselves with this, in prosecuting Christ, that his own disciple betrayed him to them; but now, in the midst of the prosecution, that string failed them, and even he is made to them a witness of Christ's innocency, which served, 1. For glory to Christ in the midst of his sufferings, and a specimen of his victory over Satan who had entered into Judas. 2. For warning to his persecutors, and to leave them the more inexcusable.

(1) See here how Judas repented: not like Peter, who repented, believed, and was pardoned: no, he repented, despaired, and was ruined.

[1] What induced him to repent. It was when he saw that he was condemned. Judas, it is probable, expected that Christ would have made his escape out of their hands, and then Christ would have had the honour, the Jews the shame, and he the money, and no harm done. This he had no reason to expect, because he had so often heard his Master say that he must be crucified. Those who measure actions by the consequences of them rather than by the divine law, will find themselves mistaken in their measures. The way of sin is down-hill; and if we cannot easily stop ourselves, much less can we stop others whom we have set going in a sinful way. He repented himself. When he was tempted to betray his Master, the thirty pieces of silver looked very fine and glittering. But when the thing was done, and the money paid, the silver was become dross. Now his conscience flew in his face; "What have I done! What a fool, what a wretch, am I, to sell my Master for such a trifle! It is owing to me, that he is bound and condemned, spat upon and buffeted. I little thought it would have come to this, when I made that wicked bargain." The remembrance of his Master's goodness to him, steeled his convictions, and made them the more piercing. Now he found his Master's words true; It were better for that man, that he had never been born. Sin will soon change its taste.

[2] What were the indications of his repentance. First, He made restitution; He brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests. Now the money burned in his conscience, and he was as sick of it as ever he had been fond of it. That which is ill gotten, will never do good to those that get it. If he had repented, and brought the money back before he had betrayed Christ, he might have done it with comfort; but now it was too late, now he cannot do it without horror. What is unjustly gotten, must not be kept: for that is a continuance in the sin by which it was got. He brought it to those from whom he had it, to let them know that he repented his bargain.

Secondly, He made confession (v. 4); I have sinned, in that I have betrayed innocent blood. 1. To the honour of Christ, he pronounces his blood innocent. He, freely and without being urged to it, pronounces him innocent, to the face of those who had pronounced him guilty. 2. To his own shame, he confesses that he had sinned, in betraying this blood. He does not lay the blame on anyone else, but takes it all to himself; "I have sinned, in doing it." Thus far Judas went toward his repentance, yet it was not to salvation. He confessed, but not to God, did not go to him, and say, I have sinned, Father, against heaven.

(2) See here how the chief priests and elders entertained Judas's penitential confession; they said, What is that to us? See thou to that.

[1] See here how carelessly they speak of the betraying of Christ. What is that to us? Was it nothing to them that they had thirsted after this blood, and hired Judas to betray it, and had now condemned it to be shed unjustly?

[2] See here how carelessly they speak the sin of Judas; he said, I have sinned, and they said, "What is that to us? What are we concerned in thy sin, that thou tellest us of it?" It is folly for us to think that the sins of others are nothing to us, especially those sins that we are any way accessory to, or partakers in. The guilt of sin is not so easily transferred as some people think it is. If there were guilt in the matter, they tell Judas that he must look to it, he must bear it. First, Because he had betrayed him to them. His was indeed the greater sin (John xix. 11); but it did not therefore follow, that theirs was no sin. Secondly, Because he knew and believed him to be innocent. "If he be innocent, see thou to it. We have adjudged him guilty, and therefore may justly prosecute him as such." Wicked practices are buoyed up by wicked principles, and particularly by this, That sin is sin only to those that think it to be so; that it is no harm to persecute a good man, if we take him to be a bad man.

[3] See how carelessly they speak of the conviction, terror, and remorse, that Judas was under. They were glad to make use of him in the sin, and were then very fond of him. But now they slighted him, had nothing to say to him, but turned him over to his own terrors. Those that are resolvedly impenitent, look with disdain upon the penitent. When they had brought him into the snare, they not only left him, but laughed at him. Sinners, under convictions, will find their old companions in sin, but miserable comforters. It is usual for those that love the treason, to hate the traitor.

(3) Here is the utter despair that Judas was hereby driven into. He grew desperate, v. 5.

[1] He cast down the pieces of silver in the temple. The chief priests would not take the money, for fear of taking thereby the whole guilt to themselves. Judas would not keep it, it was too hot for him to hold, he therefore threw it down in the temple, that, whether they would or no, it might fall into the hands of the chief priests.

[2] He went, and hanged himself. First, He retired; he withdrew into some solitary place. Woe to him that is in despair, and is alone. If Judas had gone to Christ, or to some of the disciples, perhaps he might have had relief, bad as the case was. Secondly, He became his own executioner; He hanged himself. Judas had a sight and sense of sin, but no apprehension of the mercy of God in Christ. His sin, we may suppose, was not in its own nature unpardonable: but he concluded, as Cain, that his iniquity was greater than could be forgiven. And some have said, that Judas sinned more in despairing of the mercy of God, than in betraying his Master's blood. He throws himself into the fire, to avoid the flame; but miserable is the case when a man must go to hell for ease. 1. We have an instance of the wretched end of those into whom Satan enters, and particularly those that are given up to the love of money. 2. We have an instance of the wrath of God. As in the story of Peter we behold the goodness of God, and the triumphs of Christ's grace in the conversion of some sinners; so in the story of Judas we behold the severity of God. 3. We have an instance of the direful effects of despair: it often ends in self-murder. Let us think as bad as we can of sin, provided we do not think it unpardonable; let us despair of help in ourselves, but not of help in God. And self-murder, though prescribed by some of the heathen moralists, is certainly a remedy worse than the disease, how bad soever the disease may be.

(4) The disposal of the money which Judas brought back, v. 6–10. It was laid out in the purchase of a field, called the potter's field. And this field was to be a burying-place for strangers. It looks like an instance of their humanity, that they took care for the burying of strangers. It was no instance of their humility that they would bury strangers in a place by themselves. Strangers must keep their distance, alive and dead, and that principle must go down to the grave.

This buying of the potter's field took place not long after; for Peter speaks of it soon after Christ's ascension: yet it is here recorded.

First, To show the hypocrisy of the chief priests and elders. They scruple to put that money into the treasury, or corban, of the temple, with which they had hired the traitor. They would not put that money into it, which was the price of blood. The hire of a traitor they thought parallel to the hire of a whore, and the price of a malefactor (such a one they made Christ to be) equivalent to the price of a dog, neither of which was to be brought into the house of the Lord. Thus they that swallowed a camel, strained at a gnat. They think to atone for what they had done, by this public good act of providing a burying-place for strangers, though not at their own charge.

Secondly, To signify the favour intended by the blood of Christ to strangers, and sinners of the Gentiles. Through the price of his blood, a resting place is provided for them after death. The grave is the potter's field, but Christ by his blood purchased it. He has altered the property of it (as a purchaser doth), so that now death is ours, the grave is ours, a bed of rest for us.

Thirdly, To perpetuate the infamy of those that bought and sold the blood of Christ. This field was commonly called Aceldama—the field of blood; not by the chief priests, they hoped in this burying-place to bury the remembrance of their own crime; but by the people. They fastened this name upon the field in perpetuam rei memoriam—for a perpetual memorial.

Fourthly, That we may see how the scripture was fulfilled (v. 9, 10); Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy the prophet. The words quoted are found in the prophecy of Zechariah, ch. xi. 12. How they are here said to be spoken by Jeremy is a difficult question. The Syriac version, which is ancient, reads only, It was spoken by the prophet, not naming any. The Jews used to say, The spirit of Jeremiah was in Zechariah. Here that is really acted, which was there but figuratively expressed. The sum of money is the same—thirty pieces of silver; this they weighed for his price, and this was cast to the potter in the house of the Lord; which was here literally accomplished.

The giving of the price of him that was valued, not for him, but for the potter's field, bespeaks, 1. The high value that ought to be put upon Christ. He cannot be valued with the gold of Ophir, nor this unspeakable Gift bought with money. 2. The low value that was put upon him. They of the children of Israel did strangely undervalue him, when his price did but reach to buy a potter's field, a pitiful sorry spot of ground, not worth looking upon. Cast it to the potter, so it is in Zechariah; a contemptible petty chapman, not the merchant that deals in things of value. He gave kings' ransoms for them, but they gave a slave's ransom for him (see Exod. xxi. 32), and valued him but at the rate of a potter's field. But all this was as the Lord appointed.

Verses 11–25

We have here an account of what passed in Pilate's judgment-hall.

I. The trial Christ had before Pilate.

1. His arraignment; Jesus stood before the governor, as the prisoner before the judge. We could not stand before God because of our sins, if Christ had not been thus made sin for us. He was arraigned that we might be discharged.

2. His indictment; Art thou the king of the Jews? Now they thought that whoever was the Christ, must be the king of the Jews, and must deliver them from the Roman power, and restore to them a temporal dominion. They accused our Lord Jesus, as making himself king of the Jews, in opposition to the Roman yoke. They assuring the governor that, if he made himself Christ, he made himself king of the Jews, the governor takes it for granted, that he goes about to pervert the nation, and subvert the government. Art thou a king?

3. His plea; Jesus said unto him, "Thou sayest. It is as thou sayest, though not as thou meanest; I am a king, but not such a king as thou dost suspect me to be."

4. The evidence (v. 12); He was accused of the chief priests. Pilate found no fault in him; whatever was said, nothing was proved, and therefore what was wanting in matter they made up in noise and violence.

5. The prisoner's silence as to the prosecutors' accusations; He answered nothing. Because there was no occasion; nothing was alleged but what carried its own confutation along with it. His hour was come, and he submitted to his Father's will; Not as I will, but as thou wilt. Pilate pressed him to make some reply (v. 13); Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee? Pilate, having no malice at all against him, was desirous he should clear himself, urges him to it. He wondered at his silence. Pilate is not said to be angry at it, but to have marvelled greatly at it, as a thing very unusual. He thought it strange that he had not one word to say for himself.

II. The outrage and violence of the people, in pressing the governor to crucify Christ. The chief priests by the power of the mob gained the point which they could not otherwise carry. Now here are two instances of their outrage.

1. Their preferring Barabbas before him, and choosing to have him released rather than Jesus.

(1) It seems it was grown into a custom with the Roman governors, for the humouring of the Jews, to grace the feast of the passover with the release of a prisoner, (v. 15).

(2) The prisoner put in competition with our Lord Jesus was Barabbas; he is here called a notable prisoner (v. 16). Treason, murder, and felony, are the three most enormous crimes that are usually punished by the sword of justice: and Barabbas was guilty of all three, Luke xxiii. 19; John xviii. 40. A notable prisoner indeed, whose crimes were so complicated.

(3) The proposal was made by Pilate the governor (v. 17); Whom will ye that I release unto you? Pilate proposed to them to have Jesus released; he was convinced of his innocency, and that the prosecution was malicious; yet had not the courage to acquit him, as he ought to have done, by his own power, but would have him released by the people's election, and so he hoped to satisfy both his own conscience, and the people too. But such little tricks and artifices as these are the common practice of those that seek more to please men than God. What shall I do then, saith Pilate, with Jesus, who is called Christ? He puts the people in mind of this, that this Jesus, whose release he proposed, was looked upon by some among them as the Messiah.

The reason why Pilate laboured thus to get Jesus discharged was because he knew that for envy the chief priests had delivered him up (v. 18); that it was not his guilt, but his goodness, that they were provoked at. Anyone that heard the hosannas with which Christ was but a few days ago brought into Jerusalem, would have thought that Pilate might safely have referred this matter to the commonalty. But it proved otherwise.

(4) While Pilate was thus labouring the matter, he was confirmed in his unwillingness to condemn Jesus, by a message sent him from his wife (v. 19), by way of caution; Have thou nothing to do with that just man, for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him. Observe, The special providence of God, in sending this dream to Pilate's wife; it is not likely that she had heard anything, before, concerning Christ. Perhaps she was one of the devout and honourable women, and had some sense of religion. She suffered many things in this dream. It seems that it was a frightful dream, and her thoughts troubled her. See the tenderness and care of Pilate's wife, in sending this caution, thereupon, to her husband; Have nothing to do with that just man. This was an honourable testimony to our Lord Jesus, witnessing for him that he was a just man. When his friends were afraid to appear in defence of him, God made even those that were strangers and enemies, to speak in his favour; when Peter denied him, Judas confessed him; when the chief priests pronounced him guilty of death, Pilate declared he found no fault in him; when the women that loved him stood afar off, Pilate's wife, who knew little of him, showed a concern for him. It was a fair warning to Pilate; Have nothing to do with him. God has many ways of giving checks to sinners in their sinful pursuits, and it is a great mercy to have such checks. It is also our great duty to hearken to them. Pilate's lady sent him this warning, out of the love she had to him; let him take it how he would, she would give him the caution. It is an instance of true love to our friends and relations, to do what we can to keep them from sin; and the nearer any are to us, and the greater affection we have for them, the more solicitous we should be. The best friendship is friendship to the soul.

(5) The chief priests and the elders were busy, all this while, to influence the people in favour of Barabbas, v. 20. They persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus. Thus they managed the mob, who otherwise were well affected to Jesus, and, if they had not been so much at the beck of their priests, would never have done such a preposterous thing as to prefer Barabbas before Jesus. We cannot but look upon these wicked priests with indignation. Great power put into their hands they wretchedly abused, and the leaders of the people caused them to err. We cannot but look upon the deluded people with pity; I have compassion on the multitude, to see them hurried thus violently to so great wickedness.

(6) Being thus over-ruled by the priests, at length they made their choice, v. 21. Whether of the twain (saith Pilate) will ye that I release unto you? He hoped that he had gained his point, to have Jesus released. But, to his great surprise, they said Barabbas. Were ever men that pretended to reason or religion, guilty of such prodigious madness, such horrid wickedness! This was it that Peter charged so home upon them (Acts iii. 14); Ye desired a murderer to be granted to you.

2. Their pressing earnestly to have Jesus crucified, v. 22, 23. Pilate, being amazed at their choice of Barabbas puts it to them, "What shall I do then with Jesus?" They all said, Let him be crucified. That death they desired he might die, because it was looked upon as the most scandalous and ignominious; and they hoped thereby to make his followers ashamed to own him, and their relation to him. Malice and rage made them forget all rules of order and decency, and turned a court of justice into a riotous, tumultuous, and seditious assembly. See what a change was made upon the mind of the populace in a little time: when he rode in triumph into Jerusalem, so general were the acclamations of praise, that one would have thought he had no enemies; but now when he was led in triumph to Pilate's judgment-seat, so general were the outcries of enmity, that one would think he had no friends. Such revolutions are there in this changeable world, through which our way to heaven lies, as our Master's did, by honour and dishonour, by evil report, and good report.

Now, as to this demand, we are further told,

(1) How Pilate objected against it; Why, what evil hath he done? A proper question for a judge to ask before he pass a sentence of death. It is much for the honour of the Lord Jesus, that, though he suffered as an evil-doer, yet neither his judge nor his prosecutors could find that he had done any evil. This repeated assertion of his unspotted innocency, plainly intimates that he died to satisfy for the sins of others; for if it had not been for our transgressions that he was thus wounded, and for our offences that he was delivered up, and that upon his own voluntary undertaking to atone for them, I see not how these extraordinary sufferings of a person that had never thought, said, or done, anything amiss, could be reconciled with the justice and equity of that providence that governs the world, and at least permitted this to be done in it.

(2) How they insisted upon it; They cried out the more, Let him be crucified. They do not go about to show any evil he had done, but, right or wrong, he must be crucified. This unjust judge was wearied by importunity into an unjust sentence, as he in the parable into a just one (Luke xviii. 4, 5), and the cause carried purely by noise.

III. Here is the devolving of the guilt of Christ's blood upon the people and priests.

1. Pilate endeavours to transfer it from himself, v. 24. He sees it to no purpose to contend. What he said, (1) Would do no good; he could prevail nothing. See how strong the stream of lust and rage sometimes is; neither authority nor reason will prevail to give check to it. Nay, (2) It was more likely to do hurt; he saw that rather a tumult was made. This rude and brutish people fell to high words, and began to threaten Pilate what they would do if he did not gratify them. Now this turbulent tumultuous temper of the Jews contributed more than anything to the ruin of that nation not long after; for their frequent insurrections provoked the Romans to destroy them, and their inveterate quarrels among themselves made them an easy prey to the common enemy. Thus their sin was their ruin.

The priests were apprehensive that their endeavours to seize Christ would have caused an uproar, especially on the feast day; but it proved that Pilate's endeavour to save him, caused an uproar, and that on the feast day; so uncertain are the sentiments of the crowd. This puts him into a great strait, betwixt the peace of his own mind, and the peace of the city. Had he steadily and resolutely adhered to the sacred laws of justice, he had not been in any perplexity. A man in whom was found no fault, ought not to be crucified, upon any pretence whatsoever, nor must an unjust thing be done, to gratify any man or company of men in the world. Pilate thinks to trim the matter, and to pacify both the people and his own conscience too, by doing it, and yet disowning it.

Now Pilate endeavours to clear himself from the guilt,

[1] By a sign; He took water, and washed his hands before the multitude; not as if he thought thereby to cleanse himself from any guilt contracted before God, but to acquit himself before the people. He borrowed the ceremony from that law which appointed it to be used for the clearing of the country from the guilt of an undiscovered murder (Deut. xxi. 6, 7); and he used it the more to affect the people with the conviction he was under of the prisoner's innocency.

[2] By a saying; in which, First, He clears himself; I am innocent of the blood of this just person. What nonsense was this, to condemn him, and yet protest that he was innocent of his blood! For men to protest against a thing, and yet to practise it, is only to proclaim that they sin against their consciences. Secondly, He casts it upon the priests and people; "See ye to it"; do you answer it before God and the world. Sin is a brat that nobody is willing to own; and many deceive themselves with this, that they shall bear no blame if they can but find any to lay the blame upon; but it is not so easy a thing to transfer the guilt of sin as many think it is. The priests threw it upon Judas; See thou to it; and now Pilate throws it upon them; See ye to it.

2. The priests and people consented to take the guilt upon themselves; they all said, "His blood be on us, and on our children". They, in the heat of their rage, agreed to it, rather than lose the prey they had in their hands, and cried, His blood be upon us. By this they designed to indemnify Pilate. But those that are themselves bankrupts and beggars will never be admitted security for others. None could bear the sin of others, except him that had none of his own to answer for; it is a bold undertaking, and too big for any creature, to become bound for a sinner to Almighty God. But they did really imprecate wrath and vengeance upon themselves and their posterity. Christ had lately told them, that upon them would come all the righteous blood shed upon the earth, from that of the righteous Abel; but as if that were too little, they here imprecate upon themselves the guilt of that blood which was more precious than all the rest, and the guilt of which would lie heavier. Observe, How cruel they were in their imprecation. They imprecated the punishment of this sin, not only upon themselves, but upon their children too. It was madness to pull it upon themselves, but the height of barbarity to entail it on their posterity. See what enemies wicked men are to their own children and families. From the time they imprecated this blood upon them, they were followed with one judgment after another. Yet on some of them, and some of theirs, this blood came, not to condemn them, but to save them; divine mercy, upon their repenting and believing, cut off this entail, and then the promise was again to them, and to their children. God is better to us and ours than we are.

Verses 26–32

I. The sentence passed, and the warrant signed for his execution; and this immediately, the same hour.

1. Barabbas was released; to intimate that Christ was condemned for this purpose, that sinners, even the chief of sinners, might be released; he was delivered up, that we might be delivered. In this unparalleled instance of divine grace, the upright is a ransom for the transgressors, the just for the unjust.

2. Jesus was scourged; this was an ignominious cruel punishment, especially as it was inflicted by the Romans, who were not under the moderation of the Jewish law, which forbade scourgings, above forty stripes.

3. He was then delivered to be crucified; a kind of death used only among the Romans; the manner of it is such, that it seems to be the result of wit and cruelty in combination, to make death in the highest degree terrible and miserable. A cross was set up in the ground, to which the hands and feet were nailed, on which nails the weight of the body hung, till it died of the pain. It was a bloody death, a painful, shameful, cursed death; it was so miserable a death, that merciful princes appointed those who were condemned to it by the law, to be strangled first, and then nailed to the cross.

II. The barbarous treatment which the soldiers gave him. When he was condemned, he ought to have had some time allowed him to prepare for death. There was a law made by the Roman senate that the execution of criminals should be deferred at least ten days after sentence. But there were scarcely allowed so many minutes to our Lord Jesus. The storm continued without any intermission.

When he was delivered to be crucified, that was enough; they that kill the body, yield that there is no more that they can do, but Christ's enemies will do more. His guards set themselves to abuse him. Perhaps it was not so much in spite to him, as to make sport for themselves, that they thus abused him. They understood that he pretended to a crown; to taunt him with that gave them some diversion, and an opportunity to make themselves and one another merry.

Observe, 1. Where this was done—in the common hall. The governor's house, which should have been a shelter to the wronged and abused, is made the theatre of this barbarity. Those in authority will be accountable, not only for the wickedness which they do, or appoint, but for that which they do not restrain.

2. Who were concerned in it. They gathered the whole band, the soldiers that were to attend the execution.

3. What particular indignities were done him.

(1) They stripped him, v. 28. The shame of nakedness came in with sin (Gen. iii. 7).

(2) They put on him a scarlet robe, some old red cloak, such as the Roman soldiers wore, in imitation of the scarlet robes which kings and emperors wore; thus upbraiding him with his being called a King. This sham of majesty they put upon him in his dress, only to expose him to the spectators, as the more ridiculous.

(3) They platted a crown of thorns, and put it upon his head, v, 29. This was to carry on the humour of making him a mock-king; yet, had they intended it only for a reproach, they might have platted a crown of straw, or rushes, but they designed it to be painful to him. Thorns signify afflictions. These Christ put into a crown; so much did he alter the property of them to them that are his, giving them cause to glory in tribulation, and making it to work for them a weight of glory. Christ was crowned with thorns, to show that his kingdom was not of this world, nor the glory of it worldly glory, but is attended here with bonds and afflictions, while the glory of it is to be revealed.

(4) They put a reed in his right hand; this was intended for a mock-sceptre, another of the insignia of the majesty they jeered him with; as if this were a sceptre good enough for such a King. Like sceptre, like kingdom, both weak and wavering, and withering and worthless; but they were quite mistaken, for his throne is for ever and ever.

(5) They bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! Having made him a sham King, they thus make a jest of doing homage to him, thus ridiculing his pretensions to sovereignty.

(6) They spit upon him; thus he had been abused in the High Priest's hall, ch. xxvi. 67. In doing homage, the subject kissed the sovereign, in token of his allegiance; but they, in this mock-homage, instead of kissing him, spit in his face. It is strange that the sons of men should ever do such a piece of villainy, and that the Son of God should ever suffer such a piece of ignominy.

(7) They took the reed, and smote him on the head. That which they had made the mock-ensign of his royalty, they now make the real instrument of their cruelty, and his pain. They smote him, it is probable, upon the crown of thorns, and so struck them into his head, which made the most sport for them, to whom his pain was the greatest pleasure. All this misery and shame he underwent, that he might purchase for us everlasting life, and joy, and glory.

III. The conveying of him to the place of execution. After they had mocked and abused him, as long as they thought fit, they then took the robe off from him; and they put his own raiment on him, because that was to fall to the soldiers' share, that were employed in the execution. No mention is made of their taking off the crown of thorns, whence it is commonly supposed (though there is no certainty of it) that he was crucified with that on his head.

1. They led him away to be crucified; he was led as a lamb to the slaughter, as a sacrifice to the altar. We may well imagine how they hurried him on, and dragged him along, with all the speed possible. They led him away out of the city; for Christ, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate (Heb. xiii. 12).

2. They compelled Simon of Cyrene to bear his cross, v. 32. It seems, at first he carried the cross himself. And this was intended, as other things, both for pain and shame to him. But after a while they took the cross off from him, either, (1) In compassion to him, because they saw it was too great a load for him. We can hardly think that they had any consideration of that. But, (2) Perhaps it was because he could not, with the cross on his back, go forward so fast as they would have him. Or, (3) They were afraid, lest he should faint away under the load of his cross, and die, and so prevent what their malice further intended to do against him. Taking the cross off from him, they compelled one Simon of Cyrene to bear it. It was a reproach, and none would do it but by compulsion. Some think that this Simon was a disciple of Christ, at least a well-wisher to him, and that they knew it, and therefore put this upon him. All that will approve themselves disciples indeed, must follow Christ, bearing his cross.

Verses 33–49

We have here the crucifixion of our Lord Jesus.

I. The place where our Lord Jesus was put to death.

1. They came to a place called Golgotha, near adjoining to Jerusalem, probably the common place of execution. But now in the same place where criminals were sacrificed to the justice of the government, was our Lord Jesus sacrificed to the justice of God. Some think that it was called the place of a skull, because it was the common charnel-house, where the bones and skulls of dead men were laid together out of the way, lest people should touch them, and be defiled thereby. When by dying Christ would destroy death, he added this circumstance of honour to his victory, that he triumphed over death upon his own dunghill.

2. There they crucified him (v. 35), nailed his hands and feet to the cross, and then reared it up, and him hanging on it; for so the manner of the Romans was to crucify. Let our hearts be touched with the feeling of that exquisite pain which our blessed Saviour now endured. And when we behold what manner of death he died, let us in that behold with what manner of love he loved us.

II. The barbarous and abusive treatment they gave him. As if death, so great a death, were not bad enough, they contrived to add to the bitterness and terror of it.

1. By the drink they provided for him before he was nailed to the cross, v. 34. It was usual to have a cup of spiced wine for those to drink of, that were to be put to death. But with that cup which Christ was to drink of, they mingled vinegar and gall, to make it sour and bitter. He tasted thereof, and so had the worst of it, took the bitter taste into his mouth; now he was tasting death in its full bitterness. He would not drink it, because he would not have the best of it; would have nothing like an opiate to lessen his sense of pain, for he would die so as to feel himself die.

2. By the dividing of his garments, v. 35. When they nailed him to the cross, they stripped him of his garments. If we be at any time stripped of our comforts for Christ, let us bear it patiently; he was stripped for us. Enemies may strip us of our clothes, but cannot strip us of our best comforts; cannot take from us the garments of praise. The clothes of those that are executed are the executioner's fee: four soldiers were employed in crucifying Christ, and they must each of them have a share; his upper garment, if it were divided, would be of no use to any of them, and therefore they agreed to cast lots for it. Perhaps they had heard of those that had been cured by touching the hem of his garment, and they thought it valuable for some magic virtue in it. Or, It was for diversion; to pass away the time while they waited for his death, they would play a game at dice for the clothes, but, whatever they designed, the word of God is herein accomplished. In that famous psalm, the first words of which Christ made use of upon the cross, it was said, They parted my garment among them, and cast lots upon my vesture, Ps. xxii. 18. Christ stripped himself of his glories, to divide them among us.

They now sat down, and watched him, v. 36. But Providence so ordered it, that those who were appointed to watch him, thereby became unexceptionable witnesses for him; having the opportunity to see and hear that which extorted from them that noble confession (v. 54), Truly this was the Son of God.

3. By the title set up over his head, v 37. It was usual not only by a crier to proclaim before them, but by a writing also over their heads to notify what was the crime for which they suffered; so they set up over Christ's head his accusation written, This is Jesus the King of the Jews. Here was no crime alleged against him. It is not said that he was a pretended Saviour, or a usurping King, but, This is Jesus, a Saviour; surely that was no crime; and, This is the King of the Jews; nor was that a crime; for they expected that the Messiah should be so. Here was a very glorious truth asserted concerning him—that he is Jesus the King of the Jews, that King whom the Jews expected and ought to have submitted to. Pilate, instead of accusing Christ as a Criminal, proclaimed him a King, and that three times, in three inscriptions. Thus God makes men to serve his purposes, quite beyond their own.

4. By his companions with him in suffering, v. 38. There were two thieves crucified with him at the same time, in the same place, under the same guard; two highway-men, or robbers upon the road, as the word properly signifies. It is probable that this was appointed to be execution-day. However it was, the scripture was fulfilled in it (Isa. liii. 12), He was numbered with the transgressors.

(1) It was a reproach to him, that he was crucified with them. He was made to partake with the vilest malefactors in their plagues, as if he had been a partaker with them in their sins. He was, at his death, numbered among the transgressors, that we, at our death, might be numbered among the saints.

(2) It was an additional reproach, that he was crucified in the midst, between them, as if he had been the worst of the three, the principal malefactor; for among three the middle is the place for the chief. Every circumstance was contrived to his dishonour, as if the great Saviour were of all others the greatest sinner. It was also intended to ruffle and discompose him, in his last moments, with the shrieks, and groans, and blasphemies, of these malefactors. But thus would Christ affect himself with the miseries of sinners, when he was suffering for their salvation.

5. By the blasphemies and revilings with which they loaded him when he was hanging upon the cross. One would have thought that, when they had nailed him to the cross, they had done their worst. A dying man, though an infamous man, should be treated with compassion. For aught that appears, not one of his friends, who the other day cried Hosanna to him, durst be seen to show him any respect.

(1) The common people, that passed by, reviled him. His extreme misery and exemplary patience under it, did not make them to relent; but they who by their outcries brought him to this, now think to justify themselves in it by their reproaches, as if they did well to condemn him. They reviled him.

[1] The persons that reviled him; they that passed by, the travellers that went along the road; they were possessed with prejudices against him by the reports and clamours of the High Priest's creatures. It is a hard thing to keep up a good opinion of persons and things that are everywhere run down, and spoken against. Every one is apt to say as the most say, and to throw a stone at that which is put into an ill name.

[2] The gesture they used, in contempt of him—wagging their heads; which signifies their triumph in his fall, and their insulting over him.

[3] The taunts and jeers they uttered. These are here recorded.

First, They upbraided him with his destroying of the temple. They industriously spread it among the people, to bring an odium upon him, that he had a design to destroy the temple; than which nothing would more incense the people against him. "Thou that destroyest the temple, that vast and strong fabric, try thy strength now in plucking up that cross, and drawing those nails, and so save thyself; if thou hast the power thou hast boasted of, this is a proper time to exert it, and give proof of it." He was crucified in weakness (2 Cor. xiii. 4), so it seemed to them; but indeed Christ crucified is the Power of God.

Secondly, They upbraided him with his saying that he was the Son of God; If thou be so, say they, come down from the cross. Now they take the devil's words out of his mouth, with which he tempted him in the wilderness (ch. iv. 3, 6), and renew the same assault; If thou be the Son of God. They think that now, or never, he must prove himself to be the Son of God; forgetting that he had proved it by the miracles he wrought; and unwilling to wait for the complete proof of it by his own resurrection, to which he had so often referred. This comes of judging things by the present aspect of them, without a due remembrance of what is past, and a patient expectation of what may further be produced.

(2) The chief priests and scribes, v. 41. They did not think it enough to invite the rabble to do it. They should have been in the temple at their devotion, for it was the first day of the feast of unleavened bread. but they were here at the place of execution, spitting their venom at the Lord Jesus. Did they disparage themselves thus, to do despite to Christ, and shall we be afraid of disparaging ourselves, by joining with the multitude to do him honour?

Two things the priests and elders upbraided him with.

[1] That he could not save himself, v. 42. First, They take it for granted that he could not save himself, and therefore had not the power he pretended to, when really he would not save himself, because he would die to save us. Secondly, They would insinuate that, because he did not now save himself, therefore all his pretence to save others was but sham and delusion. Thirdly, They upbraid him with being the King of Israel. Many people would like the King of Israel well enough, if he would but come down from the cross. But the matter is settled; if no cross, then no Christ, no crown. Those that would reign with him, must be willing to suffer with him, for Christ and his cross are nailed together in this world. Fourthly, They challenged him to come down from the cross. But his unchangeable love and resolution set him above, and fortified him against, this temptation, so that he did not fail, nor was discouraged. Fifthly, They promised that, if he would come down from the cross, they would believe him. When they had formerly demanded a sign, he told them that the sign he would give them, should be not his coming down from the cross, but, which was a greater instance of his power, his coming up from the grave. But to promise ourselves that we would believe, if we had such and such means and motives of faith as we ourselves would prescribe, is not only a gross instance of the deceitfulness of our hearts, but the sorry refuge, or subterfuge rather, of an obstinate destroying infidelity.

[2] That God, his Father, would not save him (v. 43); He trusted in God, for he said, I am the Son of God. Those who call God Father, and themselves his children, thereby profess to put a confidence in him, Ps. ix. 10. Now they suggest, that he did but deceive himself and others; for, if he had been the Son of God he would not have been abandoned to all this misery, much less abandoned in it. It was intended, First, To vilify him, and to make the standers-by think him a deceiver and an imposter. Secondly, To terrify him, and drive him to distrust and despair of his Father's power and love.

(3) To complete the reproach, the thieves also that were crucified with him were not only not reviled as he was, as if they had been saints compared with him, but cast the same in his teeth; that is, one of them did, who said, If thou be the Christ, save thyself and us, Luke xxiii. 39. One would think that of all people this thief had least cause, and should have had least mind, to banter Christ.

Well, thus our Lord Jesus having undertaken to satisfy the justice of God for the wrong done him in his honour by sin, he did it by suffering in his honour; by submitting to the utmost indignity that could be done to the worst of men; because he was made sin for us, he was thus made a curse for us.

III. We have here the frowns of heaven, which our Lord Jesus was under, in the midst of all these injuries and indignities from men. Concerning which, observe,

1. How this was signified—by an extraordinary and miraculous eclipse of the sun, which continued for three hours, v. 45. An extraordinary light gave intelligence of the birth of Christ (ch. ii. 2), and therefore it was proper that an extraordinary darkness should notify his death, for he is the Light of the world. This surprising, amazing, darkness was designed to stop the mouths of those blasphemers, who were reviling Christ as he hung on the cross. Though their hearts were not changed, yet they were silent, and stood doubting what this should mean, till after three hours the darkness scattered, and then (as appears by v. 47), like Pharaoh when the plague was over, they hardened their hearts. But that which was principally intended in this darkness, was, (1) Christ's present conflict with the powers of darkness. He fights them on their own ground; gives them all the advantage they could have against him by this darkness, lets them take the wind and sun, and yet baffles them, and so becomes more than a conqueror. (2) His present want of heavenly comforts. This darkness signified that dark cloud which the human soul of our Lord Jesus was now under. God makes his sun to shine upon the just and upon the unjust; but even the light of the sun was withheld from our Saviour, when he was made sin for us. When earth denied him a drop of cold water, heaven denied him a beam of light; having to deliver us from utter darkness, he did himself, in the depth of his sufferings, walk in darkness, and had no light. During the three hours that this darkness continued, we do not find that he said one word, but passed this time in a silent retirement into his own soul. Never were there three such hours since the day that God created man upon the earth, never such a dark and awful scene; the crisis of that great affair of man's redemption and salvation.

2. How he complained of it (v. 46); About the ninth hour, when it began to clear up, after a long and silent conflict. Jesus cried, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? The words are related in the Syriac tongue, in which they were spoken, for the sake of the perverse construction which his enemies put upon them, in putting Elias, for Eli. Now observe here,

(1) Whence he borrowed this complaint—from Ps. xxii. 1. This, and that other word, Into thy hands I commit my spirit, he fetched from David's psalms to teach us of what use the word of God is to us, to direct us in prayer, which will help our infirmities.

(2) How he uttered it—with a loud voice; which bespeaks the extremity of his pain and anguish, the strength of nature remaining in him, and the great earnestness of his spirit in this expostulation.

(3) What the complaint was—My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me? A strange complaint to come from the mouth of our Lord Jesus, who, we are sure, was one in whom he was always well pleased. The Father now loved him, nay, he knew that therefore he loved him, because he laid down his life for the sheep; what, and yet forsaken of him, and in the midst of his sufferings too! Surely never sorrow was like unto that sorrow which extorted such a complaint as this. No wonder that such a complaint as this made the earth to quake, and rent the rocks.

Note, [1] That our Lord Jesus was, in his sufferings, for a time, forsaken by his Father. So he saith himself, who we are sure was under no mistake concerning his own case. Not as if there were any abatement of his Father's love to him, or his to his Father; but his Father forsook him. He delivered him up into the hands of his enemies, and did not appear to deliver him out of their hands. No angel is sent from heaven to deliver him, no friend on earth raised up to appear for him. When his soul was first troubled, he had a voice from heaven to comfort him (John xii. 27, 28); when he was in his agony in the garden, there appeared an angel from heaven strengthening him; but now he had neither the one nor the other. God hid his face from him. Christ was made Sin for us, a Curse for us; and therefore, though God loved him as a Son, he frowned upon him as a Surety.

[2] That Christ's being forsaken of his Father was the most grievous of his sufferings. Here he laid the most doleful accents. When his Father stood at a distance, he cried out thus; for this was it that put wormwood and gall into the affliction and misery.

[3] That our Lord Jesus, even when he was thus forsaken of his Father, kept hold of him as his God, notwithstanding; My God, my God; though forsaking me, yet mine. This supported him, and bore him up, that even in the depth of his sufferings God was his God, and this he resolves to keep fast hold of.

(4) See how his enemies impiously bantered and ridiculed this complaint (v. 47); They said, This man calleth for Elias. Some think that this was the ignorant mistake of the Roman soldiers, who knew not the signification of Eli, Eli, and so made this blundering comment upon these words of Christ. Many of the reproaches cast upon the word of God and the people of God, take rise from gross mistakes. Those that hear by the halves, pervert what they hear. But others think that it was the wilful mistake of some of the Jews, who knew very well what he said, but were disposed to abuse him, and to misrepresent him as one who, being forsaken of God, was driven to trust in creatures. It is no new thing for the most pious devotions of the best men to be ridiculed and abused by profane scoffers. Christ's words were so, though he spoke as never man spoke.

IV. The cold comfort which his enemies ministered to him in this agony.

1. Some gave him vinegar to drink (v. 48); instead of some cordial-water to revive and refresh him under this heavy burthen. One of them ran to fetch it.

2. Others, with the same purpose of disturbing and abusing him, refer him to Elias (v. 49); "Let be, let us see whether Elias will come to save him. Come, let him alone, he has appealed to Elias, and to Elias let him go."

Verses 50–56

We have here, at length, an account of the death of Christ.

I. The manner how he breathed his last (v. 50); between the third and the sixth hour, that is, between nine and twelve o'clock, as we reckon, he was nailed to the cross, and soon after the ninth hour, that is, between three and four o'clock, in the afternoon, he died. That was the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, and the time when the paschal lamb was killed; and Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us.

Two things are here noted concerning the manner of Christ's dying.

1. That he cried with a loud voice, as before, v. 46. Now,

(1) This was a sign, that, after all his pains and fatigues, his life was whole in him, and nature strong. The voice of dying men is one of the first things that fails; with a panting breath and a faltering tongue, a few broken words are hardly spoken, and more hardly heard. But Christ, just before he expired, spoke like a man in his full strength, to show that his life was not forced from him, but was freely delivered by him into his Father's hands.

(2) It was significant. His crying with a loud voice when he died, signified that his death should be published and proclaimed to all the world. Christ's loud cry was like a trumpet blown over the sacrifices.

2. That then he yielded up the ghost. This is the usual periphrasis of dying; to show that the Son of God upon the cross did truly and properly die by the violence of the pain he was put to. His soul was separated from his body, and so his body was left really and truly dead. He had undertaken to make his soul an offering for sin.

II. The miracles that attended his death. So many miracles being wrought by him in his life, we might well expect some to be wrought concerning him at his death.

1. Behold, the veil of the temple was rent in twain. Just as our Lord Jesus expired, at the time of the offering of the evening sacrifice, the veil of the temple was rent by an invisible power; that veil which parted between the holy place and the most holy. In this, as in others of Christ's miracles, there was a mystery.

(1) It was in correspondence with the temple of Christ's body, which was now in the dissolving. Death is the rending of the veil of flesh which interposes between us and the holy of holies; the death of Christ was so, the death of true Christians is so.

(2) It signified the revealing and unfolding of the mysteries of the Old Testament. The veil of the temple was for concealment, for it was highly penal for any person to see the furniture of the most holy place, except the High Priest, and he but once a year, with great ceremony and through a cloud of smoke. But now, at the death of Christ, all was laid open, the mysteries were unveiled, so that now he that runs may read the meaning of them.

(3) It signified the uniting of Jew and Gentile, by the removing of the partition wall between them, which was the ceremonial law. Christ, in his death, repealed the ceremonial law, took it out of the way, nailed it to his cross. Christ died, to rend all dividing veils, and to make all his one, John xvii. 21.

(4) It signified the consecrating and laying open of a new and living way to God. The veil kept people off from drawing near to the most holy place, where the Shechinah was. But the rending of it signified that Christ by his death opened a way to God, [1] For himself. Having offered his sacrifice in the outer court, the blood of it was now to be sprinkled upon the mercy-seat within the veil. Though he did not personally ascend into the holy place not made with hands till above forty days after, yet he immediately acquired a right to enter, and had a virtual admission. [2] For us in him: so the apostle applies it, Heb. x. 19, 20. He died, to bring us to God, and, in order thereunto, to rend that veil of guilt and wrath which interposed between us and him. We have free access through Christ to the throne of grace, or mercy-seat, now, and to the throne of glory hereafter, Heb. iv. 16. When Christ had overcome the sharpness of death, he opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Nothing can obstruct or discourage our access to heaven.

2. The earth did quake. This earthquake signified two things.

(1) The horrible wickedness of Christ's crucifiers. The earth, by trembling under such a load, bore its testimony to the innocency of him that was persecuted, and against the impiety of those that persecuted him.

(2) The glorious achievements of Christ's cross. This earthquake signified the mighty shock, nay, the fatal blow, now given to the devil's kingdom. God shakes all nations, when the Desire of all nations is to come.

3. The rocks rent; the hardest and firmest part of the earth was made to feel this mighty shock. Christ had said, that if the children should cease to cry Hosanna, the stones would immediately cry out; and now, in effect, they did so, proclaiming the glory of the suffering Jesus. Jesus Christ is the Rock; and the rending of these rocks, signified the rending of that rock, (1) That in the clefts of it we may be hid, as Moses in the cleft of the rock at Horeb, that there we may behold the glory of the Lord, as he did. (2) That from the cleft of it rivers of living water may flow, and follow us in this wilderness. When we celebrate the memorial of Christ's death, our hard and rocky hearts must be rent—the heart, and not the garments. That heart is harder than a rock, that will not yield, that will not melt, where Jesus Christ is evidently set forth crucified.
